

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM JULY 20, 1875, TO AUGUST 15, 1876,

REPORTED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, DONALD CRAWFORD, G. F. MELVILLE
A. E. HENDERSON, D. GILLESPIE, AND H. JOHNSTON, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

FOURTH SERIES.—VOL. III.

EDINBURGH:
T. & T. CLARK, LAW BOOKSELLERS.
LONDON: STEVENS & SONS.
M.DCCC.LXXVI.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB (SUCCESSOR TO JOHN HUGHES), THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279712

STANFORD LIBRARY

JUDGES

OF THE

COURT OF SESSION

DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.

Lord DEAS.

Lord ARDMILLAN.

Lord MURE.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, The Right Hon. Lord MONCREIFF.

Lord NEAVES.

Lord ORMIDALE.

Lord GIFFORD.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord SHAND.
Lord YOUNG.
Lord CRAIGHILL.
Lord CURRIEHILL.
Lord RUTHERFURD CLARK.*

* Lord Rutherfurd Clark was appointed in November 1875.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.
Lord Justice-Clerk, Right Hon. Lord MONCREIFF.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord DEAS.	Lord ARDMILLAN.	Lord NEAVES.*
Lord YOUNG.	Lord MURE.	Lord CRAIGHILL.*

Lord-Advocate, EDWARD S. GORDON, Esquire.

Solicitor-General, WILLIAM WATSON, Esquire.

Dean of Faculty, ANDREW R. CLARK, Esquire, Succeeded by WILLIAM WATSON, Esquire.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PEERS

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, Lord CAIRNS,

Lords CHELMSFORD, HATHERLEY, PENZANCE, O'HAGAN, and SELBORNE.

---

* Lord Neaves having resigned his commission as a Lord of Justiciary, Lord Craighill was appointed in March 1876.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN VOLUME III.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Court, Court of Justiciary, and House of Lords, see pp. xi. xii. and xiii. hereof.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

Page

Aberdeen Sea Insurance Company, Hutchinson and Company v. - 682
Aberdeen, University of, &c. v. Magistrates of Aberdeen, - - 1087
Abernethy School Board, Morrison v. - - - - 945
Adams, &c., Gibson v. - - - - - 144
Adams v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, - - 215
Adamson, Robertson v. - - - - - 978
Advocate, Lord, v. Brown, - - - - - 188
Advocate, Lord, Middleton v. - - - - 599
Advocate, Lord, v. Stow School Board, - - - - 469
Aitken v. Kirk, - - - - - - 595
Alexander v. Butchart, - - - - - 156
Alison, &c., (Renton's Trustees) v. - - - - 1142
Allan, Campbell, and Company, Scottish Heritable Security Company v. 333
Alloa Coal Company, &c. Blair v. - - - - 25
Anderson, &c. (Oliver's Trustees), Petitioners, - - - 639
Anderson v. Garson, - - - - - 254
Anderson, &c., Kellock v. - - - - - 239
Anderson v. Mackinnon, - - - - - 608
Anderston Foundry Company, Harrisons v. - - - 386
Angus, Ferrier v. - - - - - - 396
Arbroath, Presbytery of, Walker v. - - - - 498
Atchison's Trustees v. Atchison, - - - - 388

Bain, &c., Houldsworth v. - - - - - 304
Baird and Company, Caledonian Railway Company v. - - 839
Barlas, Roxburgh and Company v. - - - - 288
Batchelor v. Pattison, &c. - - - - 914, 1086
Beattie v. Ures, - - - - - - 634
Begg, &c. v. Jack, - - - - - 35
Beith v. Mackenzie, - - - - - 185
Bell's Trustees, M'Gill, &c. v. - - - - 427
Blair v. Ramsay, &c. - - - - - 25
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c. - - - - 362
Board of Education for Scotland, &c., Macfarlane v. - - 88
Borland, M'Lay v. - - - - - 1124
Borthwick, Minister of, v. Dundas, &c. - - - 361

	Page
Brand's Trustees, Houldsworth v.	304
Brandt and Company v. Dickson (Lumgair's Trustee),	375
British Agricultural Association, Towill and Company v.	117
British Shipowners' Company (Limited) v. Grimond,	968
Brown, Lord Advocate v.	188
Brown v. M'Connell,	788
Brown, Robertson v.	652
Brown and Company, Gibson and Stewart v.	328
Browne, &c., Nelson, Donkin, and Company v.	810
Buchanan v. Buchanan,	556
Buist, Scottish Widows' Fund v.	1078
Butchart, Alexander v.	156
Byrne, Kidd v.	255
Byrne v. Johnson,	255
C v. M,	693
Cadzow v. Lockhart,	666
Cairnduff, Naismith v.	863
Cairns, Mabon v.	47
Caledonian Canal, Commissioners of, M'Tavish v.	412
Caledonian Railway Company v. Baird and Company,	839
Caledonian Railway Company, Cruickshank, Fraser, and Company v.	484
Caledonian Railway Company, Moon v.	806
Campbell, Macleay v.	999
Chalmers v. Dixon,	461
Chalmers, Dunn v.	236
Christie, &c., Petitioners,	623
City Parish, Inspector of, v. Inspectors of South Leith and St Cuthberts,	642
Clark v. Hamilton and Lee,	166
Clark v. M'Allister,	780
Clinton, Petitioner,	62
Clippens Shale Oil Company v. Scott,	651
Clydesdale Bank v. Royal Bank,	586
Cockburn, Robertson v.	21
Cooper and M'Leod v. Edinburgh Improvement Trustees,	1106
Craig v. Peebles,	441
Craig, Simpson and, Greig v.	642
Crosshill Police Commissioners, Dubs, &c. v.	758
Cruickshank, Fraser, and Company v. Caledonian Railway Company,	484
Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees,	921
Dalhousie's Trustees v. Dalhousie,	882
Dall' Orso v. Mason and Company,	419
Dalry, Kirk-Session, &c. of, M'Culloch, &c. v.	1182
Davie v. Stark,	1114
Davies, Mitchell and Baxter v.	208
Deer, Presbytery of, v. Heritors of Pitsligo,	975
Dick v. Hutton,	448
Dickson, Brandt and Company v.	375
Dixon, Chalmers v.	464
Dixon, &c., Steele and Company v.	1003
Dove, Johnston and Sons v.	202
Downie, Miller v.	548
Dubs, &c., v. Crosshill Police Commissioners,	758
Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson (Suspension and Interdict),	604
Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson (Petition and Complaint),	974
Dumfries Harbour Commissioners, Young, &c. v.	991
Dunbar, Petitioner,	554
Dunbar School Board v. Magistrates and Town-Council of Dunbar,	631

	Page
Dundas, Petitioner,	273
Dundas, Minister of Borthwick v.	361
Dundee Police Commissioners v. Mitchell,	762
Dunlop, Forrest v.	15
Dunmore, Earl of, Viscount Fincastle v.	345
Dunn v. Chalmers,	236
Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company, Leith Heritages Company v.	789
Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, &c., Cooper and M'Leod v.	1106
Edinburgh, Magistrates of, v. Whitehead, &c.	663
Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Torbain,	655
Education Board, Macfarlane v.	88
Ewing's Trustees, Robinows and Majoribanks v.	1134
Farquhar v. Farquhar's Executors,	71
Ferguson's Trustees v. Magistrates of Kinghorn,	401
Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, Pearson v.	800
Ferrier v. Angus,	396
Ferryman, &c., Lockyer v.	882
Fincastle, Viscount, v. Earl of Dunmore,	345
Finlayson, Sloane v.	678
Fleming, &c., Baroness Gray v.	1031
Forgie v. Stewart and M'Donald,	1149
Forrest v. Dunlop,	15
Gardner v. Gardner,	695
Gardner and Son, Sdeuard v.	577
Garson, Anderson v.	254
Gibson v. Adams, &c.	144
Gibson and Stewart v. Brown and Company,	328
Gillespie v. Mercer, &c.	561
Gilmour and Others (Stewart's Trustees) v. Hart,	192
Gilray,	619
Glasgow Gas Commissioners v. Inland Revenue,	857
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, Adams v.	215
Glasgow, Magistrates of, Walton Brothers v.	1130
Gordon, M'Kerron, &c. v.	429
Grainger's Curator,	479
Grant v. Grant's Trustees,	280
Gray, Baroness, v. Richardson, &c.	1031
Great North of Scotland Railway Company, M'Connachie v.	79
Greenock Harbour Trustees, Thomson, &c. v.	1194
Greig v. Simpson and Craig,	642
Grimond, British Shipowners' Company (Limited) v.	968
Hamilton, Duke of, Wardrope v.	876
Hamilton and Lee, Clark v.	166
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Company,	386
Harrison, &c., Morrison v.	406
Hart, Steuart's Trustees v.	192
Henderson v. Mackenzie,	623
Henderson v. Somers,	997
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson,	320
Hepburn, Scott's Executors v.	816
Highland Peat Fuel Company, Directors of, v. Hume,	881
Highland Railway Company v. Jackson,	850
Home v. Home,	591
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees,	304
Hume, Directors of Highland Peat Fuel Company v.	881

GENERAL BOOKBINDING CO.
80 123ST 53 004 7 S D.P. 2170
QUALITY CONTROL MARK

Page

Humphrey, Law v. - - - - - 1192
Hutchinson and Company v. Aberdeen Sea Insurance Company, - 682
Hutton, Dick v. - - - - - 448

Inland Revenue, Commissoners of, Glasgow Gas Commissioners v. - 857

Jack, Begg, &c. v., et é contra, - - - - 35
Jackson, Highland Railway Company v. - - - 850
Jackson v. M'Kechnie, - - - - - 130
Jackson, &c. v. M'Millan, &c. - - - - 627
Johnson, Byrne v. - - - - - 255
Johnston v. Rae, - - - - - - 879
Johnston and Sons v. Dove, - - - - - 202

Kellock v. Anderson, &c. - - - - - 239
Kennedy v. Macdonald, - - - - - 813
Kidd v. Byrne, - - - - - - 255
Kilmalcolm, Minister of, v. Heritors of Kilmalcolm, - - 32
Kinghorn, Magistrates of, Ferguson's Trustees v. - - - 401
Kirk, Aitken v. - - - - - - 395
Kirk v. Kirk, - - - - - - 128
Kirkwood v. Kirkwood, - - - - - 235
Kirriemuir Police Commissioners v. Reid's Trustees, - - 993

Law v. Humphrey, - - - - - 1192
Leck v. Heritors of Kilmalcolm, - - - - 32
Leith Heritages Company v. Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company, - 789
Leith, Magistrates of, v. Lennon, - - - - 152
Lennon, Magistrates of Leith v. - - - - 152
Leuchars, Kirk-Session of, Turbyne v. - - - - 10
Liff and Benvie, Inspector of, Lord Advocate v. - - - 188
Lindsay, North British Railway Company v. - - - 168
Lockhart, Cadzow v. - - - - - 666
Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c. - - - - - 882
Lord Advocate v. Inspector of Liff and Benvie, - - - 188
Lord Advocate, Middleton v. - - - - 599

M, C v. - - - - - - 693
Mabon v. Cairns, - - - - - - 47
M'Allister, Clark v. - - - - - 780
Macbeth, &c., Thom, &c. v. - - - - - 161
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Company, - 79
M'Connell, Brown v. - - - - - 788
M'Culloch v. Kirk-Session, &c. of Dalry, - - - 1183
M'Cutcheon v. M'William, - - - - - 565
Macdonald, Kennedy v. - - - - - 813
M'Donald v. Robertson, - - - - - 645
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board, &c. - - - 88
M'Genn and Company, Wilson v. - - - - 474
M'Gill, &c. v. Bell's Trustees, - - - - 427
M'Kechnie, Jackson v. - - - - - 130
Mackenzie, Beith v. - - - - - 185
Mackenzie, Henderson v. - - - - - 623
M'Kerron, &c. v. Gordon, - - - - - 429
Mackersy, &c. Batchelor v. - - - - - 914
Mackie, Wilson v. - - - - - - 18
M'Kinnon, Grainger's Curator, - - - - 479
Mackinnon, Anderson v. - - - - - 608
Mackintosh v. Ross, - - - - - 232
M'Laren, &c. (Norton's Executors) v. Menzies, - - - 1151

	Page
M'Lay v. Borland,	1124
M'Laurin, Stafford v.	148
M'Laurin v. Stafford,	265
Macleay v. Campbell,	999
M'Millan, &c., Jackson, &c. v.	627
M'Tavish v. Commissioners of Caledonian Canal,	412
M'William, M'Cutcheon v.	565
Maitland, &c., Smith, Laing, and Company v.	281
Mason and Company, Dall' Orso v.	419
Mann, Wilson v.	527
Maule (Petitioner),	831
Menzies, M'Laren, &c. (Norton's Executors) v.	1151
Mercer, &c., Gillespie v.	561
Merrett's Trustee v. Harrison, &c.	604
Middleton, Lord Advocate v.	599
Miller v. Downie,	548
Miller v. Walker,	242
Miller and Company v. Potter, Wilson, and Company,	105
Mitchell, Dundee Police Commissioners v.	762
Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies,	208
Mochrum School Board, &c., Macfarlane v.	88
Monypenny's Trustees, Spens v.	50
Moon v. Caledonian Railway Company,	806
Morrison v. Abernethy School Board,	945
Morrison v. Harrison, &c.	406
Mossend Iron Company, Sneddon v.	868
Munro, &c., White v.	1011
Naismith v. Cairnduff,	863
Nelson, Donkin, and Company v. Browne, &c.	810
Nicol v. Nicol's Executor, &c.	374
Nisbet v. Smith,	781
Nith Commissioners, Young, &c. v.	991
Noble v. Noble,	74
North British Railway Company v. Lindsay,	168
North British Railway Company, Watson v.	637
North Knapdale, Inspector of, v. Commissioners of Caledonian Canal,	412
Norton's Executors v. Menzies,	1151
Oliver's Trustees, Petitioners,	639
Park v. Park,	850
Pattison, &c., Batchelor v.	914, 1086
Pearson v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Company,	800
Peebles, Craig v.	441
Perth Police Commissioners, Pullar v.	1177
Phosphate Sewage Company v. Molleson, H. L. Cases, note,	79
Pitaligo, Heritors of, Presbytery of Deer v.	975
Polwarth, Riddell v.	879
Potter, Wilson, and Company, Miller and Company v.	105
Pullar v. Perth Police Commissioners,	1177
Rae, Johnston v.	879
Ramsay, &c., Blair v.	25
Reid's Trustees, Kirriemuir Police Commissioners v.	993
Renton's Trustees v. Alison, &c.	1142
Richardson, &c., Baroness Gray v.	1031
Riddell v. Lord Polwarth,	879
Robertson, John (Petitioner),	1104
Robertson, Joseph (Petitioner),	17

	Page
Robertson v. Adamson,	978
Robertson v. Brown,	652
Robertson v. Cockburn,	21
Robertson, M'Donald v.	645
Robertson v. Robertson,	274
Robertson's Curator,	619
Robinows and Marjoribanks v. Ewing's Trustees,	1134
Ross, Mackintosh v.	232
Ross, Skolfield, and Company v. State Line Steamship Company (Limited),	134
Roxburgh and Company v. Barlas,	288
Roxburghe, Duke of, &c. (Appellants),	728
Royal Bank, Clydesdale Bank v.	586
Rutherglen, Magistrates of, Thomson, &c. v.	451
St Cuthberts, Inspector of, &c., Inspector of City Parish v.	642
Sawyer, &c. v. Sloan,	271
Scott, Clippens Shale Oil Company v.	651
Scott, Valery v.	965
Scott's Executors v. Hepburn,	816
Scottish Heritable Security Company v. Allan, Campbell, and Company,	333
Scottish Widows' Fund v. Buist, &c.	1078
Sdeuard v. Gardner and Son,	577
Seafield, Earl of, Steuart v.	518
Shand, Petitioner,	544
Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees,	813
Simpson and Craig, Greig v.	642
Sinclair's Trustees, Lockyer v.	882
Sloan, Sawyer, &c. v.	271
Sloane v. Finlayson, &c.	678
Smith, Laing, and Company v. Maitland, &c.	281
Smith, Nisbet v.	781
Smith's Trustees, &c., Traill v.	770
Smyth v. Smyth,	573
Sneddon v. Mossend Iron Company,	868
Somers, Henderson v.	997
South Leith, Inspector of, &c., Inspector of City Parish v.	642
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees,	50
Stafford v. M'Laurin,	148
Stafford, M'Laurin v.	265
Stark, Davie v.	1114
State Line Steamship Company (Limited), Ross, Skolfield, and Company v.	134
Steele and Company v. Dixon, &c.	1003
Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners,	535
Steuart v. Earl of Seafield,	518
Steuart's Trustees v. Hart,	192
Stewart and M'Donald, Forgie v.	1149
Stow School Board, Lord Advocate v.	469
Sutherland v. Thomson,	485
Symington v. Symington,	205
Taylor, &c., Blair's Executors v.	362
Thom, &c. v. Macbeth, &c.	161
Thomson, &c. v. Greenock Harbour Trustees,	1194
Thomson, &c. v. Magistrates of Rutherglen,	451
Thomson, Sutherland v.	485
Thomson and Donaldson, Dudgeon v. (Suspension and Interdict),	604
Thomson and Donaldson, Dudgeon v. (Petition and Complaint),	974
Thurso Police Commissioners, Stephen v.	535
Torbain, Edinburgh Street Tramways Company v.	655

Page

Towill and Company v. British Agricultural Association, - - 117
Traill v. Smith's Trustees, &c. - - - - 770
Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars, - - - - 10

Ures, Beattie v. - - - - - - 634

Valery v. Scott, - - - - - - 965

Waddell v. Dundas, &c. - - - - - 361
Waddell, Wilsons v. - - - - - 288
Walker v. Presbytery of Arbroath, - - - - 498
Walker, Miller v. - - - - - - 242
Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow, - - - 1130
Wardrope v. Duke of Hamilton, - - - - 876
Watson v. North British Railway Company, - - - 637
White v. Munro, &c. - - - - - 1011
Whitehead, &c., Magistrates of Edinburgh v. - - - 663
Whitelaw, Petitioner, - - - - - 88
Wightman, Wright v. - - - - - 68
Wilson v. M'Genn and Company, - - - - 474
Wilson v. Mackie, - - - - - - 18
Wilson v. Mann, - - - - - - 527
Wilson v. Waddell, - - - - - 288
Wright v. Wightman, - - - - - 68

Young, &c. v. Nith Commissioners, - - - - 991

REGISTRATION CASES.

Campbell, Girvan v. - - - - - 1
Dodds, Hannah v. - - - - - - 7
Girvan v. Campbell, - - - - - 1
Hannah v. Dodds, - - - - - 7
King, Mackenzie v. - - - - - 8
Learmont v. Young, - - - - - 5
Mackenzie v. King, - - - - - 8
Young, Learmont v. - - - - - 5

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

	Page
Advocate, Lord, Simpson v.	22
Advocate, Lord, Wilson v.	1
Advocate, Lord, v. Wormald,	24
Advocate, Lord, Wormald v.	13
Arthur v. Peebles,	38
Barlas v. Chalmers,	26
Black v. Bradshaw,	18
Bradshaw, Black v.	18
Caldwell, Nixon v.	31
Chalmers, Barlas v.	26
Clendinnen v. Rodgers,	3
Donaldson v. Linton,	16
Edwards, Stewart v.	14
Grant v. Wright,	28
Kay v. Kelso Local Authority,	40
Laurie, M'Adam v.	20
Linton, Donaldson v.	16
Linton, M'Intyre v.	41
M'Adam v. Laurie,	20
M'Callum, Nicol v.	34
M'Intyre v. Linton,	41
Nicol v. M'Callum,	34
Nixon v. Caldwell,	34
Peebles, Arthur v.	38
Rodgers, Clendinnen v.	3
Simpson v. Lord Advocate,	22
Stewart v. Edwards,	14
Wilson v. Lord Advocate,	1
Wormald v. Lord Advocate (Bail),	13
Wormald, Lord Advocate v. (Indictment),	24
Wright, Grant v.	28

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

	Page
Advocate, Lord, Mackintosh v. - - - -	34
Aiton v. Stephen, &c. - - - - -	4
Anderston Foundry Company, Harrisons v. - - -	55
Barclay, Curle, and Company, Clyde Navigation Trustees v. - -	44
Blair, Ramsay, &c. v. - - - - -	41
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees, - - - -	16
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Company, - -	44
De Thoren v. Wall, - - - - -	28
Duncan v. Scott, - - - - - -	69
Harper, &c., Hutton, &c. v. - - - - -	9
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Company, - - -	55
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c. - - - - -	9
Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate, - - - -	34
Molleson, Phosphate Sewage Company v. - - -	77
Muir v. Thompson, - - - - -	1
Phosphate Sewage Company v. Molleson, - - -	77
Ramsay, &c. v. Blair, - - - - -	41
Scott, Duncan v. - - - - -	69
Stephen, &c., Aiton v. - - - - -	4
Thompson, Muir v. - - - - -	1
Wall, De Thoren v. - - - -	28

ERRATA.

P. 494, line 15 from foot, for difference as its differences, read difference as to its consequences.

P. 613, line 4, for Watson and Company, read Watson and Campbell.

P. 968, line 11 from foot, delete (supra, p. 604).

P. 974. At the beginning of the report of Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, supply (supra, p. 604).

P. 967. Transpose reference to Dig. 44, 7, 21, from line 35 to line 18.

P. 45 of House of Lords Cases, line 19 from foot, for opinion of the Lord Chancellor, read opinion of Lord Chelmsford.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1876.

No. 1.

Feb. 28, 1876.
Muir v. Thompson.

JOHN GEORGE MUIR (Defender), Appellant.—Robertson.
JOSEPH THOMPSON (Pursuer), Respondent.—Southgate, Q.C.—Shiress Will—Badenach Nicolson.

Mandate*—Writ—Erasure.—Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) (1) that mandates, bearing to be granted for a meeting of a parochial board to be held on 2d August, "or any subsequent date to which such meeting may be adjourned, for the election of an inspector of poor in room of," &c., were validly tendered, and ought to have been admitted at a meeting of the board held for that purpose on September 5th, although no meeting had been held on the 2d August; (2) that mandates bearing to be for a meeting to be held on August 16th were valid, although the figure "6" was printed on an erasure, from which the figure "5" had been removed.

(IN the Court of Session Nov. 30, 1871, 10 Macph. p. 178, 44 Scot. Jur. 107.)

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. O'Hagan.

Joseph Thompson brought this action of declarator and reduction against the Parochial Board of Inveresk, and against John George Muir, who had been declared duly elected inspector of poor and collector of poor-rates for that parish, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that the pursuer was duly elected inspector of poor and collector of poor-rates of said parish from and after the 5th September 1870, the date of a meeting of the parochial board at which he was duly and legally elected.

The pursuer, Thompson, maintained that the scrutiny committee had erroneously disallowed twelve votes tendered on his behalf on 5th September 1870, because the mandates were granted for a meeting to be held on 2d August 1870, or on any subsequent date to which said meeting might be adjourned. These mandates were partly written and partly printed, and were in the following terms:—"Sir,—You are hereby authorised to attend, vote, and act for me at a meeting of the parochial board of the parish of Inveresk, to be held on the 2d of August 1870, or any subsequent date to which said meeting may be adjourned, for the election of an inspector of poor and collector of poor-rates, in room of the late Mr Andrew Symons, with the same powers as belong to,—Sir, your most obedient servant,

"To ——"

In the course of a proof an objection was taken by the defender Muir to thirty-three mandates which had been used in favour of the pursuer, on the ground that the date of the meeting for which they bore to be granted was partly printed on an erasure. These mandates, which were printed, described the meeting as called for the election of an inspector of poor on 16th August, but the figure "6" had been printed on an erasure, from which the figure "5" had been removed.

No. 1.
Feb. 28, 1876.
Muir v. Thompson.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuer having reclaimed, the Second Division gave effect to the pursuer's objection to Muir's election, and at the same time repelled the defender's objection to the thirty-three mandates above given, and found that the pursuer had been duly elected.

Muir appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—There was an election to the office of inspector of poor in the parish of Inveresk, and the question arose in consequence of that election, whether the appellant (Muir) had been properly elected, his election being challenged by the respondent. Various objections were made to mandates tendered for the pursuer, and two have now fallen to be considered by your Lordships. Those two objections concern, one of them twelve mandates and proxies, and the other thirty-three mandates, given by certain persons qualified to vote at that election.

The objection to the twelve mandates was this: They were granted in point of form authorising the mandatary to attend, vote, and act for the person giving the mandate, "at a meeting of the parochial board of the parish of Inveresk, to be held on the 2d of August 1870, or any subsequent date to which the said meeting may be adjourned, for the election of an inspector of poor and collector of poor-rates in room of the late Mr Andrew Symons, with the same powers" as belonged to the person signing the mandate. My Lords, the persons holding twelve of these mandates attended a meeting for the election of an inspector of poor and collector of poor-rates in the room of Symons, in 1870; they attended the only meeting held for that purpose in that or any other year, and they voted at that meeting. But the meeting was not held and was not intended to be held upon the 2d of August 1870, and therefore it could not be adjourned from the 2d August to any subsequent day. It was held upon a subsequent day in August. It was adjourned to a day in September, and the business was concluded in September. The objection is that the mention of the date of the 2d August 1870 being an error, made it impossible for the mandatary to exercise his powers on the right day in August on which the meeting was held.

I have no doubt that when any case comes before your Lordships or any Court in Scotland in which any departure from a mandate, in anything which is essential or can alter the rights of the parties, is shewn, it will be held that such a departure invalidates the use which has been made of the mandate. But the question here is, Is there any departure from the mandate in anything which can be essential? Your Lordships invited the learned counsel at the bar to point out any matter in respect of which this error of date could have led to any evil consequence. I submit to your Lordships that this is an instance of what is termed in law falsa demonstratio. There is an error in the date which is corrected by the other parts of the mandate—the mandate pointing out in a way which could not be mistaken what the meeting was to be held for, and what the business was which the meeting was to transact. The object of the meeting was such that only one meeting could be held for the purpose.

No. 1.
Feb. 28, 1876.
Muir v. Thompson.

There could therefore be no doubt or uncertainty as to the meeting at which the mandatary was to act. If that is so, if there is what Lord Bacon, I think, calls præsentia corporis as it were, the collateral error is immaterial; the certainty is gained by the description of the purpose for which the meeting was to be held. If that is so, I think your Lordships may well reject any error, if it be an error, in regard to the date, and hold that there is a certainty of the meeting, and that in point of fact the mandate was exercised at the meeting at which it was intended to be exercised.

The other thirty-three mandates were subjected to an objection of a different kind. They were mandates in print, and the printer had, in the first instance, printed them with the date of, I think, the 15th of August 1870. That was an error of date; it ought to have been the 16th, and the figure 5 was erased by some process, and over and on the space where the 5 stood there was printed by type 6 in the place of 5. Now, my Lords, if it stood there without any evidence—that is to say, if your Lordships had had to deal with a case where there were a number of mandates all in print, and all with the same alterations made in this way upon them—I should myself have been clearly of opinion that the reasonable and natural presumption was that that alteration was made before the documents issued from the printer's hands, and before therefore they were used—before the person giving the mandate handed it to the mandatary. That, I think, would be the natural conclusion to be drawn under the circumstances. If you have got a document in print which has been altered afterwards in writing, inasmuch as writing may be placed upon it at any time, it may be doubtful at what time the writing was put there, and the presumption may perhaps be that it was put there after the document left the printer's hands. But it is quite different where you find that the alteration is a typographical alteration, as to which the more natural presumption is that it was made in the place where alone types are to be found, namely, at the printer's.

But your Lordships need not decide that question here, for you have the evidence of the printer, and the printer tells you that it was he who made the alteration, and that he made it as part of the business or job with which he was charged, and that after having made it he gave out the mandates to be used. Therefore your Lordships have nothing more than this: A printed document in which there has been an alteration in print made before the document has been used, or as we say, executed, before the person putting it in circulation handed it to the mandatary. That being so, my Lords, I am at a loss to conceive what possible vice there is in the fact of an alteration having been made under these circumstances.

I therefore think that the Court below were perfectly right in the conclusion they arrived at, as well with regard to the thirty-three as to the twelve mandates, and that there is no ground whatever for this appeal, which I am bound to say is so minute in its nature, and proceeds upon a point of so little foundation, that one cannot but regret that such a case has been brought to your Lordships' House.

Lord Chelmsford, Lord Hatherley, and Lord O'Hagan concurred.

Judgment affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Andrew Gillman, Westminster—W. K. Thwaites, S.S.C.—Connell & Hope, Westminster—Gillespie & Paterson, W.S.

No. 2.

Feb. 28, 1876.
Aiton v.
Stephen, &c.

WILLIAM AITON (Respondent), Appellant.—Southgate, Q.C.—Murphy, Q.C.
WILLIAM STEPHEN AND OTHERS (Complainers), Respondents.—
Cotton, Q.C.—Pearson, Q.C.—W. A. Brown.

Property—Harbour—Statute—Private Act—Right to Beach Boats.—The fishermen of the sea-coast village of B had from time immemorial laid up their boats for the winter on certain ground belonging to the proprietor of the village, to whom they paid a rent (which from an early period was £1, 17s. 6d.), for their houses and certain other privileges, the right of laying up the boats not being specified in the agreements. In 1845 the proprietor obtained an Act of Parliament for the improvement of the harbour of the village, which authorised him to levy dues on all vessels entering the harbour,—and "on all boats laid up at B for the winter season, 5s." He subsequently charged 5s. from each fisherman on that account, the rent being diminished to that extent. The same system was for some years continued by a new proprietor who purchased the estate in 1865. In 1874 he asserted a right to exclude the fishermen from the ground. In a suspension and interdict brought against him by the fishermen, held (aff judgment of the First Division) that they were entitled to the use of the ground for laying up their boats on payment of 5s. until the proprietor provided them with another safe and suitable place, in respect that the Act, in authorising the proprietor to levy dues, had by implication imposed a corresponding obligation to provide accommodation for the fishermen laying up their boats.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Lord Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. O'Hagan.

(IN the Court of Session 27th February 1875, ante, vol. ii., p 470.)

This was a suspension by William Stephen and others, fishermen, residing in Boddam, a village on the coast of Aberdeenshire, as individuals, and also as a committee elected by the fishermen of Boddam for transacting the fishing affairs of the village of Boddam, against William Aiton of Boddam. The prayer, as amended in the Inner-House, was to interdict the respondent "from troubling, molesting, or interfering in any way with the complainers and the other fishermen belonging to the village of Boddam, in laying up for the winter season, beaching, or taking their boats above high-water mark at or near the harbour of Boddam, upon the ground coloured blue and green in the plan or sketch herewith produced, . . . on payment of five shillings for each boat," in terms of schedule A appended to the Act 8 and 9 Vict., cap. xxv.

The complainers averred that prior to 1845 the fishermen of Boddam had been from time immemorial in use to beach their boats on the ground in question, and that their right to do so was expressly recognised by an Act of Parliament passed in that year for the improvement of the harbour of Boddam, and that the proprietor now refused to allow boats to be beached on the ground in question,

They pleaded;—(1) The acts complained of being a violation of the rights possessed by the complainers at common law and enjoyed by them for immemorial time they are entitled to suspension and interdict as craved. (2) The complainers are entitled to be protected in the exercise of their right to beach their boats on the ground in question in respect of the provisions of the Act 8 and 9 Vict., c. xxv.—(local and personal Acts declared to be public, and to be judicially noticed).

A proof was led the import of which is given in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Ordinary (Curriehill), on 10th December 1874 refused the suspension.

The complainers having reclaimed the First Division pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the complainers are entitled to the use of the ground in dispute for laying up or beaching their boats in the winter season on payment to the respondent of 5s. for each boat so laid up or beached, and this so long as the respondent shall not have provided other safe and suitable accommodation for that purpose, either within the limits of the works proposed to be executed or completed by him under the Act of Parliament 8 and 9 Victoria, chapter xxv., or elsewhere at Boddam; and to this extent and effect sustain the first and second pleas in law for the complainers: Interdict, prohibit, and discharge, in terms of the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict as amended, and decern: Find the complainers entitled to expenses," &c.

No. 2.

Feb. 28, 1876.
Aiton v. Stephen, &c.

The respondent appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In the year 1845 the village of Boddam, on the east or north-east coast of Aberdeenshire, was owned by the Earl of Aberdeen. It had previously belonged to a Mrs Robertson Gordon, and before her to a Mr Robertson. It was a small fishing village, where a small but increasing herring fishery had been carried on. The herring fishery was carried on by fishermen who lived in the cottages composing the village, and your Lordships find that these cottages were let during the time of Mr Robertson on leases for twenty-one years, by which Mr Robertson agreed to let for twenty-one years the houses and yards possessed by the fishermen whose names were subscribed, "as presently possessed by them, and also of the scalps within the flood-mark for laying down their mussels and other bait, and also with the privileges of roads and accesses and of the rocks for laying down and winning their fish, as presently enjoyed by them." Then, under the second head there was a provision that the rent was to be £1, 5s. a-year for the first ten years, and £1, 7s. 6d. "for the next eleven years, in name of rent or tack-duty," "and in the event of the herring fishery being carried on at Boddam during the said lease they agree to pay for each boat employed on the said fishery the one half the same rates and duties as may be payable at the time for the herring boats employed at Peterhead."

Later than this the lease for twenty-one years was extended by Mrs Robertson Gordon, who appears to have succeeded Mr Robertson. In the extended leases a term or holding of seven years was added to the original term, and a rent was laid upon the fishermen of 10s. in addition to the £1, 7s. 6d. which had been imposed by the first lease, so that the total rent became £1, 17s. 6d. And the third head of that tack ran in these words—"The said fishermen shall have right during the currency of the said lease to use the said pier or breakwater, and harbour and beach enclosed thereby, as well as the present harbour at Boddam, for the purpose of the herring fishing as well as for the white fishing, as occasion may require, without any dues being chargeable on them for their herring boats and other boats employed at the said fisheries at Boddam, and the said fishermen shall also have power to land thereat any description of goods and merchandise which they may have occasion to import, each for his own domestic purposes;" so that your Lordships observe that the rent being raised to £1, 17s. 6d. there was a stipulation for the use of the "harbour and beach enclosed thereby," whatever that might mean, "as well as the present harbour," that is, any additional harbour as well as the present, for the purposes of herring fishing, the sum stipulated to be paid, namely £1, 17s. 6d., being made to include any dues chargeable upon the fishermen for their herring boats and other boats employed in the fisheries. That was the state of things upon the second instrument of tack or lease which is before your Lordships.

Then, Lord Aberdeen became, as I have said, the owner, and the habit and use at this time of the fishermen is described in the evidence in the case. I will refer your Lordships to one witness, whose evidence will be sufficient for the present purpose, Andrew Stephen, who seems to be one of a family of Stephen brothers who are fishermen at Boddam. He is referred to a map upon which two spaces of ground coloured blue and green are marked, which are the spaces of ground in dispute in the present proceedings. He says—"I see them;" "as far back as I remember there was no road there, and we beached our boats both on the blue and green ground." Lower down he says—"From the earliest time I remember we have been in the habit of drawing up our boats both on the blue and the green." Then further on he says—"I have never known the green and blue spaces used for any other purpose except beaching boats."

No. 2.
Feb. 28, 1876.
Aiton v. Stephen, &c.

Now, that being the state of things—a herring fishery existing at Boddam, where the fishermen are provided with residences in and about the village, and hold those residencces under tacks which fix a certain rent, to include all dues connected with the fishery, and their habit and use being to beach their boats in the winter season, when their boats cannot be left in the water, but must be beached somewhere, upon the two pieces of ground coloured blue and green—that, I say, being the state of things in 1844 and 1845, your Lordships will now turn to what took place in the latter of those years. In the year 1845 the Earl of Aberdeen came to Parliament for the purpose of obtaining an Act, which, in the first instance, assumed the shape of a private bill, but which was the foundation of an Act declared to be public, and which must be judicially noticed as such, and must have all the operation of a public Act. In truth, when your Lordships look at this public Act, you find that it is an Act of the most comprehensive kind, establishing a public harbour, authorising tolls to be taken, and containing every clause which would be enacted with reference to the largest harbour in the kingdom. It provides for the entrance of foreign vessels, the dues to be taken from foreign vessels, the respecting, with regard to foreign vessels, of the rights and obligations of our treaties with foreign states; it authorises by-laws to be made and penalties levied; and in fact, as I have said, it forms a complete code for the regulation of a public harbour.

The preamble or introduction of that Act stated that Lord Aberdeen was the heritable proprietor of the village of Boddam, and "of the harbour or port of Boddam, and the piers and works therewith connected," and that "it would be of great advantage to the public, and especially to those using the said harbour, if the same were to be improved by deepening and enlarging the said harbour and the entrances and approaches thereto, and by extending the said pier and forming a breakwater; and whereas the said Earl and his predecessors, proprietors of the said village, have from time to time expended considerable sums in erecting the present piers and otherwise forming the said harbour," and the Earl was willing to make the improvements at his own expense, and in consideration of the expense which the Earl had already incurred and would incur in making these improvements, it was reasonable "that the Earl and his successors should receive the tolls, rates, and dues hereinafter mentioned." Then it stated that a map or plan had been deposited "describing the lines, levels, and situation of the harbour and the proposed breakwater and other works, and of the lands" on which they were to be executed. Where works had to be executed, of course it was necessary to describe them and to indicate the land upon which they were to be executed. The third section provided that it should be lawful "for the Earl and his heirs and successors upon the lands described in the said plan and book of reference, and according to the provisions herein contained, at such times and in such manner as he and they may judge proper, to make and execute the improvements and works in the said harbour, and erect and construct the pier and breakwater therein according to the lines delineated on the plan, "together with the excavations and all other works connected therewith, and also to make, build, alter, repair, and maintain within the limits aforesaid such quays, shores, piers, jetties, landing-places, and other works, and such approaches, roads, retaining-walls and embankments, and other works therewith connected, as he or they may think necessary for the purposes of said harbour." Therefore there was power given, not merely to execute particular works where the face of nature had to be changed, but also to connect with those structural changes conveniences and approaches, and such other accommodation as might be found to be necessary for the purpose in view. And then the 7th section provided that the Earl might "demand and receive for every vessel which shall enter within the limits of the harbour any sum not exceeding the several rates and duties on tonnage specified in the schedule (A)." When your Lordships turn to schedule (A) you find that it is divided into two or three parts,—the first relating to "tonnage duties," which are specially mentioned; the second relating to "herring boats"—"For all herring boats engaged at the fishery at Boddam for the period of their fishing season, in lieu of all tonnage duties payable for such herring boats," so much. And then the third head is—"For all boats laid up at Boddam for the winter season, 5s."

Now, my Lords in the first place, some question was raised with regard to the meaning of the words "laid up," but I think your Lordships cannot be of opinion that any controversy is possible as to the meaning of those words. In the first place, there is no evidence whatever that they have any meaning other than that which is assigned to them by the respondents here, namely, beached. In the second place, you have the admission of the appellant himself that it is impossible that herring-boats can be safely dealt with during the winter months except by "beaching." Therefore the laying up for the winter would mean beaching. But in addition to that your Lordships have the best possible testimony, ante litem motam, both from Lord Aberdeen and from the appellant himself. In the case for Lord Aberdeen you find that in the conditions he issued to the tenants he used the term beaching as a term which properly described the work of laying up for which the toll or duty of 5s. was to be exacted. Therefore your Lordships will read the schedule as if it provided a fee of 5s. for the beaching of every boat that should be beached at Boddam in the winter season.

That being the nature of the Act of Parliament, and the provision it contains with regard to toll, what is the consequence of it? Your Lordships have this state of things,—There was at the time the Act passed a herring fishery at Boddam; it was conducted by fishermen living in cottages provided by the proprietor, and paying a gross, or as it is termed a "slump sum," for the cottage and for all the privileges which they had as fishermen. Then you have the Act of Parliament, which takes notice of that state of things, indicating the advantage to be derived from improving the harbour for, among other things, the purpose of the herring fishery; and then you have the person who is willing to undertake that work, who appeals to the Legislature for power to levy tolls as a remuneration for the work he was about to undertake—you have him stating that he asks for permission to charge a duty upon every herring boat engaged in the fishing for the privilege of passing in and out of the harbour, and also another duty of 5s. for every boat of that kind beached for the winter season; and he is the proprietor of the beach, and on that beach there are two places which at that very time were used for the purpose of beaching the boats of these herring fishermen. My Lords, is it to be heard that after this that person, who has obtained this Act of Parliament, or any person claiming under title from him, is to come before a Court of law and say—It is true that I obtained these powers; it is true that I made this representation to Parliament; it is true that the herring fishery cannot be conducted unless the fishermen have the accommodation of laying up their boats upon the beach during the winter; it is true that I represented to Parliament that if the Leglislature would allow me to charge 5s. for every boat beached I would maintain this station as a herring fishery; but now I claim to continue to charge during the herring season a toll for a boat coming in and out of the harbour, but I refuse to allow that boat that which I admit is an indispensable condition of its existence as a boat pursuing the herring fishery, namely, the accommodation of beaching itself upon the beach which belongs to me, and for which beaching I was authorised by Parliament to take a particular toll? My Lords, if that can be done, the whole Act can be overthrown. The same person may say—I will not allow any boat to come into the harbour; or he may say, I will allow boats of a particular tonnage or belonging to a particular nation to come in; I will pick and choose; I will take such toll out of these mentioned in the Act as is convenient to me, and I will refuse any other accommodation mentioned in the Act; and I will contend that, provided I do not exact any other toll, I have no obligation to allow any other service to be given. My Lords, I apprehend that that would be quite fatal to the principle of an Act of this kind, and that your Lordships will lay down and maintain this rule—that any person soliciting an Act giving these high powers of charging tolls, does it upon the faith of having represented to the Legislature that he will provide the accommodation mentioned in the Act, and that while he exacts the toll, or is in a position to exact the toll, he cannot refuse the accommodation which is pointed out by the Act.

No. 2.
Feb. 28, 1876.
Aiton v. Stephen, &c.

A question might arise, but does not arise in this case, as to how far the tolls might be charged if the works, or those of them which would cost money, had not been actually executed as contemplated in the Act. That does not apply to the present case. Your Lordships have here to deal with a case where no work requires to be executed—where nothing requires to be done but to afford that amount of accommodation which the fishermen actually possessed at the time when the Act passed.

I need hardly add, although it fixes perhaps more distinctly the state of things which was in the contemplation of every one when this Act passed, that Lord Aberdeen himself after the Act passed, and after he had received from Parliament that which he had not before—a right of exacting a particular due for a particular service—addressed himself to altering the mode of paying the rent of £1, 17s. 6d. which before that time had been paid by these fishermen as a gross sum. He divided it in this way—he assigned £1, 2s. 6d. of it as the rent of the cottage which the fishermen occupied, and he assigned the residue of it as the equivalent of the duty, as made up of the various items of duty which he was authorised by the Act to exact. That only makes it more clear what Lord Aberdeen intended, and the opinion which he formed of his rights and obligations under the Act. He was of opinion that he was bound to supply the fishermen with the accommodation they had previously enjoyed for the purpose of beaching their boats, and that, on the other hand, he was armed by this Act of Parliament with the power of charging them the 5s. for the beaching,

No. 2.

Feb. 28, 1876.
Aiton v. Stephen, &c.

and that that 5s. was nothing more than what had previously been included in the gross sum which the fishermen had paid to him.

I therefore submit to your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Court of Session is entirely right. It fixes the obligation on the owner of the locus in quo of allowing the fishermen to use this ground for beaching their boats as long as he provides no other convenient and safe place for that purpose. It does not prevent his using this land for any other purpose if he provides another place which will be equally safe and convenient for the fishermen. I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD, LORD HATHERLEY, and LORD O'HAGAN concurred.

JUDGMENT affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—HOLMES & Co.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.

No. 3.

Mar. 9, 1876.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

REV. ROBERT SHAW HUTTON AND OTHERS (Pursuers), Appellants.—Lord-Adv. Gordon—Cotton, Q.C.

REV. ALEXANDER HARPER AND OTHERS (Defenders), Respondents.—Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C.—Gloag.

Church—Parish Quoad Sacra—Marriage—Proclamation of Banns.—Held (aff. judgment of the Court of Session) that the proclamation of banns was prescribed by the Church as a preliminary to the celebration of marriage in facie ecclesiæ, and that such proclamation was one of the functions and duties of the office of minister of a church erected into a parish church under the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, for the district attached thereto as a parish quoad sacra.

(IN the Court of Session July 7, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 893.)

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. O'Hagan.

The present action was raised by the Rev. R. S. Hutton, the minister of the parish of Cambusnethan, and other members of the kirk-session of that parish, and the session-clerk, "against the Rev. Alexander Harper, M.A., minister of the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, and others, constituting or claiming to constitute the kirk-session of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw," concluding for declarator "that the defenders are not, and that none of them is entitled to make proclamations of banns of marriages in the church of the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, or to cause or permit proclamations of banns of marriages to be made in the said church, or to demand, exact, or receive dues or fees in respect of such proclamations made in the said church, and that proclamations of the banns of marriages made in the church of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw have not been and are not legal or valid, but are, on the contrary, illegal and invalid."

On 30th January 1875 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) pronounced an interlocutor finding that the defenders were not entitled to make proclamations of banns in the church of the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw.

The defenders having reclaimed, the Second Division, with three consulted Judges (the Lord President, Lord Ardmillan, and Lord Mure), unanimously recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and sustained the defences.

The pursuers appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I cannot say that the very elaborate argument which your Lordships have heard at the bar has raised any doubt whatever in my mind as to the correctness of the decision of the Court of Session. I would remind your Lordships that we have here the unanimous opinion of the seven consulted Judges who met together to consider what should be the interlocutor

No. 3.

Mar. 9, 1876.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

of the Second Division of the Court of Session. No doubt the Lord Ordinary, for whom we entertain great respect, was of a different opinion, but I repeat that there was no dissension whatever between the seven consulted Judges.

The question is simply this: The district of Wishaw was disjoined from the parish of Cumbusnethan, and was constituted under an Act of Parliament, to which I shall have to refer, "a parish" or "district" "quoad sacra." I am using the words which are found in the Act of Parliament. The question is, Where are the banns of marriage to be published under these circumstances? If persons within the disjoined district are about to be married, and desire to have their banns published, are they to have them published in the kirk of the old parish, or in the kirk of the disjoined district? That depends upon the exact meaning to be given to the word "parish" and the other terms used in the Act of Parliament; but of course your Lordships cannot overlook the strong a priori probability that if persons are about to treat marriage as a religious ceremony (of course in Scotland it is not necessary that it should be so treated, but if they are about so to treat it), and comply with those regulations which prescribe publication of banns, any arrangement for the disjoining of a district would have carried with it the power and right to have banns under those circumstances published in the kirk where the persons who were about to be married were in the habit of attending, and the district where they resided.

But, we must put aside the a priori probability, and look exactly to what the Act of Parliament has said. Now, the Act of Parliament has provided that where the necessary preliminaries, which I shall not refer to, have taken place the Commissioners of Teinds are authorised to erect the new church "into a parish church in connection with the Church of Scotland, and to mark out and designate a district to be attached thereto quoad sacra, and to disjoin such district quoad sacra from the parish or parishes to which the same or any part thereof may have belonged or been attached, and to erect such district into a parish quoad sacra in connection with the Church of Scotland." My Lords, if the Act stopped here of course we should have to inquire what is the proper meaning to be assigned to those words "parish quoad sacra." But the Act does not stop there; it goes on to say, "and it shall and may be lawful for the minister and elders of such parish to have and enjoy the status, and all the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland." Now, the minister and the elders constitute together the kirk-session of the parish, and it is admitted that the disjoined parish is to have a kirk-session. The kirk-session therefore is to have all the powers, rights, and privileges which a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland have. These words of course must mean not with reference to the whole of Scotland, but with reference to the disjoined parish, and therefore your Lordships have here an enactment that the disjoined parish shall have a kirk-session, and that that kirk-session shall have in the disjoined parish all the rights of any parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland in any parish.

It is not denied, even if we stopped here, that one of the rights and one of the duties of a kirk-session is to require the publication of banns, and by the discipline of the Church to insist upon and enforce the publication of banns. Therefore your Lordships have to ask this question, in the face of the general words which I have read, and in the face of an Act of Parliament which says that the parish minister and elders of this disjoined parish shall have all the rights of the parish minister and elders of a parish in Scotland—What reason is there for taking out of those general words the right connected with the enforcing of the publication of banns, and for saying, that whereas the Act of Parliament says that the kirk-session shall have all rights, your Lordships are to interpret that Act as meaning that the kirk-session shall have all rights minus this important right of enforcing the publication of banns?

But let me go a step further, and ask your Lordships whether the publication of banns does not come under the words quoad sacra, and is not one of the rights which in Scotland would be termed inter sacra. Now, your Lordships have not here to consider by any abstract standard what things should be called sacra and what things profane. What we have to inquire is, what has been considered in the Kirk of Scotland inter sacra? And let us put aside altogether any question of civil enactment and turn to the law of the Kirk alone, commencing from the earliest times—commencing with the Book of Discipline as it is called, although we might commence earlier. Commencing with the Book of Discipline of the year 1560, and going down from the Book of Discipline through the different Acts of Assembly, your Lordships have a regular course of Church legislation requiring publicity with regard to marriages, requiring the publication of banns through the medium of the kirk-session, and visiting with the discipline of the Church those persons, whether laity or ministers, who should disregard the discipline of the Church in that respect. My Lords, if that be so—if, putting aside all questions of civil enactment, your Lordships find the enactments of the Church consistent throughout the period to which I have referred in requiring the publication of banns—I ask, is not the publication of banns part of the discipline of the Church? The Church went on also to require originally the marriage to be celebrated by a minister of the Established Kirk. That requirement, at all events as regards the effect of neglecting it, was afterwards modified by civil enactment, to which I shall afterwards refer; but, in the first instance, your Lordships have the consistent law of the Church requiring the publication of banns and the marriage by the minister. It appears to me impossible to say after that that the publication of banns is not part of the discipline of the Church, and if it be part of the discipline of the Church is it not a thing which comes under those words used in the language of the Church "inter sacra"? It appears to me that it is clearly to be considered as part of those things which have been called inter sacra by the Church.

Then, my Lords, it is said that the publication of banns has been regulated or in some way dealt with by civil enactments. But, my Lords, in what way has it been dealt with? The Act of 1661—the Act of Charles the Second—states by way of preamble that "Our Sovereign Lord and the Estates of this present Parliament, considering how necessary it is that no marriage be celebrated but according to the laudable order and constitution of this Kirk," that is to say, of the Kirk of the realm, and yet that persons "do procure themselves to be married and are married either in a clandestine way, contrary to the established order of the Kirk, or by Jesuits, priests," "or any other not authorised by this Kirk," therefore His Majesty, upon the advice of the Estates, "ordains that whatsoever person or persons shall hereafter marry or procure themselves to be married in any clandestine and inorderly way, or by Jesuits, priests, or any other not authorised by this Kirk, that they shall be imprisoned." Therefore your Lordships observe that the civil enactment refers to the order and the discipline of the Church, and brings to bear the weight of civil authority, not in support of some independent enactment of its own, but of that which at that time is recognised and referred to as the law and the order of the Kirk.

No. 3.

Mar. 9, 1876.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

It might have been said—it might be said at the present day—the state will recognise in Scotland no marriage but a marriage performed by a religious ceremony, and according to the order either of the Kirk of Scotland or any religious denomination in Scotland. But, my Lords, if the state thought fit to say so, would that alter the nature of the marriage? Would it make it cease to be a religious cermony? Clearly not. On the contrary, it would be the strongest affirmation by the state that it was a religious ceremony. And so here your Lordships have the Act of 1661 pointing to the religious ceremony and that which preceded it, the marriage according to what then was the order of the Kirk, and the publication of the banns, which was required as a preliminary, as that which was to be complied with and to be enforced through this Act of Parliament. My Lords, it appears to me that neither this Act nor any which followed it in the slightest degree alters the nature of the publication of the banns by merely enacting that the law of the Church shall be complied with.

My Lords, that really is the whole of this case. But for the elaborate argument which your Lordships have heard, I should have been well content to say that I concur with every word which has been expressed in the Court below, and I particularly refer to the very concise and pointed judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk,* which appears to me to exhaust entirely the whole of the case.

* The following is the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk referred to:—

"I have arrived at the same conclusion, upon two simple grounds. The first is, that a parish erected quoad sacra, under 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, has within itself all that is necessary pertaining to the government, order, and discipline of the Church of Scotland within that territory. A parish quoad sacra has its own kirk-session, and within the territory of the parish they have the full powers of discipline of any other kirk-session in any other parish. Independently of that general rule, the terms of the Act of Parliament are quite precise that the minister and elders of the quoad sacra parish shall have and enjoy the status, powers, rights and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland.

"Now, this is not a matter in which it is necessary at all to draw the line between civil and spiritual matters, but what is clear is that the right of discipline and the obligation to look after the discipline of the Church within the territory is devolved upon the kirk-session of a quoad sacra parish in the same way and to the same effect as upon any other kirk-session of the Church.

"The next and only real question is—Is the proclamation of banns part of the discipline of the Church? On that matter, either on principle or historically, there is not the smallest doubt. If the proclamation of banns be prescribed by the authority of the Church, and the object for its prescription be the discipline of the parish, then there can be no question that this is a matter which devolves on the kirk-session of a quoad sacra parish as it does on the kirk-session of any other parish.

"Now, I do not mean to say that the proclamation of banns in itself is a matter either ecclesiastical or spiritual. It is in itself a matter indifferent. It would be no breach of the distinction between civil and spiritual if the Legislature were to pass an Act regulating the matter of the proclamation of banns absolutely as a civil arrangement, just as they have passed an Act regulating the registration of births, although there was before and by the very same authority a very precise provision for the registration of baptisms by the kirk-session. These are matters, I say, indifferent in themselves. But the question is, whether the proclamation of banns was prescribed by the Church for the purpose of discipline, and not merely enacted by it for purposes of social order? The first Book of Discipline is quite precise on this matter. That was the very first statement of the principles of the Reformed Church of Scotland, and Knox himself was a party to it. It was followed by a complete succession of Acts of Assembly, going through the whole of the seventeenth and part of the eighteenth centuries, the last of which was the Act of 1784, putting an end to the abuse of the session-

No. 3.

Mar. 9, 1876.

Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

I therefore submit to your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed against should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The question upon this appeal is—Whether the parish of Wishaw, having been regularly erected as a quoad sacra parish, the minister and elders thereof are entitled to make proclamations of banns of marriages in the church, and to receive dues or fees in respect of such proclamations.

By the 7th and 8th Vict. c. 44, sec. 8, it is enacted that the minister and elders of a quoad sacra parish shall have and enjoy all the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland. The House has therefore to determine what is the power of a minister and elders of a parish in Scotland in respect to the publications of banns of marriage. The duty of publishing banns is attached to the office of clerk of the kirk-session, and the due publication of the banns must be certified by him, his certificate not being traversable. The question is, whether all this is done by the sole authority of the clerk of the kirk-session, and without his requiring any sanction enabling him to perform these duties.

The Lord Ordinary, answering the argument of the defenders, is of opinion that they are mistaken in supposing that the power to proclaim banns is one of the rights and privileges of the minister and elders of a quoad sacra parish. I may observe that the question is not here quite accurately described, as the important word "powers" is omitted, and it is confined to the other words "rights and privileges." The Lord Ordinary thinks it is "no part of a parish minister or an elder's duty to make proclamation of banns. It is the duty of the session-clerk of the parish to do so, or to get this done by the precentor."

The Lord President expresses his surprise at this part of the note of the Lord Ordinary, and says—"It is quite true, so far, that a certificate by the clerk of the kirk-session is the proper legal evidence of the proclamation having been clerk making proclamations without sufficient communication with the kirk-session. Whether the proclamation of banns be or be not part of the discipline of the Church is, I think, a matter that admits of no dispute. It does not relate in any way in words or in substance to the constitution of the contract of marriage. It refers to the solemnisation or celebration of the marriage, and that is a matter in which the Church takes an interest, and in which the Church prescribes the necessary rules. Stewart of Pardovan says, upon the 18th article of the 13th chapter of the 'Scotch Church Discipline,' which is very frequently referred to in his work, 'Those who live in places where the usual exercise of religion is not established may cause their banns to be published in Romish Churches, inasmuch as the matter is part of the political nature.' And the reason of that is quite plain. It has nothing in itself spiritual, but is of a political nature. And, apparently, the French Church were willing to accept proclamation of banns in Popish Churches where there were no Protestant Churches where it could be made. That does not in the least interfere with the discipline of the Church. On the marriage of Scotch persons in England and Ireland banns are proclaimed in Scotland, else the marriage will be against the order of the Kirk, and Pardovan says the parties should be rebuked. 'There is no doubt that they should be rebuked as unnecessary transgressors of a very comely and rational church order.' I do not think that the nature of the thing can be better expressed. As to the statute 1661 I read it in an opposite sense altogether from that adopted by Pardovan. Instead of being a superseding of the Church in the matter of proclamation of banns it gives it a stronger confirmation by attaching penalties to the disregard of it. Therefore, upon the whole matter, I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived, that the interlocutor reclaimed against should be altered, and the defender assoilzied."

No. 3.
Mar. 9, 1876.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

made, but that is because he is the servant of the kirk-session and acting under their authority and direction, and particularly acting under the authority and direction of the moderator of the kirk-session, with whom this matter is left by the only existing law on the subject. The minister is the party who is to authorise the proclamation of banns to be made." "And therefore I am humbly of opinion that everything is under the control and direction of the minister as regards the proclamation of banns."

According to the view which I have taken of the case it seems to me not essential to determine whether the publication of banns is inter civilia or inter sacra, because, whether it belongs to the one or other class, it is in my opinion equally within the power of the minister and the elders. But taking, as I do, the opinion of Lord Ardmillan as a correct description of the nature and character of the publication of the banns, it is clear that it must be regarded as a matter of ecclesiastical regulation. He says—"The proclamation of banns is a step of orderly procedure in the celebration of marriage by which religious sanction is given to the marriage." "It is not, I think, a step of civil procedure in the constitution of marriage, but a step of discipline in the orderly ecclesiastical procedure by which the Church gives sanction, seriousness, and solemnity to marriage as the most important and abiding of all human contracts."

But suppose it should be regarded as a mere civil proceeding, this would not advance the case of the appellants. At an early stage of the argument I put the question to the Lord Advocate, whether the clerk of the kirk-session could publish the banns by his own authority without the direction of the ministers and elders? and I received, as I expected, an answer in the negative, and this seemed to me at once to conclude the case against the appellants.

The correctness of the answer is proved by the Act of the General Assembly of 1784. By that Act the General Assembly resolved—"That no session-clerk in this Church proclaim any persons in order to marriage until he give intimation to the minister of the parish in a writing dated and subscribed by him, of the names, designations, and places of residence of the parties to be proclaimed, and obtain the said minister's leave to make the said proclamation." It follows that it is by the authority and direction of the minister, or of the minister and elders, that proclamation of banns can be made. Therefore this must be one of the powers possessed by the ministers and elders of the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw under the provisions of the Act of the 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44.

I agree that the interlocutor appealed from should be affirmed.

LORD HATHERLEY concurred.

LORD O'HAGAN.—In my opinion the decision of the Court of Session ought to be affirmed.

Under the statute a parish quoad sacra has been erected, and the first question is, Whether the publication of banns is to be considered as inter sacra, so as to put it under the direction of the ecclesiastical authorities of the parish so erected. I have no doubt that it is. The institution of banns was purely of ecclesiastical origin at an early period of the history of the Christian Church, and at that time, at all events, there could have been no question that it was to be held inter sacra. The civil state had nothing to do either with the creation or with the regulation of it. It has continued throughout Christendom always under Church control; and in Scotland we have it clearly shewn that it has remained so till the present hour. The obligation to publish was not cast upon the contracting parties by any statute of the realm, and its enforcement is effected by ecclesiastical censures, assisted to some extent by the civil power. The publication does not concern the constitution of the marriage, but it is made by ecclesiastical authority a proper preliminary to it for the avoidance of clandestinity and the prevention of fraud, and those who disobey it are properly described in a book of much authority as "transgressors of a very comely and rational Church order." All this being so, it seems to me plain that the usage so established and so kept in action is a part of the ecclesiastical discipline of the Scottish Kirk and must be numbered inter sacra, and that the parishioners of Wishaw must therefore publish their banns in there own parish church and not in any other.

No. 3.

Mar. 9, 1876.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

On this view alone the judgment we are considering is sufficiently sustainable. But even if that view were doubtful, the terms of the Act of the 7th and 8th Vict. c. 44, seem to me decisive of the question. When a parish quoad sacra is erected under that statute, the provision of the 8th section is—that "it shall and may be lawful for the minister and elders of such parish to have and enjoy the status and all the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland." Surely it is amongst the "powers, rights, and privileges" of the minister and elders of a Scottish parish to require and compel the parishioners to publish the banns of marriage according to the law of their Church. It is also amongst their duties and liabilities which their ecclesiastical superiors will oblige them to fulfil. The words of the section are general, and have no limitation either in any other portion of the Act or in the provisions of any code of discipline, or in the reason of the thing. And on this second ground, even if I doubted, as I do not, with reference to the first, I think the appellants' contention cannot be supported.

The argument from inconvenience is not to be lightly entertained, and never when construing a statute which is clear in its terms, and indicates unmistakeably the purpose of the Legislature. When the terms are obscure, and the purpose therefore more or less doubtful, it may help to a right understanding of them; and in the present case the respondents might fairly resort to it in aid if, on the points to which I have already adverted, their case was not impregnable. It is difficult to conceive that the object of the publication of banns being, in the words of Mr Erskine (Principles, i. 6), "to prevent bigamy and incestuous marriages," and to prevent them by inviting objections, which may prevent or defeat fraud and misrepresentation, it could have been intended to direct it in a parish other than that in which the contracting parties are resident, and where evidence might most easily be found of their actual status and relations with their neighbours. To require it to be made in a strange parish would be in opposition to the very object of the institution, and would nullify altogether its beneficial operation. To the parties it would be a hardship to be obliged to resort to a church other than that in which the marriage is to be celebrated; and to the public it would be a mischief, by depriving the subsequent celebration of the security and lawfulness which it would have derived from full local notice of the proposed contract, such as has been wisely contemplated by various denominations of the Christian Church.

My Lords, on these grounds I am clearly of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

JUDGMENT affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Westminster—W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.

No. 4. ALEXANDER BRAND'S TRUSTEES (Defenders), Appellants.—Pearson, Q.C.—Mackintosh.

Mar. 16, 1876. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees. ROBERT BRAND Junior's TRUSTEES (Pursuers), Respondents.—Cotton, Q.C.—Bryce.

Heritable and Moveable—Principal and Accessory—Lease—Heir and Executor.—Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division, and aff. judgment of Lord Shand) that when the tenant of minerals under a lease of ordinary duration erects upon the land fixed machinery for the purpose of working the minerals, such fixtures become partes soli, and pass with the subjects to the possession of the tenant's heir succeeding to the lease, in whom also the power of severance is vested during his tenancy.

Observations on the case of Fisher v. Dixon, March 6, 1843, 5 D. 775, 15 Scot. Jur. 394; H. of L., June 26, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 286, 17 Scot. Jur. 568.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. O'Hagan. Ld. Selborne.

(IN the Court of Session Dec. 19, 1874, ante, vol. ii. p. 258.)

Robert Brand senior, coalmaster, Wishaw, died on 26th January 1873, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees to manage and preserve the whole residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, for the use of his only son, Robert Brand junior, until he attained majority, when the whole residue was to be conveyed over to him.

The truster's son, Robert Brand junior, who was a minor at the date of his father's death, only survived his father a few months, and died unmarried on 3d July 1873, without having attained majority. He had, however, on 28th June 1873, executed a trust-disposition and settlement disposing of his whole means and estate to certain trustees.

Robert Brand junior was not served heir to his father.

The property of which Robert Brand senior died possessed included a nineteen years' lease of the coal and fire-clay on the estate of Coltness, of which eleven years still remained to run at his death, and the plant and machinery used in connection with the coal-pits which he had opened in the course of the lease, including the rails laid down for the conveyance of the minerals.

The heir of Robert Brand senior and Robert Brand junior, at the date of the death of the latter, was Alexander Brand, who, after completing a title by service to both, claimed the heritable property of Robert Brand senior, including the lease of the minerals on Coltness. Alexander Brand died on 5th November 1873, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement of his whole estate in favour of trustees.

The trust-settlement of Robert Brand junior having been executed by him in minority, and he having died without attaining majority, was ineffectual to convey heritage.

On 15th November 1873 the trustees of Robert Brand senior raised this action of mutiplepoinding to have all the questions arising out of the succession of Robert Brand senior settled.

An agreement was entered into between the trustees of Robert Brand senior, of the first part, the trustees of Alexander Brand, of the second part, and the trustees of Robert Brand junior, of the third part, whereby it was agreed (1) that the whole heritable property, including the mineral lease, should be made over to Alexander Brand's trustees; (2) that the residue of the moveable estate should be made over to Robert Brand junior's trustees; (5) that the whole plant and machinery of the colliery be made over to Alexander Brand's trustees, on the condition that if it should be found in the multiplepoinding that any portion thereof was moveable, and, as such, belonged to Robert Brand junior's trustees, the value thereof should be paid to them by Alexander Brand's trustees.

On 4th August 1874 the Lord Ordinary (Shand) pronounced the follow-

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876.
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

ing interlocutor in the competition between Alexander Brand's trustees and Robert Brand junior's trustees:—"Second, In regard to the machinery and plant, including rails, which belonged to the deceased Robert Brand senior, and were used by him at or in connection with the colliery held on lease by him from Mr Houldsworth, finds that the machinery and plant, and those parts thereof, are heritable, and belong to the trustees of the late Alexander Brand, which were attached, either directly or indirectly, by being joined to what is attached to the ground for use in connection with the working and carrying away of the minerals, though they may have been fixed only in such a manner as to be capable of being removed, either in their entire state or after being taken to pieces without material injury, including those loose articles which, though not physically attached to the fixed machinery and plant, are yet necessary for the working thereof, provided they be constructed and fitted so as to form parts of the particular machinery, and not to be equally capable of being applied in their existing state to other machinery of the kind."

Both parties reclaimed.

The Second Division pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the second finding of said interlocutor, and in lieu thereof find that all the machinery therein referred to is to be considered as moveable in a question as to the tenant's succession: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the same: Find the claimants, Alexander Brand's trustees, liable in expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decern."

Alexander Brand's trustees appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Your Lordships have now to dispose of this appeal, which was argued before your Lordships a few days since with very great ability; and I will, in the first instance, take the liberty of reminding your Lordships exactly how the question which has to be considered arises.

Robert Brand, the elder, was the lessee during his life of a colliery at Cambusnethan; he held it on a lease for nineteen years, beginning in 1867. When I say it was a lease of a colliery, it was in point of fact a lease of certain seams of coal, with a right of the ordinary description to occupy such portions of the surface as from time to time he might find necessary for the purpose of working the colliery; and then as he occupied portions of the surface, they were to be taken into account and rent paid for them at so much an acre.

Robert Brand, the lessee, died in 1873, having made a trust-disposition under which all his heritable and moveable property went to Robert Brand the younger, his son; and the lease being, as your Lordships are aware, by the law of Scotland, a heritable subject, would pass under the category of property which was heritable. Now, this Robert Brand the younger in his turn died, and he died under the age of twenty-one years. He made a disposition which, according to the law of Scotland, it has been assumed would carry his moveable property, but would not carry the heritable subjects. The appellants represent the heir of this Robert Brand the younger; the respondents, on the other hand, represent the trustees under the disposition to which I have referred.

The precise issue which arises in the present suit between these two parties is stated in certain articles of agreement which they entered into upon the various subjects which were in litigation between them. It was agreed, for a settlement ment of questions which had arisen between them, "first, that the whole heritable property, including the foresaid lease of the Greenhead Colliery, shall be assigned, conveyed, and made over by the first parties as trustees foresaid to the second parties as trustees foresaid,"—that is, it was agreed to assign and make over to the appellants the whole heritable property. In deciding under this agreement what is the heritable property, the question arose as to certain fixed machinery which had been set up by Robert Brand the elder, the original lessee. It was machinery of a description necessary for working the colliery, and it may be described for the present purpose, without going into further particulars, by saying that it was of the class ordinarily termed trade fixtures.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

The Lord Ordinary (Lord Shand), before whom the case first came, held that this machinery, which he described in a way to which I shall refer, passed along with the heritable subject, namely, the lease, to Robert Brand the younger as heritable, and therefore could not be alienated by him during his minority, and that in consequence it now belongs to the appellants. The manner in which Lord Shand describes this machinery your Lordships will find in his interlocutor:—"In regard to the machinery and plant, including rails, which belonged to the deceased Robert Brand senior, and were used by him at or in connection with the colliery held on lease by him from Mr Houldsworth, finds that the machinery and plant, and those parts thereof, are heritable, and belong to the trustees of the late Alexander Brand, which were attached either directly or indirectly by being joined to what is attached to the ground for use in connection with the working and carrying away of the minerals, though they may have been fixed only in such a manner as to be capable of being removed, either in their entire state or after being taken to pieces without material injury, including those loose articles which, though not physically attached to the fixed machinery and plant, are yet necessary for the working thereof, provided they be constructed and fitted so as to form parts of the particular machinery, and not to be equally capable of being applied in their existing state to other machinery of the kind." My Lords, these words are in fact taken from an order of your Lordships' House, made some time since in a case which came by appeal from Scotland, namely, Fisher v. Dixon,[1] and it may be assumed that they are words which correctly describe the character of fixed machinery, if the appellants are entitled to machinery of that kind.

From the decision of Lord Shand there was a reclaiming note, and the Second Division of the Court of Session recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and held in substance that this machinery did not belong to the appellants, but belonged to the respondents as trustees of the deed executed by the minor, upon the footing of the machinery being personalty or moveables. The Lords of Session having heard counsel, "recall the second finding of the said interlocutor, and in lieu thereof find that all the machinery therein referred to is to be considered as moveable in a question as to the tenant's succession;" that is to say, in the question as between the representatives of the tenant, the heir, on the one hand, and the executor on the other.

It is between those two different views that your Lordships have now to decide, and the argument before your Lordships has divided itself naturally into two parts. In the first place, there is the question whether this matter is not already covered by decision? and secondly, if not covered by decision, what, upon principle, ought to be the view taken of it by your Lordships?

With regard to decision, it was contended at your Lordships' bar, and it appears to have been the opinion of the Court of Session, that the case I have already mentioned, the case of Fisher v. Dixon, decided the question. Now, I have looked very carefully into that case, and I am certainly of opinion that it cannot be accepted as a decision upon this point. With regard to the issue in that case, and the decision upon it in the Court of Session, the question stands thus—There was a very large claim made as between the heir and executor of a certain person who owned very large property, upon which he had put up fixed machinery for the purpose of trade. No doubt the great question in the case was that which I have thus described, whether the heir of that person should have the machinery, or whether the executor should have it. But there was a further question, which appears in point of magnitude and the value of what was involved to have been comparatively a very minute one, as to what should be said of machinery upon certain property which the deceased had not been the owner of but had taken upon lease; and with regard to the machinery upon the property which was taken on lease there is no doubt that the decision of the Court of Session was in form, that it formed part of his executry, that is, it did not go to the heir.

[1] Supra, p. 16 (rubric).

But when your Lordships examine the circumstances under which the decision in Fisher v. Dixon was arrived at in the Court of Session your Lordships will find this remarkable fact. There was very great difference of opinion expressed upon the subject by the learned Judges. It did not form the staple and the principal part of their judgments, but the matter was referred to in a subsidiary part of the opinions which they expressed, and upon it, as I have said, there was very considerable difference of opinion. The finding of the Court of Session was in these terms:—"With regard to the 7th class in the said report" (which was the class of machinery upon the leasehold property), "erections made on subjects under leases by the late Mr Dixon, and which have been removed by the representatives at the termination of the said leases, find that these are moveable and subject to the claim of legitim on the part of the claimants." It appears, therefore, from this interlocutor, that the machinery had actually been removed by the respondents, the executors, at the termination of the leases, and at the time of the litigation it would seem to have been in their possession. Still, no doubt that finding would appear to have decided that the machinery was lawfully their property. But when your Lordships examine the case a little further you find in the opinion of the consulted Judges this important statement.[1] "And further, in so far as regards such subjects under lease, on which the late Mr Dixon, being the tenant only, made erections which he was entitled to remove at the end of the lease, which the respondent also admits may be included in the executry, we are of opinion that the Judges of the Second Division may now dispose of the two articles in the appendix to Mr Smith's report, articles 6 and 7, having regard to our former opinion, without farther opinion from us."

Looking, on the one hand, to the great divergence of opinion expressed by the Judges, and on the other to the final result of their deliberations as expressed in the opinion of the consulted Judges to which I have referred, I am quite unable to accept this as a deliberate decision of the Court of Session, that under the circumstances of the case the machinery upon the leasehold property belonging to the deceased would belong to the executor and not to the heir. It appears, I repeat, to have been a subsidiary and a minute point in the case, and the machinery upon the leasehold property appears ultimately to have been admitted by the heir to be properly included in the executry. So much, my Lords, for the decision of the Court of Session.

[1] 5 D. 839.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

When the case came to this House by way of appeal[1] the appellants were persons representing the executry and not the heir. Of course it was not for them to raise, and they did not raise, any question upon this point which had verbally been given by admission in their favour in the Court below. The respondents, who had presented no cross appeal, could not raise the question, and therefore the question did not fall in any way to be decided by your Lordships. Some expressions of opinion, not very distinct, in the report which we have of them, appear to have fallen from Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell, and to some extent from Lord Cottenham. I think it is unnecessary to put any precise construction upon those expressions, because, I repeat, the matter did not fall to be decided; but as far as I can gather from those expressions of opinion there certainly appears to have been an impression upon the mind of those noble and learned Lords that there might have been a question raised on the part of the respondent, which they rather commended him for not having raised by means of a cross appeal.

The case therefore not being, in my opinion, covered by any decision which has settled the law upon the subject, I have to proceed to look at it in point of principle. Looking at it in that way, I would remind your Lordships that there are with regard to matters of this kind, which are included under the comprehensive term of "fixtures," two general rules, a correct appreciation of which will, as it seems to me, go far to solve the whole difficulty in this case. My Lords, one of those rules is the general well-known rule that whatever is fixed to the freehold of land becomes part of the freehold or the inheritance. The other is quite a different and separate rule. Whatever once becomes part of the inheritance cannot be severed by a limited owner, whether he be owner for life or for years, without the commission of that which in the law of England is called waste, and which, according to the law both of England and Scotland, is undoubtedly an offence which can be restrained. Those, my Lords, are two rules—not one by way of exception to the other, but two rules standing consistently together. My Lords, an exception indeed, and a very important exception, has been made, not to the first of these rules, but to the second. To the first rule which I have stated to your Lordships there is, so far as I am aware, no exception whatever. That which is fixed to the inheritance becomes a part of the inheritance at the present day as much as it did in the earliest times. But to the second rule, namely, the irremovability of things fixed to the inheritance, there is undoubtedly ground for a very important exception. That exception has been established in favour of the fixtures which have been attached to the inheritance for the purpose of trade, and perhaps in a minor degree for the purpose of agriculture. But, I repeat, the exception is not to the first of these rules, but the exception is to the second. Under that exception a tenant who has fixed to the inheritance things for the purpose of trade has a certain power of severance and removal during the tenancy. What extent of removal the executor of one who is not a tenant, but is a complete owner of the inheritance, may have as against the heir, whether in point of fact he has any right of removal at all, or any right to take more than that which really and properly considered was never fixed to the inheritance, in a definite way, I need not stop to consider, because the case of Fisher v. Dixon has clearly decided, by the authority of your Lordships, that fixtures of the kind now before your Lordships cannot be removed by the executor of one who is complete owner of the inheritances.

[1] June 26, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 286, 17 Scot. Jur. 568.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876.
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

Therefore, your Lordships have, upon the one hand, the rule as laid down in the case of Fisher v. Dixon, that fixtures of the present kind cannot be removed by the executor as against the heir of the complete owner of the inheritance; and you have, on the other hand, the exception to which I have referred, that fixtures of this kind can be removed by the executor of a tenant or by the tenant himself as against the landlord during the course of the tenancy. But your Lordships have here to consider an intermediate case between those two. You have not to consider the case of the person who represents the entire inheritance, but you have to consider the case, not of the whole inheritance, but of a heritable subject, namely, a lease, which is heritable according to Scotch law, upon the ground included in which fixtures of the kind I have referred to have been erected; and you have to determine whether, the tenant having died, and the lease still continuing, and the lease having passed to the heir, the executor has as against that heir a right to remove those fixtures. My Lords, there is certainly no authority for saying that the executor can remove these fixtures as against the heir. In my opinion there is no principle in the rules which I have endeavoured to express which can warrant that right of removal. These things which I have termed fixtures are, ex hypothesi, annexed to the inheritance at the time of the death of the tenant. Thereupon the heritable subject, namely the lease, at once passes to his heir. What right has the executor, or how is that right founded, to come upon the heritable subject which has passed to the heir, and to strip it of those things which have become fixed to it? There is no doubt, ex hypothesi, a right to remove these fixtures as against the landlord; but who is the person to exercise that right? It is not a right in gross; it is not a right collateral to the ownership of the subject; it is a right which of necessity must be annexed to the ownership of the subject, and must be exercised by him who is the owner of the subject. But the owner of the subject is not the executor,—the owner of the subject is the heir; and therefore, as it seems to me, your Lordships are obliged to consider the persons to whom the subject itself has passed, and to hold the right which is annexed to that subject to be exercisable by that person, and by that person only.

Looking at it in another way, it is decided already by the case I have so frequently mentioned, Fisher v. Dixon, that the executor cannot remove these fixtures as against the owner of the whole of the heritable subject. Upon what principle therefore is it that he could remove the fixtures as against him who is the owner of a part of the heritable subject? My Lords, every reason which was advanced in the case of Fisher v. Dixon shewing how strained, how impossible, how inconvenient it would be that there should be a right to strip the inheritance of fixtures of this kind, put up for the better use of the inheritance, can equally be advanced against the inconvenience of stripping that which continues a heritable and enduring subject, and which is in the possession of the heir, of those things which are necessary for the convenient use of that subject.

Therefore my Lords, without pursuing the subject further, I submit to your Lordships that upon principle it is impossible to justify the right of the executors in this case.

When I look at the grounds of the decision in the Court of Session I find them expressed in the opinion of Lord Gifford. Those grounds are two. In the first place, Lord Gifford considers the subject to be already decided by the case of Fisher v. Dixon. I have ventured to express to your Lordships a contrary opinion upon that point. Then, on principle, Lord Gifford gives reasons for arriving at the same conclusion in these words,—"I take it to be perfectly fixed law, and it was not disputed on either side of the bar, that in leases of ordinary duration, where the tenant erects fixtures solely for the purpose of his trade, these trade fixtures remain his property, and cannot be claimed by the landlord as partes soli, as it is said they are moveable in a question between landlord and tenant. Syme v. Harvey[1] and other cases are illustrations of the application of this principle. Now, it humbly appears to me that if trade fixtures do not go to the landlord, they must of necessity remain the moveable property of the tenant, and must remain moveable quoad omnia."

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

This is the basis of the decision of Lord Gifford, and if this statement were correct I possibly should arrive at the same conclusion at which he has arrived. But there is, as it appears to me, a complete fallacy in this mode of stating the facts. Lord Gifford appears to assume that you are to determine at the moment the fixture is placed in the soil what is to be its destiny during the whole of the lease, and he asserts that it never becomes attached to the inheritance so as to be capable of being called a part of the inheritance—that it remains, quoad omnia, moveable, and amongst the moveables of the tenant. It appears to me that that is an error; it does become attached to the inheritance; it does become part of the inheritance; it does not remain a moveable quoad omnia; there does exist on the part of the tenant a right to remove that which has been thus fixed; but if he does not exercise that right it continues to be that which it became when it was first fixed,—namely, a part of the inheritance.

That disposes of the whole case, with the exception of an argument which was raised, but which I think your Lordships will not consider, namely, whether there might not be a question of distinction here as regards some of the articles brought upon the ground under the lease. It appears to me that no such question arises. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary raises no question of that kind. It follows the wording of the order of this House in the case of Fisher v. Dixon, and it speaks of those things which are either attached to the inheritance or attached to what is attached to the inheritance. It is only upon things of that kind that any order now made by your Lordships will operate, and no order that I shall propose to your Lordships will operate by treating any of this machinery as machinery destined to be attached to the inheritance.

Upon the whole, I would propose to your Lordships to restore the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and to give the appellants what they should have had in the Court of Session, the expenses of the reclaiming note, and, with that direction, to remit the case to the Court of Session.

Lord Chelmsford.—The question to be determined upon this appeal is, whether certain machinery used upon a colliery held under lease is moveable or heritable, belonging, if moveable, to the respondents as trustees and executors of Robert Brand junior, and, if heritable, to the appellants as trustees of Alexander Brand, the heir of Robert Brand junior, and of his father, Robert Brand senior.

The machinery in question was erected by Robert Brand senior for the purpose of working the colliery which he held under a lease for nineteen years. When the lease had eleven years to run Robert Brand senior died, having made a trust-disposition of all his estates, heritable and moveable, under which it is admitted that his only son, then a minor, took a vested interest in the lease and [1] Dec. 14, 1861, 24 D. 202, 34 Scot. Jur. 98.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876.
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

machinery. Robert Brand junior survived his father for a few months, and died before attaining majority. He left a settlement which proposed to dispose of all his estates, heritable and moveable. Being a minor at the time of the settlement, it could not operate upon such parts of the estate as were heritable. A leasehold by the law of Scotland being realty, the lease of the colliery fell to the heir of the settlor. Whether the machinery went also to the heir with the lease, or passed under the trust-disposition of Robert Brand junior, depends upon whether in a case of succession it is in its nature heritable or moveable.

A great part of the note of the Lord Ordinary, and of the judgment of the Court of Session, is employed in considering whether the question at issue between the parties had or had not been decided in the case of Fisher v. Dixon, first in the Court of Session, and afterwards upon appeal to this House. With respect to the decision of this House, the question of the right to fixtures erected for the purposes of trade upon a leasehold was not before it, there being no appeal against the interlocutor of the Court of Session upon that point.

I will not enter into an examination of the difference between the Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House, as to how the opinion of the Judges in Fisher v. Dixon upon the question are to be reckoned. Assuming that a majority of them were in favour of the judgment that the tenant's fixtures were moveable, there were circumstances connected with this finding which deprive it of much of its authority. The fixtures were of trifling value, and were therefore probably not much considered in the argument. This probability is greatly increased by the respondent having admitted, as stated by the consulted Judges (Bell's Appeal Cases, p. 343), that the fixtures in question must be included in the executry. It is quite true, as stated by Lord Gifford, that "in actually deciding a point of law the Court never do so upon mere admissions by counsel;" but where an admission is made, a Court is not likely to examine the point so closely as when it is contested and fully argued. It is necessary to advert to the conflicting opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Judges of the Inner-House as to the application of Fisher v. Dixon to this case, because Lord Gifford at the close of his judgment says he prefers to rest it mainly upon general doctrine, which he thinks is fixed by Fisher v. Dixon, "that a mere tenant's trade fixtures in an ordinary case are moveable quoad succession, and descend to the executors."

The law as to fixtures is the same in Scotland as in England. The meaning of the word is anything annexed to the freehold, that is, fastened to or connected with it, not in mere juxtaposition with the soil. Whatever is so annexed becomes part of the realty, and the person who was the owner of it when it was a chattel losses his property in it, which immediately vests in the owner of the soil, according to the maxim "Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit."

Such is the general law. But an exception has been long established in favour of a tenant erecting fixtures for the purposes of trade, allowing him the privilege of removing them during the continuance of the term. When he brings any chattel to be used in his trade and annexes it to the ground, it becomes a part of the freehold, but with a power as between himself and his landlord of bringing it back to the state of a chattel again by severing it from the soil. As the personal character of the chattel ceases when it is fixed to the freehold, it can never be revived as long as it continues so annexed.

A question between landlord and tenant as to fixtures can rarely arise except with regard to the description of those which the tenant claims the right to remove. But the present question is between heir and executor, and depends upon the character of the fixtures whether they are part of the realty or not. The lease itself is admittedly realty. The fixtures were annexed to the soil by the owner of that realty. If he had been owner in perpetuity there would have been no doubt that the fixtures would have been part of the inheritance. Can it make any difference that he was owner for a limited period? He was as absolute owner of the realty during that period as if he had had it for ever. The fixtures were annexed to the ground for use during the whole term of enjoyment of the heritable subject. There is nothing in the terminable character of the lease at different periods that can affect the question, for as long as it continues it preserves its heritable character. So, the power reserved to the landlord to purchase the machinery at the end of the lease, though it might interfere with the right of removal as against the landlord, cannot have the effect of changing the heritable character of the fixtures.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

Lord Gifford says,—"The only thing that can make the fixtures heritable is their annexation to the soil, but that would carry them to the landlord, to whom alone the soil belongs." But this is not quite accurate. The question arises at a time when the portion of the soil included in the lease of the colliery belongs to the lessee as owner of the realty as long as the term endures, and the landlord's right to the fixtures does not arise till the termination of the lease. Adverting also to an argument stated by him to have been used to prove the heritable character of the fixtures—that they were fixed to the lease so as to go with it to the tenant's heir, Lord Gifford observes,—"A lease is an incorporeal right, and it is difficult to follow what is meant by a fixture to a lease." If the argument was as represented it was certainly incorrect, for the machinery was not fixed to the lease, but to the subject of it, the colliery; nor do I comprehend what is meant by a lease being an incorporeal right. Leases may be of incorporeal as well as of corporeal hereditaments, but a lease itself is neither corporeal nor incorporeal.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is, that the lease of the colliery being realty, the annexation of machinery to the soil for the purpose of working it became an accessory to the principal subject, and partook of its character,—that Robert Brand junior might if he pleased have separated the fixtures from the soil, and so made them part of his personal estate; but not having done so, they, remaining attached to the ground, went as part of the realty to the trustees of Alexander Brand, the heir of Robert Brand junior.

I agree with my noble and learned friend that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord O'Hagan.—My Lords, this case has been argued on authority and on principle. For the respondents it was contended, and the contention is sustained by the judgment of Lord Gifford, speaking for himself and his colleagues in the Court of Session, that the point in it was decided by that Court in Fisher v. Dixon, 5 Dunlop, 775, in a final interlocutor, which was the subject of appeal to and affirmation by your Lordships' House. On the other hand, the appellant insists that the interlocutor in question is not decisive, as being in terms inconsistent with the reported opinions of the learned Judges who pronounced it, and to be accounted for only on the supposition that, in the single matter which affects the controversy before us, it was pronounced upon consent, so that in that matter it was not presented for decision here by the appeal, and was not in fact dealt with at all by the judgment of this House, and that, the question thus remaining open, it should have been on principle ruled against the respondents.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876.
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

Certainly the proceedings of the Court of Session in Fisher v. Dixon are affected with much obscurity, and difficult to be clearly understood. A great part of the conflicting judgments of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Gifford is occupied with an enumeration of the Judges who discussed and decided that case, and an elaborate detail of their individual opinions, with a view of shewing that the majority favoured the appellants and the respondents respectively. The Lord Ordinary comes to the conclusion that the greater number sustained the contention of the appellants. Lord Gifford reaches the very opposite conclusion, and declares his opinion to be that "the question has been decided" (the other way) "as authoritatively as any question can possibly be decided in Scotland, by a majority of the whole Court." It is odd that able men deliberately considering a series of judgments could have so entirely differed as to their import and effect; and it is hard to judge with confidence between them. But this I may say, inclining rather to the adoption of the view of the Lord Ordinary, that the irreconcileable antagonism of such eminent persons may perhaps justify your Lordships in refusing to acknowledge the conclusiveness of the judgments one way or the other, either in the Court of Session or in this House, as to the matter before you, and looking beyond them to the principles on which your own independent decision should be based. For myself I am content with this result, and I decline to criticise the numbers or to weigh judicial opinions which are open to such diversity of skilled construction.

Then, as to the interlocutor relied on by the respondents, it is no doubt unequivocal in its phraseology, and would be authoritative if the judgments which preceded it did not cast serious doubt upon it. But when this is so, and when, besides, we have clear proof that the respondent in Fisher v. Dixon admitted that the erections which he was entitled to remove at the end of the lease might be "included in the executry," being, as has been seen, of small appreciable value, we may, I think, concur with the Lord Ordinary even without holding, as he did, that the finding is directly contrary to the judgment of the majority of the Judges, that it proceeded upon admission, and does not increase the authority of the case. As to the appeal to the House of Lords, it is enough to say that the present question was not really raised by it. For the purpose of raising that question there should have been a cross appeal. As there was not, the House could not deal with it; and it will be seen on reference to its ruling that it carefully and expressly abstained from adjudicating on any point which it was not required to decide. So far as there is any indication of opinion by the learned Lords who heard the appeal, it is given in favour of the appellant here by Lord Campbell, when he repudiates the distinction "attempted to be made between leasehold and freehold," which he holds entirely to fail "when we bear in mind that by the law of Scotland the leasehold is realty and goes to the heir."

I have satisfied myself, although I had some doubt on the matter at one stage of the argument, that the question in this case is open and unconcluded by authority, and although I cannot accept the appellant's representation that the judgments in Fisher v. Dixon are decisive in his favour, I think that on principle he is entitled to succeed, and that the machinery, dealt with by the Lord Ordinary in a very careful and guarded manner goes to the heir and not to the executors. I can add little to the reasons which your Lordships have already heard in support of this opinion, but the case is important, and I shall add a few words.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

There has been no dispute about the law, which is the same in England as in Scotland, and has been so from very early times, giving to the heir machinery fixed and attached to the soil. If the property had been in this case freehold, there could have been no controversy as to the application of the rule. The executor could not have been heard to contest the claim of the heir. But the property is leasehold, and no doubt in England that rule would not have been applicable in the circumstances of this case. In Scotland, however, the heir takes the lease as he takes the feu, and the incidental right to fixtures which the latter would have given him, in my opinion, attaches to the former. The cases have not been distinguished in principle, and I know no authority shewing that they should be differently dealt with in this regard. The Scotch heir has property in the lease which is identical in kind with his property in the freehold, although they vary in duration and degree. It was urged, I think, in the very able and learned argument of Mr Bryce, following Lord Gifford's very able argument, that the leasehold gives him only an incorporeal hereditament, whilst the freehold clothes him with permanent ownership of the land. But surely in both cases the soil goes to him equally, in the one case by assignment, in the other by inheritance or demise; but in both he has the soil, and has it completely, for a time or for ever, according to the nature of his interest, and any fixtures attached to it have precisely the same connection with it, and are equally a part of it, so long as his ownership endures. As between heir and executor, there seems to be no cause for holding that their destination should be different, or that the same old rule should not be applied indifferently to both. Settled exceptions exist in the interest of trade, and from the exigencies of social life, as between tenants for life or entail and remainder men, and as between landlords and tenants. But there is no ground for such a relaxation of the strict law, and there has been no such relaxation in fact, which can avail the respondents in their attempt to abridge the rights of the heir when he succeeds to the leasehold as well as to the feu.

The principle which underlies the rule of law has been properly said to be, that machinery attached to the land follows it as its accessory in the case of the land—the land is heritable and so are the fixtures; and why, having a like attachment, should not the machinery going with a leasehold which is heritable become accessorially heritable also? I see no sufficient reason, in the absence of authority, for holding it moveable in one case and heritable in another.

I do not go into the argument which has been founded on policy, or into the illustrative cases which were discussed in the Court of Session. It suffices for me to say that the presumptions arising as to the purpose of the tenant from his use of the fixtures on a property in which he has a limited and terminable interest, and the considerations as to the benefit of trade which have secured to him the exceptional privilege of removing those fixtures before the close of his tenancy, do not arise or apply as between executor and heir. They do not apply in reference to fixtures attached to the freehold, and as soon as we ascertain that a Scotch leasehold is heritable, they have as little application in that case against the heir.

The law as to trade fixtures is well stated (as to cases of mortgage) by my

No. 4.

May 16, 1876.
Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

learned friends Lord Hatherley and Lord Selborne, on appeal before your Lordships during the past year, and the observations are of force with reference to the principle by which our judgment should be governed. "The law," said Lord Hatherley, "has held that trade fixtures may be, at any time during the limited interest which the owner of the lease may have, removed by him; yet, if he do not remove them during the lease, he is held to have allowed them to pass to the owner of the reversion, because, and only because, they are attached to his reversion; and if they are not removed as the law would have enabled the person to remove them during the lease, they must be considered to have returned at once and finally to the owner of the reversion. The doctrine therefore was that they were a part of the land during the time they remained attached, but that for the benefit of trade they might, during the interest of that person who had only a partial interest in the land, be removed so long as he had that interest, although there was no power whatever given to them for the purpose of removal if he chose to allow the time to pass during which he might have removed them, and so far severed them from the property"—(Meuse v. Jacobs, Law Reports, 7 E. and I. Appeals, p. 490.)

No doubt, as Mr Cotton argued, cases of mortgage, to which Lord Hatherley particulary referred, are not identical with that before the House, but these remarks are of general application in this country; and I do not, with great respect for the Lord Ordinary, concur with him that "the law of England does not afford any assistance in the decision of the present question, because leasehold property is in England moveable estate in a question of succession." On the contrary, it seems to me that the leasehold in Scotland being heritable, as the freehold is in England, the heir, who is put for the purposes of succession in the same relation to both, should have as to both identical rights so far as the nature of the estate permits, and that therefore all the reasons on which the English law is based, and the conclusions which they warrant, are of force to secure to him those rights, the executor in Scotland being deprived of the interest in chattels real which he enjoys in this country.

On the whole, I concur with the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be sustained. I shall only add a word as to the terms of it, which have been the subject of a little controversy. It designates the machinery, which it pronounces heritable, not by pointing to any catalogue of the parts of which it is composed, such as we have had before us, but by describing it as "attached, either directly or indirectly, by being joined to what is attached to the ground," for the use and in the manner which it indicates. And by that accurate description it anticipates and answers the argument which has been founded on the details of the catalogue and the report of Mr Geddes. Your Lordships were asked to amend the interlocutor byputti ng the word "physically" before the word "attached," but I think any such amendment unnecessary. Attachment "to the ground" must mean "physical" attachment; and if the preceding part of the sentence could have admitted of any doubt in this respect, the subsequent words pronouncing as also heritable loose articles which, "though not physically attached" to the fixed machinery, are necessary for its working, put the meaning, as I conceive, by contrast, beyond all dispute.

Upon the whole, my Lords, I entirely concur in the proposition which has been submitted to your Lordships by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor.

No. 4.

Mar. 16, 1876. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, I agree with the opinions your Lordships have delivered.

The lessee has right during the term of the lease to the whole heritable subject, including those things which have become accessions to that subject by being affixed thereto. So long as his estate under the lease continues, there is no more reason for regarding his interest in the fixtures as separate from his interest in the soil than if he were owner in fee-simple.

Nor can it make any difference that, as against the landlord, who is the owner in fee-simple subject to the lease, the lessee, who has during the term placed upon the subject fixtures severable without damage to the landlord, has the same right of severing and removing those fixtures which an owner in fee-simple during his lifetime would have had. This is a right which, on the death of the lessee before any severance has taken place, passes to his successor in the estate; in England to his executor, because there his executor succeeds to the lease; in Scotland to his heir, because a lease for years is heritable in Scotland.

The authorities, except Fisher v. Dixon in the Court of Session (which, for reasons stated by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me, is an authority of no real weight to the contrary), are all consistent with this view. It is unnecessary to consider any distinction which the law has introduced in favour of creditors, because there is no question with creditors in this case.

APPEAL sustained; interlocutor appealed from reversed; interlocutor of Lord Ordinary of 4th August 1874 restored, and cause remitted.

HOLMES, ANTON, GREIG, & WHITE—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—WM. ROBERTSON, Westminster—E. MILL, S.S.C.

No. 5.

Mar. 16, 1876. De Thoren v. Wall.

CAPTAIN DE THOREN, Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Giffard, Q.C.—Matthews, Q.C.—Thesiger, Q.C.—H. D. Greene.

MRS SARAH OGG OR WALL (as Guardian of William Ellis Wall and Edward William Wall), and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Respondents.—Att.-Gen. Holker—D.-F. Watson—Southgate, Q.C.—Spinks, Q.C.—A. E. Hardy.

Marriage—Impediment to Marriages, removal of—Cohabitation and Habit and Repute.—In a question of legitimacy held (in conformity with opinion of the First Division) that the presumption of marriage arising from cohabitation with habit and repute was not rebutted by proof that the cohabitation had followed upon a marriage in facie ecclesiæ, which was invalid by reason of a temporary legal impediment to marriage.

Observed (per Lord Chancellor), the presumption of marriage arising from cohabitation with habit and repute is stronger than an ordinary presumption of fact, and must receive effect unless there is strong and cogent evidence to the contrary.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. O'Hagan. Ld. Selborne.

Vide ante, vol. i. p. 1036.

In this, which was a suit before the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England, a case had been stated by the Judge Ordinary, under 22 and 23 Vict. c. 63, sec. 1, for the opinion of the Court of Session.

The case so stated, and the opinion of the Judges of the First Division thereon, will be found reported under date 16th June 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1036.

The Judge Ordinary of the English Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes gave judgment in accordance with this opinion.

Against this decision Captain de Thoren appealed to the House of Lords.

At the conclusion of the arguments on behalf of the appellant their Lordships delivered the following opinions:—

No. 5.

Mar. 16, 1876.
De Thoren v. Wall.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, in deciding the question of legitimacy raised by this case your Lordships will not, I think, find yourselves in any way embarrassed by the particular procedure which has taken place in the Court below. The petition was filed in the ordinary way; no formal issues were framed in the case, apart from those which the case itself raised; evidence was given before the Judge Ordinary, and among the evidence was the evidence of experts with regard to the law of Scotland. The Judge Ordinary considered that he, sitting as an English Judge, might not be able to draw inferences as to Scotch law from the evidence tendered before him in the way that a Scotch Court could do; and, availing himself of the powers given by the Act of Parliament relating to the subject, he stated and sent a case for the opinion of the Scotch Court upon a certain point, which he placed before it. The opinion of the Scotch Court was given in favour of the marriage; and therefore in favour of the legitimacy. The learned Judge Ordinary pronounced his final decree, establishing the legitimacy of the respondent upon all the materials before him; and all those materials are now before your Lordships, and your Lordships sit here as a Court of appeal, not merely from the decision of the English Court, the Court of Probate, but also, under the statute, with power to review the opinion expressed by the Scotch Court upon the case sent to them, if your Lordships think that that opinion ought to be reviewed.

My Lords, the question here comes to be simply this: A man and a woman being both at the time in Scotland, go through a ceremony of marriage in a church in Scotland. They are under the impression that the marriage is a valid one, and that they have done everything that is necessary to make it valid. The man had shortly before been divorced in England, that is to say, there had been a decree nisi of the Matrimonial Court for a divorce, which decree nisi was afterwards made absolute. But at that time there was a certain length of time given, which has since been taken away, during which an appeal against the sentence of the Matrimonial Court might have been brought, and that time had not elapsed.[1] The parties were not aware that that circumstance created an impediment to a valid marriage. Having gone through the ceremony they lived as husband and wife, and were reputed to be husband and wife. They had children; and those children were treated as being legitimate. There was a question of succession to real property in the case, and it is clearly shewn that the man was anxious to have legitimate children, and believed that he had legitimate children who would succeed to that property. They resided, subsequently to the marriage ceremony, for some years in Scotland, and for another part of the time out of Scotland. Under those circumstances, putting aside for the moment any inference which ought to be drawn from the fact of both parties being ignorant of the impediment to marriage, and looking merely to the habit and repute to which I have referred, and which continued altogether for a period of, I think, about ten years, and until the death of the man—looking merely to these facts there cannot be any doubt (indeed, it is not disputed at the bar) that there would be ample ground for presuming, according to the law of Scotland, marriage by consent, of which cohabitation with habit and repute is evidence.

But it is said that that inference, which otherwise might be drawn and ought [1] As to liberty to divorced parties to re-marry see 31 and 32 Vict. c. 77, sec. 4, and 36 Vict. c. 31.

No. 5.
Mar. 16, 1876.
De Thoren v. Wall.

to be drawn, is rebutted, because you have here the parties commencing their cohabitation under the belief that the ceremony of marriage was a valid ceremony, and that, therefore, unless you can shew that they afterwards were undeceived upon this point, and in some way or other must be taken to have actually assented or consented to a fresh contract of marriage, you cannot imply from the cohabitation with habit and repute that a marriage by the interchange of consent afterwards took place.

Now, my Lords, I cannot in any way accept that argument. I may refer, in the first place, to the case of Piers v. Piers[1] before your Lordships' House, in which, although the facts were in many respects different from the present, yet it was held in a most striking way as a general rule that the presumption of marriage is not the same as the presumption raised with regard to other facts, which may be presumed either the one way or the other; that the presumption of marriage is something much stronger; and that from cohabitation with reputation a marriage is to be presumed unless there is strong and cogent evidence to the contrary. One of the most striking cases that can well be imagined upon this subject is the Breadalbane case,[2] in which the presumption was held to be one that not only might be drawn but ought to be drawn from the cohabitation with habit and repute, although in that case the cohabitation commenced with a ceremony of marriage which not only was invalid by reason of the real husband of the woman being alive at the time, but was known to both parties to be invalid. Your Lordships held that, notwithstanding that the marriage could not have been valid at the inception, notwithstanding that both parties knew that it was invalid, notwithstanding that both must have known that at the commencement of their cohabitation that cohabitation was illicit, still the presumption of marriage might and ought to be drawn.

My Lords, I own it appears to me that that was a somewhat stronger case than the present, because it might there have been fairly contended, and it was contended with great energy, that any presumption of marriage ought to be held to be rebutted by the fact that the cohabitation at the beginning could not have been intended by the parties themselves to be a cohabitation for the purpose of marriage, because they must have known that their marriage could not be valid. Here, on the contrary, the cohabitation began with the full intention of the parties themselves that their cohabitation should be upon the footing of a legitimate and valid marriage, and they were under the impression that there was a legitimate and valid marriage. If that is so, I ask, why should it not be presumed from the cohabitation with habit and repute that as soon as that obstacle was removed, which it very shortly was, a consent was exchanged between the parties to be husband and wife, when you would make that presumption in a case such as the Breadalbane case was.

My Lords, I will refer to the Breadalbane case for the purpose of reminding your Lordships of some, or at least of one of the opinions that were there expressed. Lord Westbury says:[3]—"The appellant objects that cohabitation, which began when the parties were incapable of contracting marriage, and which was continued without change, is ineffectual to form the basis of the conclusion that

---

[1] March 22, 1849, 2 Cl. and F., H. of L. Cases, 331.

[2] July 16, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. of L.) 115, 39 Scot. Jur. 567, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 182.

[3] 5 Macph. (H. of L.) 141, 39 Scot. Jur. 588, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 212.

consent to marry was interchanged after the impediment to marriage had been removed. That would be a very important rule if it were proved to be well founded; but I am unable to find any principle to justify the introduction of such a rule; and what is more material to the purpose, I am unable to find any case or any book of authority in which that principle has been either followed out into a decision or has been laid down as a rule of Scotch law. There is nothing to warrant the proposition that the subsequent conduct of the parties shall be rendered ineffectual to prove marriage by reason of the existence at a previous period of some bar to the interchange of consent. It would be very unfortunate if it were so. Marriage may be contracted between parties in a foreign land where certain observances are required which from ignorance or mistake may not have been fulfilled."

So that, your Lordships will observe, Lord Westbury puts as an illustration the very case which here occurs. He puts as an illustration the case of parties contracting a marriage and being from ignorance or mistake unaware that the marriage is invalid; and yet he puts that as an a fortiori case where, undoubtedly, the presumption should be raised. He continues:—"The parties having cohabited on the strength of an imperfect celebration, may afterwards come to Scotland and reside there for years, continuing the same course of life. It would indeed be a very sad thing if such a course of conduct, lasting, perhaps, for twenty or thirty years, were insufficient to warrant the conclusion of marriage. There is no foundation for the argument that the matrimonial consent must of necessity be referred to the commencement of the cohabitation. I think a sounder rule and principle of law will be that you must infer the consent to have been given at the first moment when you find the parties able to enter into the contract."

The argument at your Lordships' bar has consisted principally of a minute criticism of the wording of the case sent by the Judge Ordinary for the opinion of the Scotch Court, and an attempt to establish that the wording of that case merely amounts to certain findings by the Judge Ordinary which in some way established as matters of fact the statements which are made for the particular purpose of this case. I do not myself read these statements as doing more than saying, on the part of the Judge Ordinary, to the Scotch Court, that he cannot point to specific evidence of an exchange of consent, but leaving entirely to the Scotch Court the duty, if it be their duty, and if they think it is their duty, to draw the inferences which the Scotch law would warrant. For example, my Lords, the principle statement relied upon in that case is this: Paragraph 5 states —"From the time of the said marriage ceremony on the 16th of July 1862 till the death of the said William Ellis Wall, which occurred at Sidmouth, in England, on the 23d of July 1871, he and the said Sarah Ogg constantly, continuously, and openly, lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, and were holden and reputed to be so by their relations and friends and by all who knew them. They so lived and cohabited together in Scotland from the 16th of June 1862 till May 1863; in Ireland from May 1863 till March 1864; in Scotland from March 1864 till November 1867; and in England from November 1867 till the death of the said William Ellis Wall. The habit and repute which attended their cohabitation from the first and throughout was undivided." The 6th paragraph states—"The said William Ellis Wall and Sarah Ogg intended to contract marriage together. The marriage ceremony of the 16th of July 1862 took place in pursuance of that intention. They believed, and never prior to the death of the said William Ellis Wall ceased to believe, that the marriage ceremony was lawful and valid, and throughout their cohabitation they intended to stand to each other in the relation of husband and wife, and believed that they did so, and their said treatment of each other as husband and wife, and of their children as legitimate offspring, was due to this belief." The 7th paragraph states—"The said William Ellis Wall and the said Sarah Wall did not at any time after the said 16th of July 1862 interchange or express to each other any consent to marry, or make any acknowledgment with the purpose of contracting a marriage, unless such consent or acknowledgment is to be inferred as a presumption of law from the facts herein stated." I rather incline to the opinion that that amounts to nothing more than a statement that, except as far as a presumption of law was proper to be drawn from the facts, it had not been affirmatively and directly proved before the learned Judge that there was any interchange of consent to marry. And undoubtedly no such exchange of consent was proved. If it had been proved the reference to cohabitation with habit and repute would have been altogether unnecessary. But I certainly hold that your Lordships are here entirely free to look at once at the evidence given before the learned Judge and at the judgment of the Judge Ordinary founded upon that evidence, and that your Lordships are not in any way fettered, as I have said, by the statement of facts which was made for one purpose, and one purpose only, namely, to obtain the opinion of the Scotch Court.

No. 5.
Mar. 16, 1876.
De Thoren v. Wall.

Turning to the evidence given before the Judge Ordinary, your Lordships find that Mrs Sarah Wall was examined. In her direct examination she proves that after the marriage ceremony in July 1862 she lived with William Ellis Wall as her husband till his death; that children were born; that during the lifetime of William Ellis Wall they visited and were visited as husband and wife, and treated each other constantly in all respects upon that footing; that their children were received as legitimate, and no doubt existed in their own minds that they were so; that Mr Wall was anxious for a son, that he told her so, and the reason was, that he was to inherit entailed property in England; that when they lived at Dalkeith they were visited by the father and mother of William Ellis Wall, who took away the eldest girl on a visit. Certain letters are then put in passing upon the footing of their being husband and wife. That being the evidence in chief, she is then cross-examined by those who were interested to rebut the presumption of law, but in her cross-examination she is not asked one single question with the view of negativing the presumption, or of proving that no consent passed between them, after the impediment to marriage was removed. My Lords, if that is so, if those who have the onus of rebutting the presumption cast upon them take no step to rebut that presumption, I apprehend that the presumption remains in its full force and vigour.

Upon these grounds, my Lords, I submit that the decision of the Judge Ordinary establishing the legitimacy in this case is entirely correct, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord Chelmsford.—My Lords, the question to be determined is whether there was a consent to a marriage between William Ellis Wall and Sarah Ogg, evidenced by habit and repute, prior to the birth of the elder of the sons. If there were no other question than this in the case there would be no difficulty in giving an answer in the affirmative. But the appellant, though he admitted that there had been such cohabitation of the parties as husband and wife as in an ordinary case would have conclusively established the presumption of a marriage by consent, yet contends that the circumstance of a previous ceremony of marriage having taken place between the parties, which was invalid, though unknown to them to be so, prevented that presumption. The ground of this argument is that the living together of the parties as husband and wife must be attributed to the invalid ceremony, and therefore that the habit and repute could not be evidence of any other consent.

In the case sent by the Judge Ordinary it is stated that, prior to the death of William Ellis Wall, he and Sarah Ogg never ceased to believe that the marriage ceremony was lawful and valid. There was no evidence given before the Judge Ordinary to this effect. Mrs Wall was called as a witness, and no question to elicit that fact (if it existed) was put to her. If, then, the case is to be disposed of upon the facts, without reference to the case prepared to obtain an opinion as to the law, it appears to me to be quite open to your Lordships to presume (especially in favour of the legitimacy of the sons) that knowledge of the invalidity of the marriage was acquired during the cohabitation, and that the parties subsequently lived together as husband and wife. If it be asked why, with this knowledge, they did not marry openly in facie ecclesiæ, it may be answered that probably they did not desire to have it known that they had been cohabiting without being lawfully married, and that it was unnecessary in Scotland, as their continuing to live together as man and wife afterwards would be of equal efficacy with an actual marriage.

But taking the facts as they are stated in the case, and applying the law to them, the Court of Session is of opinion that, assuming the ignorance of the parties of the invalidity of the ceremony of marriage during the whole period of their cohabitation, yet, after the removal of the impediment to their marriage and before the birth of their eldest son, they became married persons.

I agree entirely with this opinion. A marriage is established by habit and repute on the ground that the cohabitation as husband and wife is proof that the parties have consented to contract the relation. If any legal impediment exists to prevent their marrying, as long as it continues no presumption of consent can arise. But if the cohabitation begins in an illicit intercourse, and is continued after the bar to marriage (whatever it may be) is known to be removed, habit and repute may have their proper operation upon the continuing cohabitation, which is not to be referred to the original intercourse.

In the present case the ceremony which took place, although invalid, was undoubtedly a consent by the parties to live together as husband and wife. And their subsequent cohabitation was a proof of continued consent.

But the appellant seeks to displace the case founded on habit and repute altogether by reason of the invalid ceremony of marriage, to which he contends the consent must necessarily be referred. Assuming this to be correct, the proof of consent being unquestioned, what difference can it make that the motive to such a consent was an erroneous belief that the parties had the sanction of a legal marriage? The habit and repute arising from the parties having lived together as husband and wife for many years was amply sufficient to prove their consent to contract this relation. Can the invalid ceremony of marriage, which strengthens the proof of consent, have the effect not merely of weakening, but of entirely destroying, that proof? No valid consent could, of course, be given during the time allowed for appealing against the decree of divorce. But as soon as that time had passed there was nothing to prevent the marriage of the parties, or to invalidate any consent to become husband and wife; and their living together so many years as married persons raised a presumption of their consent to contract that relation, which could only be rebutted by proof of some fact which raised an impediment to their marriage.

No. 5.

Mar. 16, 1876. De Thoren v. Wall.

LORD O'HAGAN and LORD SELBORNE concurred.

DECREE appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

E. L. ROWCLIFFE—VALLANCE & VALLANCE—TATHAM, PROCTER, TATHAM, & PROCTER.

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876. Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

ANGUS MACKINTOSH, Appellant.—Hemming, Q.C.—D. M'Lennan.
THE LORD ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Gordon—Badenach Nicolson.

Appeal—Competency—Justiciary Court.—Held that no appeal is competent from judgments of the Court of Justiciary to the House of Lords.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Hatherley. Ld. O'Hagan.

(IN the Court of Justiciary May 20, 1872, 2 Couper, p. 236, 44 Scot. Jur. p. 418; and Nov. 4, 1872, 2 Couper, p. 367, and 45 Scot. Jur. p. 51.)

An appeal was offered to be presented to the House of Lords by Angus Mackintosh of Holme against two judgments of the High Court of Justiciary in Scotland, dated 20th May and 4th November 1872, in the circumstances stated in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Advocate presented a petition praying that the appeal should not be received.[1]

After hearing one counsel on each side the following judgment was pronounced:—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, this question of the competency of the appeal has been argued with great care and diligence at your Lordships' bar, and everything that could be said on behalf of the appellant has been said by his learned counsel, Mr Hemming, but I think your Lordships will have no hesitation in holding that this appeal is not competent.

The appeal is brought under these circumstances:—In 1872 the appellant, Mr Mackintosh, applied to the then Lord Advocate for what is termed his concourse, or his assent, to a bill which Mr Mackintosh was in the course of presenting to the Court of Justiciary for criminal letters against one Dr Thomas Graham Weir, a physician in Edinburgh, "charging him with having in 1852 (twenty-four years ago) "entered into a conspiracy for the purpose of obtaining the detention of Mr Mackintosh as a lunatic in Saughton Hall Lunatic Asylum, near Edinburgh, well knowing that the petitioner was not insane." The Lord Advocate, the public prosecutor of Scotland, not thinking fit himself to prosecute in the case, in the exercise of his discretion refused his concourse or concur-

[1] Appellant's Authorities.—Earl of Roseberie v. Sir John Inglis, Feb. 18, 1707, Macqueen's Appellate Jurisdiction, p. 286; Munro and Others v. Lord Advocate, 1724, N. R. Appellant's Case, p. 8, House of Lords Journal, vol. xxii.; Geddie and Mackintosh v. Dempster, 1767 (Respondent's Case, p. 18); Magistrates of Elgin, July 3, 1713, Rob. Ap. 69; Durham v. Lundine, March 20, 1711, Rob. Ap. 16; Lord Kilsyth v. Presbytery of Stirling, Rob. Ap. 65; Greenshields v. Provost of Edinburgh, March 1, 1810, Rob. Ap. 12.

Respondent's Authorities.—2 Hume, 504; 1 Alison, 677; Bywater v. The Crown, May 1, 1781, 2 Paton, 564.

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876.
Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

rence to the bill which Mr Mackintosh wished to present to the Court of Justiciary, and thereupon Mr Mackintosh called the Lord Advocate before the Court of Justiciary for the purpose of obtaining an order obliging the Lord Advocate to give his consent. The Court of Justiciary, upon the first occasion, and upon a second occasion when the same request was repeated, pronounced two interlocutors, refusing the application, that is to say, declining to force the Lord Advocate to give his concurrence. Upon that an appeal is brought to your Lordships' House. It is an appeal of a very special kind, for it is an appeal against the Lord Advocate. The appellant is Mr Mackintosh; the respondent is not any person with whom Mr Mackintosh wishes to litigate any question, but is the Lord Advocate. It is not, therefore, an appeal in the sense of an appeal between ordinary litigants; it is an appeal against one who is himself a public officer, raising the question of the exercise of his discretion.

That being the nature of the appeal, the Lord Advocate presented a petition to your Lordships' House praying that the appeal might be refused as incompetent. That petition, in the ordinary course, was referred to the appeal committee, and the appeal committee desired that the question of competency should be argued before your Lordships' bar before the case went further, and accordingly it has been argued on that point to-day.

My Lords, the broad question which has been argued at your Lordships' bar is this,—whether an appeal lies to this House from an order or sentence of the Court of Justiciary, the criminal Court in Scotland; and to that I will immediately address myself. But I am anxious, at the outset, to guard myself from being misunderstood upon this subject, and I wish to say that, so far as my opinion is concerned, if it were the case that an appeal lay from the Court of Justiciary to this House, which, for reasons I will afterwards give, I do not think it does, still I should be of opinion that, having regard to the nature of the application, and to the question which is raised in this particular case, the case is one in which no appeal would lie. I only wish to say that at the outset, and not to base any decision upon it, because it was said on the part of the appellant that that was not a question which he came here to-day prepared to argue. I only, therefore, make the observation as I pass, lest it should be supposed that that question had escaped your Lordships' attention.

But now, my Lords, I come to the larger question, the question which has been argued,—how far an appeal lies, or whether it lies at all, from the Court of Justiciary. The answer to that question appears to me to lie in a very narrow compass. Your Lordships have asked for all the information which could be given as to what the precedents were before the Act of Union with Scotland for any appeal from the Court of Justiciary; and, going back as far as any precedent can usefully be searched for, and considering everything that can be adduced, I think your Lordships will agree with me in saying that there has been no precedent whatever adduced of any appeal maintained before the Union from the Court of Justiciary to the Parliament of Scotland. It may be quite true that during the whole of that time it was not the habit to have appeals from other Courts to the Parliament of Scotland. But certainly, even during the time when appeals, or what were called protestations for remeid of law, which in substance were quite the same as appeals, were brought to the Parliament of Scotland from the other Scotch tribunals,—in those times there is no instance of any appeal from the Court of Justiciary.

I apprehend, looking to the state of Scotland at that time, and to the occupations of the Court of Justiciary, if it had occurred to any person that an appeal would lie, the chance of an appeal certainly would have been taken.

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876. Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

The Act of Union provides by the 19th article, with regard to the Court of Justiciary and the other Courts, upon what footing they shall stand. It provides, first, that the Court of Session or College of Justice do after the Union remain "in all time coming within Scotland as it is now constituted by the law of that kingdom, and with the same authority and priviledges as before the Union." Now, my Lords, if it was the case that before the Union the Court of Session stood as a tribunal subject to protests for remeid of law, which led to the review of its decisions by the Parliament of Scotland, and that that was its position the proceedings which took place between the Scotch Estates and King William III. abundantly shew, and if at the same time the Court of Justiciary stood as the criminal tribunal, from which there was no appeal to Parliament or elsewhere,—then I apprehend that the 19th article of the Act of Union, continuing both these Courts with the same powers and authority which they had before, would naturally be taken to be a statute continuing the Court of Session with its decisions subject to review, and continuing the Court of Justiciary with its decisions as final and conclusive.

How, then, does it stand, my Lords, as a matter of precedent since the Union? Your Lordships have now the experience of upwards of one hundred and seventy years since the Union. Is there any instance produced of any appeal from an order of the Court of Justiciary during that time? No instance has been found, notwithstanding the diligence used by the learned counsel for the appellant. On the contrary, your Lordships have a most exhaustive and conclusive argument, delivered in this House by Lord Mansfield in Bywater's case, upon this very point. Lord Mansfield went through every case that was supposed to bear upon the question up to the time at which he spoke, and he shewed that there was no case of an appeal from an order of the Court of Justiciary, and that the one or two cases, the case of Mr Dempster and the earlier case of Elgin, which were supposed to bear an appearance to an appeal of that kind, really were no authorities whatever for holding that an appeal would lie. With regard to one of those cases, the case of Dempster, it appears to me to afford the strongest possible argument that an appeal would not lie, for that was a case in which, if this House could have exercised an appellate jurisdiction, it was obviously extremely well inclined to do so. But it found that it could not do so, and it therefore resorted to a very singular proceeding, which Lord Mansfield describes, and which was quite inconsistent with any assertion of an appellate right by this House.

From the time of Bywater's case down to the present day there is no instance of any appeal to this House from the Court of Justiciary, and it would be somewhat strange to imagine that during the period up to the Union, and during the period of nearly two centuries which have elapsed since the Union, down to the present time, there should during all that time have been slumbering a right to maintain an appeal from the Court of Justiciary, either to the Scottish Parliament in the first period, or to this House since the Union, and that that right should never have been resorted to by any of the hundreds and thousands of those persons to whose interest it would have been to resort to it.

To that, my Lords, I will only add one other observation. Your Lordships have, in the printed cases before you, the statutory enactments which have been made with regard to the Court of Justiciary in modern times—statutory enactments which have been provided sometimes by way of definition, sometimes by way of enlargement, for the jurisdiction to be exercised by the Court of Justiciary. In all of those statutes the orders and sentences of the Court of Justiciary were made final and conclusive. It appears to have been assumed, whenever the Court of Justiciary was legislated for, that it was a final Court, from which no appeal lay. It would be very strange indeed if an appeal were to lie from the decisions and sentences of the Court of Justiciary outside those statutes, and not from the decisions of that Court under those statutes.

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876.
Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

My Lords, these considerations appear to me entirely sufficient for disposing of this case. I think that the attempt to maintain the right of appeal from an order of the Court of Justiciary is a pure experiment, altogether unwarranted by precedent, and which must fail the moment the history which I have attempted to narrate to your Lordships is looked into. I think that the petition of the Lord Advocate, to have the appeal dismissed as incompetent, ought to succeed, and that an order to that effect should now be made, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I am entirely of the same opinion, and I think that a case has seldom been brought before your Lordships in which you have been so clearly guided to a decision by previous authority, and that of the highest character, brought to bear upon the very subject-matter in question before you. The personal authority and weight of judgment of Lord Mansfield, supported as that weight of judgment is by the authority of preceding cases, entirely, as it seems to me, on every ground, disposes of this case.

I cannot follow Mr Hemming's argument, founded upon what he conceives to be the course that the appellate jurisdiction took after the Union. He has endeavoured to satisfy your Lordships that the appellate jurisdiction stands simply in this position, that everything that was not forbidden by the Act of Union or under the Articles of Union, ratified by that Act, would take the course of the English jurisdiction, and that all the decisions of all the tribunals in Scotland would fall to be decided according to an analogy (for it could only be an analogy, and that in some instances a very distant one) with what would be done in England upon decisions of a similar character of inferior tribunals as to the subsequent correction of them upon appeal.

I apprehend that what we must really look to is this: we must see to what revision the judgments of the Courts in Scotland were liable anterior to the Act of Union. We find that the judgments of the Court of Session were, as is narrated in the Petition of Right presented to King William III. in 1689, subject to revision by the Scottish Parliament in the manner there pointed out. Then we have to inquire what was the position of the decisions of the Justiciary Court, in case any corrections should be thought necessary with regard to these decisions. We cannot find that any such course took place with respect to them. There is no trace of it, and we have this satisfactory statement on the part of Mr Hume, who has been cited as an author deserving of the highest deference in respect to his industry and judgment. After having gone through the several cases which he refers to in detail, he says,—"After detailing this series of authorities, may I presume to add in the close of all that in the course of my researches, which have extended to the oldest genuine records of the Courts of the Justiciar and his deputies, I have not met with anything in the nature of an appeal to Parliament beyond a mere protest, not followed with any proceeding, or which tends in anywise to shake that account of our ancient course of practice on which the Lord Advocate's report in Ogilvie's case and the judgments in other cases are bottomed. It is true that in some instances the justiciar and his deputies appear to have gone to Parliament for instruction or advice, as in the case of Blair and Lawson, where, on the supplication of the justice-depute, the Estates of Parliament gave their opinion that death is the punishment of forgery." He mentions another case also, but he says that there was nothing which can be considered as in any way in the nature of an appeal from that Court to Parliament.

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876. Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

No doubt analogy was pursued so far as this: Finding that an appeal lay from one Court to the Parliament in Scotland anterior to the Union, and finding that from another Court, namely, the Court of Justiciary, it did not lie to the Parliament of Scotland before the Union, your Lordships' House after the Union said,—We must supply the place of the Parliament of Scotland, with such little changes as may be necessary in consequence of the changed position of things since the Union, with regard to the detail of the mode of carrying into effect the Union; subject to these little changes, we will hear those appeals which the Parliament of Scotland heard from the Court of Session, and (I apprehend this is the result of what Lord Mansfield says) we will not hear those cases, namely, cases from the Justiciary Court, which were not heard by the Parliament of Scotland before the Union.

The second branch of what I have just stated is the point we have at the present moment to consider. The case, then, stands thus:—Mr Hemming tells your Lordships that there was no doubt whatever of the jurisdiction for the first fifty years after the Union. It may be so, because there really was no case to call for a doubt,—I mean no case to call for a doubt in this respect, that all that you find in reference to appeals from the decisions of the Justiciary Court are these few cases: In 1713, the Elgin case; in 1724, a case in which a petition seems to have been received, as it is called, by the House (which might well arise from an inadvertence on the part of its officers, or the like—the petition was simply received—no further step was taken upon it); and then came that class of cases where the matter was fully discussed, and where conclusions adverse to those advocated by Mr Hemming on the present occasion were arrived at.

As to the Elgin case in 1713, it was so fully explained by Lord Mansfield that it seems almost a work of supererogation to go over the same ground again.

It is perfectly clear that the real point in issue in that case was a civil right which all parties were desirous of having tried. Both the party that was unsuccessful and the party that was successful in the Court below were anxious to have the point decided once for all. They choose to try that question of civil right by means of an indictment. The question was to whom the right of officiating in a certain building belonged, and the magistrates having given the possession of the building to one person, whilst the Presbytery claimed it for the Kirk of Scotland, the course taken was to indict the magistrates for the course they had pursued. The Justiciary Court saw what was the object and wish of the parties, namely, to have the civil right tried, and they sent it to the Court of Session to try, and when the Court of Session had tried it, and remitted it back to the Justiciary Court with their finding upon it, the Justiciary Court acted thereupon, and imposed a fine, something more than a nominal fine—I think it was £20—and they made the magistrates pay the costs. It is important to observe that when the case came up to your Lordships' House nobody raised the question of jurisdiction. It is from that that I assume that all parties were anxious to have the civil right tried and determined. Nobody opposed the matter being heard; the matter was heard, and the main finding was reversed. Certainly, I am bound to say that your Lordships' House did in that case proceed to deal with the decision of the Justiciary Court as well as with the decision of the Court of Session; but the House dealt with it simply as founded upon the conclusion which the Court of Session had come to, and, having reversed the decision of the Court of Session, your Lordships' House proceeded to hold that the judgment of the Justiciary Court must fall with it. That is the way in which Lord Mansfield explains that case; and, really, when you have gone through these two cases, and when you have looked at the third case, the case of bribery, you have considered every case which it is necessary for us on the present occasion to consider, as it was then for Lord Mansfield to consider.

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876.
Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

The last case, the Dempster case, with regard to bribery, is a very singular one; indeed my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has stated exactly how that case stood. So far from your Lordships' House having there come to any decision upon an appeal, it is perfectly plain that from beginning to end of the proceedings this House felt very much embarrassed at having anything to do with the matter at all. In that case, the House was clearly of opinion that the Court of Justiciary was wrong; yet, notwithstanding that, they did not take it upon themselves to interfere with that decision directly. I think that a stronger instance of the doubt which the House felt as to its jurisdiction could hardly be cited. While holding manifestly a decided opinion that the Court of Justiciary had fallen into an error, the House took the mild course of letting the matter stand over, recommending the Judges of the Justiciary Court to think more about the matter, and see upon what they had founded their decision. The House did not venture to reverse that decision, and so it stood. The matter was finally determined by Mr Dempster withdrawing his plea of privilege, the Justiciary Court being very well pleased to get out of the matter in that way.

Before the case arose on which Lord Mansfield expressed his opinion there had been one or two other cases, of which the case of Ogilvie was one. That case stood in rather a peculiar position, and it does not throw much light upon this particular subject. The other was a case of conviction of felony. I forget the man's name. In that case, the House of Lords, after referring the matter to a committee, came to the conclusion that they could not interfere.

Then came the case of Bywater, in which Lord Mansfield, with his usual luminous and perspicuous detail of the transactions, leads you up to the conclusion that he himself had arrived at—namely, that there was no jurisdiction; and so it was held and determined.

Now, my Lords, if there was no jurisdiction with regard to matters of that description, I think your Lordships can have little hesitation in coming to the conclusion that, upon a matter such as we have before us on the present occasion, the jurisdiction could not be upheld. It would be upheld now for the first time in an opposed case if your Lordships were now to come to the conclusion that it is competent for you to hold the Justiciary Court to have been in error when they declined to accede to the petition of the petitioner in this case. He sought to obtain from that Court authority to proceed in a criminal prosecution although he could not obtain the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, and asked either to have that concurrence obtained by an order of the Court, or to obtain

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876. Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

from the Court of Justiciary the power to proceed without any such concurrence. Certainly that is not the case, to say the least of it, in which, for the first time, a precedent would be made for interfering with a decision of the Justiciary Court. I am clearly of opinion upon the argument we have heard to-day that this is not a Court of appeal from the Justiciary Court in Edinburgh, and certainly least of all would it be a Court of appeal in such a case as is here brought before us.

On these grounds, my Lords, I concur in the motion which has been made by my noble and learned friend.

LORD O'HAGAN.—I am of the same opinion. The Treaty of Union between England and Scotland expressly provided (article 19) that the Scottish Court of Justiciary should continue as it had theretofore been constituted; and, although in the argument of Mr Hemming everything has been urged which ability and research could bring to the aid of the appellant, it has not really weakened the force of the statement of Mr Hume (2 Hume, page 504), that the judgments of that Court were not subject to revisal "in any form of process," and of the fact that they never were revised in any recorded case by the Scottish Parliament, or otherwise, before the Union. It has not displaced the allegation of the Lord Advocate in the Ogilvie case that there is no vestige of such process either in the records of the Parliament or of the Court itself.

Your Lordships are asked to entertain an appeal for which there is no precedent. As it was before the Union, so it has been during the hundred and seventy years which have since elapsed. No such appeal has ever been admitted by your Lordships' House. Several cases have been the subject of discussion at this bar and by my noble and learned friends, and I shall not occupy time by further adverting to them. I shall content myself by saying that the only one of them, the Elgin case (Innes and Others v. Dundas, 2 Hume, 505), on which, in my opinion, the appellant has not even a plausible ground of reliance, is clearly distinguishable, and has been authoritatively distinguished by Lord Mansfield (in Bywater's case) in such a way as to deprive it of all weight in the circumstances with which we are at present dealing. The civil proceedings of the Court of Session were the real subject-matter of that appeal. The criminal proceedings in the Court of Justiciary were merely a corollary to them, were confessedly founded upon them, were necessarily consequential and absolutely ruled by the issue which they had. Throughout the case its civil character was dominant, and legitimately brought it within the jurisdiction of this House. Besides, in the Elgin case, as Lord Mansfield noted, no objection was taken or could have been taken to that jurisdiction, because, in the words of that most eminent Judge, "the foundation is the civil sentence of the Court of Session, and all that is built upon that must fall to the ground when the House of Lords had reversed the sentence of the Court of Session, for then there never was such a sentence." It is idle to rely upon a case in all respects so diverse before your Lordships, and yet, I repeat, it is the only one which seems to me to give any countenance to the appellant's contention.

My noble and learned friend upon the woolsack has sufficiently disposed of the order in Geddie v. Dempster (Journals of the Lords, xxxii., 132), which, rightly considered, gives no countenance to the appellant's contention.

But this appeal is not only without warrant from precedent or authority,—it is urged upon your Lordships directly against authority of the highest kind.

No. 6.

Mar. 23, 1876.
Mackintosh v. Lord Advocate.

The judgment of Lord Mansfield in Bywater's case, to which I have already adverted, is decisive and unequivocal on the very point before us, and if it needed confirmation, as it does not, that confirmation is abundantly supplied by the cases of Mungo Campbell, and Murdieson and Miller,[1] which are fully in the recollection of your Lordships.

It is conceded that from a capital sentence of the Court of Justiciary no appeal would lie to your Lordships. In despite of the repeated rulings of the House, no one could maintain the contrary view; and I apprehend that sentences not capital would be for the same reason beyond the range of its appellate jurisdiction. Is not the present case rather a fortiori? If formal judgments be unappealable, is there, in reason or policy,—authority and precedent wholly failing the appellant,—any pretence for asserting the right of appeal in a question of simple procedure, where the object is to invoke an unexampled interference with the exercise of the undoubted discretion of a public prosecutor? With deference, I think there is not. The highest interests of society requires that that discretion should be reasonably maintained, and used freely whilst it is used honestly, and I do not know that this House possesses the means or the machinery for controlling or regulating it to the advantage of the public.

Without occupying further time, I express my full concurrence with the noble Lords who have preceded me, and I take leave to add that, whilst in determining generally on the question of jurisdiction, we have nothing to do with the events of this particular case. I am glad that your Lordships are not compelled even to entertain a controversy with reference to a decision of the Lord Advocate, which appears to me to have been perfectly just and wise.

THE following order was pronounced:—"That the said petition and appeal be not received, as being incompetent: And it is further ordered that the said Angus Mackintosh do pay or cause to be paid to the Lord Advocate for Scotland the costs incurred in respect of this matter, the amount thereof to be certified by the Clerk of the Parliaments."

SIMSON, WAKEFORD, & SIMSON, Westminster—P. H. CAMERON, S.S.C.—HUGH HOPE, Westminster, Crown Agent—JAMES AULDJO JAMIESON, Crown Agent.

No. 7.

May 22, 1876.
Ramsay, &c. v. Blair.

ROBERT BALFOUR WARDLAW RAMSAY AND THE ALLOA COAL COMPANY (Defenders), Appellants.—Pearson, Q.C.—Cotton, Q.C.
JAMES BLAIR (Pursuer), Respondent.—Southgate, Q.C.—Kay, Q.C.

Minerals—Property—Superior and Vassal—Servitude.—B acquired in feu from A three contiguous parcels of lands. In the titles to the different parcels A reserved respectively:—

(1) "The coals and coal heughs to be won and disposed upon . . . at our pleasure."

(2) "The whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals, . . . with power to search for, work, and carry away the same."

(3) "The coal, . . . with full power to dig for, work, win, and carry away the same."

A was proprietor of the land surrounding B's land, and leased the whole coal-field, including the coals under B's lands, to a coal company who drove a nearly level mine, with its entrance in A's lands, cross-cutting coal and other strata in B's lands, to A's lands beyond, and thereby conveyed the minerals wrought under these last-mentioned lands to the surface.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that, while A's right in the reserved minerals was one of plenum dominium, his right to bore through strata under B's lands not reserved could only be used for the purpose of working the reserved minerals and bringing them to the surface; and accordingly that A and [1] Maclaurin's Remarkable Cases, pp. 505 and 581.

No. 7.
May 22, 1876.
Ramsay, &c. v. Blair.

his lessees were not entitled to use the mine under B's lands for conveying minerals wrought under A's lands, except in so far as the mine passed through reserved strata.

(In the Court of Session October 22, 1875, reported in the present volume Court of Session Reports, p. 25.)

The defenders having appealed,—

Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. Selborne.

Lord Chelmsford.—It seems to me, as I believe it seems to your Lordships, that there is no difficulty whatever in this case, and that there is no necessity to hear the counsel for the respondent.

The simple question arises upon three grants, with reservations made by the appellant, Mr Ramsay of Whitehill. These grants were made in 1825, 1827, and 1857. The first of the grants, which is dated the 13th of July 1825, contained this proviso,—"Reserving always to me, my heirs and successors, the coals and coal heughs of the said haill lands, to be won and disposed upon by me and my foresaids at our pleasure." The grant of 1857 is said to be practically in the same terms; the reservation is—"Excepting always the coal within the said several subjects above disponed to the said James Blair, which coal is hereby expressly reserved to the said Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, with full power to him to dig for, work, win, and carry away the same on paying the surface damages which the ground may thereby sustain." With regard to those grants there can be no doubt at all that the only reservation is of the coal under the surface, and the granter would have no power whatever to carry under those lands any coals or minerals won and worked from any other lands.

The reservation in the grant of 1827 is more extensive. It is—"Reserving always to the said Robert Wardlaw Ramsay, and his heirs and successors, the whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals within the said three acres of the lands of West-Quarter hereby disponed, with power to search for, work, and carry away the same, they always paying to the said James Blair and his foresaids all damages." Undoubtedly under that grant the whole of the land under the surface, all the coals, and all the metals and minerals, were reserved to the granter, and it gave him a right, of course, as upon his own property, to make any way for any coals or other minerals that he might have in any other part of his lands. But in this case he could not use that power because there were barriers on either side which prevented access to that underground.

The Judges of the Court of Session have been unanimous on this subject, and are of opinion that Mr Ramsay had no power whatever to use the underground of the lands reserved for the purpose of carrying away coals or minerals from any other lands which were not granted. I cannot help observing that I think that Lord Ormidale in giving judgment in this case has stated that which is not perfectly correct, because he says that the reserved right to work and carry away the coal was not of the nature of a proprietary right, but rather of the nature of a "privilege, servitude, or easement." Now, it appears to me that being upon a grant or reservation of minerals prima facie, it must be presumed that the minerals are to be enjoyed, and therefore that a power to get them must also be granted or reserved as a necessary incident. As was said by Lord Wensleydale in the case of Rowbotham v. Wilson, in 8th House of Lords Cases, 360—"It is one of the cases put by Sheppard's Touchstone in illustration of the maxim, Quando aliquid conceditur conceditur etiam et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit—that by a grant of mines is granted the power to dig them."

No. 7.

May 22, 1876.
Ramsay, &c. v. Blair.

This power to dig would of course be futile unless it involved the right of bringing to the surface. A necessary incident to a grant cannot therefore, in my opinion, be styled a "privilege, servitude, or easement."

I think the matter is perfectly clear, and I move your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Court of Session be affirmed.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

In the case of The Duke of Hamilton v. Graham[1] it was clearly pointed out what the exact right of a proprietor was in respect of a property excepted from a demise, and as to which therefore all the original rights of the demising proprietor remained, together with all the incidents to that property necessary to its working and enjoyment, that which the owner has reserved to himself being as much his as other parts of his land of which he had made no demise whatever. In the Duke of Hamilton's case it did not appear from the evidence that he was exceeding that right; it did not appear that he was using for any purpose whatsoever anything but that portion of the mineral property which he had actually reserved, and over which he had entire and complete dominium, and therefore it was held that he was not transgressing his own grant or departing in any way from it. But as respects the power of working, whether incidental to the reservation of the property, or expressly specified in the instrument, no right of property is attached to that; it is simply a right of availing yourself of that property which you have reserved to yourself in the lands in question.

Now, the right which has been reserved in the lands in question in this case is only a right to the coals under the lands which have been parted with and demised, that is to say, a right to the portion of the coal situated under the surface demised to the pursuer (the respondent), and although the right to that coal would exist fully if that alone was being dealt with, with regard to this mode of access to the minerals which he has reserved to himself nothing can be done beyond the purpose for which that right was reserved, namely beyond the purpose of working the coal under Mr Blair's lands, and no other coal. That really seems to me, my Lords, the simple principle upon which the Court has proceeded; and as to the question of interpretation I do not see how we can give to the words "coal and coal heughs" (whatever coal heughs may mean) any interpretation going such a length that it would amount to a reservation of all the wastes between the different seams of coal in the lands.

As regards the intervening piece of land demised by the grant of 1827, the reservation is more extensive. The reservation there is of "the whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals within the lands demised, with power to search for, work, and carry away the same." If those who, advising Mr Ramsay with regard to the granting of his leases had happily thought of drawing the other two leases in the same form, it is possible that he might have found himself in a more favourable position, but as things stand I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the pursuer is right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD SELBORNE.—The question seems to me to be a very simple one, both in fact and in law.

The engineer, Mr Simpson, finds in the report, which is the only evidence as to the facts that the level cross-cut which he speaks of by the word "mine" runs under the pursuer's lands, partly in the cherry coal waste and splint coal waste, and partly in other strata, and that the strata through which the mine passes, other than the coal, consists chiefly of shale and sandstone. The interlocutors under appeal have recognised the right of the appellant to carry through the coal and the coal wastes whatever he is able to carry through them without any interference on the part of the pursuer, but have denied him that right as to the other strata, stated here to consist chiefly of shale and sandstone. The only possible question that I can see is, whether by the grants of the two feus of 1825 and 1851 those other strata of shale and sandstone passed in fee to the feuar, who was the pursuer in the action, or were reserved and excepted in favour of the appellant.

[1] July 28, 1871, 9 Macph. H. L. 98, 43 Scot. Jur. 491, L. R. 2 Sc. App. 166.

No. 7.

May 22, 1876. Ramsay, &c. v. Blair.

Looking at the terms of the grants, I can see no ground whatever for raising so much as a doubt that those other strata of shale and sandstone passed to the feuar, and were not reserved or excepted in favour of the appellant. In the first grant the only thing excepted is whatever is properly described by the words "coals and coal heughs." The expression "coal heughs" is interpreted to mean coal pits. As there were no open coal pits at that time under this land I take that as equivalent to coal mines; but coals and coal mines mean, I apprehend, when unopened mines are spoken of, nothing more nor less than the veins or seams of coal underlying the surface. Whatever he can do within the limits of those veins or seams, whether before or after their exhaustion by working, is still permitted to him by these interlocutors, and the question arises solely as to the other strata, which are neither coals nor coal mines. With respect to the third grant, there is even less apparently upon which the argument can be founded than in the first, because the words "coal heughs" are not there, but only "the coal."

I must take the liberty of saying that I think Lord Ormidale was not so far wrong in the language which he used. No doubt the right to work coal which is reserved under land otherwise granted is a right connected with property in the person who makes the reservation in his own favour, and not like an easement, still, so far as it is a right to be exercised, not within the solum which is reserved, but over and through the solum which is granted, I cannot but think that Lord Ormidale was justified in describing it by the words "privilege, servitude, or easement."

APPEAL dismissed.

HOLMES, ANTON, GREIG, & WHITE, London—MACLACHLAN & RODGER, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, London—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL & BRODIES, W.S.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876. Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE CLYDE NAVIGATION (Pursuers), Appellants.—Cotton, Q.C.—Benjamin, Q.C.

BARCLAY, CURLE, AND CO., (Defenders), Respondents.—C. P. Butt, Q.C.—Herschell, Q.C.—Alison.

Ship—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 388—Reparation—Compulsory Pilotage.—To entitle the owners of a ship, under the charge of a licensed pilot, where such pilotage is compulsory, to the benefit of the provision of the statute which exempts them from liability when a collision has occurred by the fault of the pilot, it is sufficient for them to prove that the accident was occasioned by his fault, unless the facts proved raise a presumption of contributory fault on the part of the shipowners, which requires to be rebutted.

Circumstances in which held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that a collision had been caused by the fault of the pilot, and that there was no contributory fault on the part of the owners.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.

Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Hatherley.
Ld. Selborne.

(In the Court of Session 18th June 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 842.)

On 17th February 1873 the new steamer "Colina," built by Barclay, Curle, and Company, sailed down the Clyde from Glasgow on her trial trip, and was returning up the river on 19th February, when, about a quarter to five in the afternoon, the light being good and the weather clear, she ran into a dredger belonging to the trustees of the Clyde Navigation, moored on the south side of the river near Dalmuir, and sank her.

At the date of the collision the "Colina" had not been taken over by the purchasers, and was still in the custody of the builders.

The present action was raised by the trustees of the Clyde Navigation against Barclay, Curle, and Company for £6000, as the damage sustained by them in consequence of the sinking of the dredger by the "Colina," through the fault, as the pursuers alleged, of the defenders and their servants.

The pursuers averred that the accident had been caused by negligence or want of proper care of those navigating or steering the vessel, and by gross and palpable defects in her construction and apparel.

The defenders, besides maintaining that the collision was not caused by their fault, pleaded;—(3) Separatim, the collision having been occasioned by the fault or incapacity of a duly licensed or qualified pilot acting in charge of the steamer within a district where pilotage was compulsory by law the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

This plea was founded on section 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which enacts,—"No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law."

It was not disputed that Luke Skelly, a pilot duly licensed by the Clyde Pilot Board, was, at the time of the collision, in charge of the "Colina," and that the collision occurred within a district where the employment of a pilot licensed by the board was compulsory.

The facts disclosed in the proof are sufficiently given in the opinion of Lord ~~Chancellor~~ Chelmsford.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers reclaimed.

The Second Division (diss. Lord Ormidale, absent Lord Gifford), adhered.

The pursuers appealed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the only question upon which there is any dispute in this case is whether the owners of the "Colina" have done or omitted to do any act which contributed to the collision for which they are sought to be made answerable. Their defence is founded on the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which enacts that "no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage sustained by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." But although an accident may have been attributed originally to a pilot, yet if any fault of the owner or master of the vessel has contributed to it, the responsibility still remains.

There has been some little confusion in the cases as to the onus probandi of the charge of contributory negligence. In a case relied upon in the judgment of the Court below, and mentioned in the argument at the bar, the case of the "Iona" (Law Reports, 1 Privy Council, 426), Vice-Chancellor Kindersley is reported to have said—"It is not enough for the owners to prove that there was fault or negligence in the pilot; they must prove, to the satisfaction of the Court which has to try the question, that there was no default whatever on the part of the officers and crew of their vessel, or any of them, which might have been in any degree conducive to the damage." The learned Vice-Chancellor imposes upon the owners a species of negative proof which it is impossible for them to give. If, instead of saying "they must prove," &c., he had said "it must be proved that there was no fault on the part of the officers and crew," he would then have been perfectly correct.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876. Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

The condition of exemption that the owners should prove that the accident arose entirely from the fault of the pilot, is one which must be fairly and reasonably interpreted. The owners having proved fault on the part of the pilot sufficient to cause, and in fact causing the calamity, must therefore, in absence of proof of contributory fault of the crew, be held to have satisfied the condition on which exemption depends, and are not to be called on to adduce proof of a negative character to exclude the mere possibility of contributory fault. It may be that in the course of the evidence of the owners to fix the responsibility solely upon the pilot certain acts or omissions on the part of the crew may come out, and it will then be incumbent on the owners to shew satisfactorily that those acts or omissions in no degree contributed to the accident. There are certain facts which are clear in this case. The "Colina" was under the compulsory charge of Skelly, a licensed pilot, and he was the main cause of the damage which occurred, which is attributable to his improper steering of the vessel at the critical time when danger was imminent, when he appears not to have had complete command of himself. The original cause of the accident is beyond a doubt. Is the pilot then alone responsible? or were there any acts or omissions which contributed to the accident attributable to the owners and crew of the "Colina"? This vessel had just been built, and had not been delivered by the shipbuilders to the owners, but was upon her trial trip in the Clyde, having on board three persons who afterwards became the master and first and second mate, and a crew employed for the occasion, consisting of twenty-five men. The first act of contributory negligence imputed to the owners is the having a crew of this description; and the bye-laws of the Clyde Pilot Board are referred to, and the evidence of Skelly, the pilot.

With regard to the bye-laws of the Clyde Pilot Board, those bye-laws require that "all steam vessels must be supplied with a captain or sailing master, who shall be an experienced seaman, and must also be manned with a sufficient number of able-bodied and experienced seamen, for the safe navigation of the vessel." The Judges who were in favour of the defenders spoke disparagingly of this state of things. The Lord Justice-Clerk says,—"The vessel was still the property of Barclay, Curle, and Company, and she was manned on this her trial trip by officers and men who had no regular commission, but were there for the purpose of the trial trip. It is said that this is not sufficient compliance with the bye-laws. I think it was a slovenly state of matters, and not one to be commended." And Lord Ormidale says,—"The evidence shews that the 'Colina' was, as regards her officers and crew, in a very deplorable condition, so much so that it is not the least surprising that an accident occurred." With respect to the bye-law, one can only observe that it was totally inapplicable to the present case. The "Colina" was still in the shipbuilder's hands, and therefore could not have any captain or sailing master, or an established crew of seamen. And this may account for what was observed by my noble and learned friend in the course of the argument, that no charge is made by the trustees of the Clyde Navigation—the authors of the bye-laws—that there had been any fault by the non-observance of it. With respect to the constitution of the crew, it was necessarily one collected for the occasion, and could not consist of a master and officers strictly so called. There is no doubt that upon the trial trip of a vessel, although she cannot be officered and manned like a ship on a voyage, every provision must be made to navigate safely, and every precaution taken to avoid danger to other vessels. All that was necessary was that the pilot should be assisted by a sufficient crew to obey his orders and carry them out promptly and efficiently; and certainly, so far as number is concerned, there was a sufficient crew, for it appears that the "Colina" would, if properly manned, have a complement of sixteen men, whereas on the occasion of this trial trip there was no less a number than twenty-five men. But assuming any objection to arise from the constitution of the crew, the point to be established against the owners is that the accident was occasioned in some degree by this circumstance.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

It was said that the accident was partly owing to the want of proper assistance given to the pilot. It is said that the master ought to have been on the bridge to advise the pilot. There was no master, as I have already observed, strictly so called; but there is no magic in the word master, and it appears that Durie, who was to be one of the officers of the "Colina," was on the bridge and did what was necessary. It is further objected that the chief officer was not at the bow to repeat the pilot's orders, and it is said that if the chief officer had been there the hawser of the tug would have been sooner cast off. But Skelly, the pilot, says expressly that he did not want assistance for hailing the tug. He says,—"I did not require any assistance in signalling the tug;" and he says in another part of his evidence that all his orders were obeyed.

Lord Ormidale sums up his objections to the conduct of the owners as contributing to the accident in these terms:—"I am of opinion that in respect of want of promptitude in seeing that the order of the pilot to throw off the tug was carried into effect, and failure to keep a proper look-out, the defenders have failed to exonerate themselves." With regard to "the failure to keep a proper look-out," there is not the slightest evidence that there was not a look-out kept. With respect to "want of promptitude in seeing that the order of the pilot to throw off the tug was carried into effect," it is already answered by the part of the pilot's evidence to which I have directed your Lordships' attention.

Under these circumstances, I think your Lordships will be clearly of opinion that there is no ground for this appeal, and that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I am entirely of the same opinion as that which has just been expressed by my noble and learned friend.

The law has been laid down with perhaps a little want of his usual carefulness and accuracy by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley in the case of the "Iona," as far at least as he is reported as expressing in the opinion delivered by him on the part of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the principle to be this, that there is thrown upon the owner of a vessel who wishes to escape from the consequences of damage done by his ship, by the application of the privilege of

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

exemption given to him by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 the burden of proving that his own officers and his own men, who were under his control or employed by him, did not concur in producing the accident. I apprehend that the true rule, as was stated fairly enough by Mr Benjamin this morning, is that the mode of proof will be this:—In order to exempt yourself, by virtue of the provisions of the statute, from that which is a general common law liability, you who desire the exemption must bring yourself within the provisions of the statute, and the burden is therefore thrown upon you of proving that the mischief was occasioned by the pilot. There the case would rest if nothing more occurred; but the other side may prove that although the mischief was occasioned in one sense by the bad management of the pilot, there was, on the other hand, a default on the part of you, the owners of the ship, which default conduced to the accident, and that you, having therefore partly caused the accident which has occurred, having concurred with the pilot in occasioning the damage and injury, the burden is thrown upon you. It being established that there has been some miscarriage on your part, if you wish to repel that you must say and prove—"True it is that there may have been some miscarriage on our part, but the miscarriage you have pointed out had nothing to do with the accident which has occurred; and therefore we again come back to the original proposition, that the damage was occasioned by the pilot, and by the necessity of our having that pilot; for if there were any defects in our own organisation and management they had nothing to do with contributing to that particular damage which is alleged."

I think that the defenders in this case have entirely satisfied the conditions which are required to be satisfied in order to exempt them from the ordinary consequences of an injury done by a vessel. There is no question—indeed it has not been denied by the counsel for the pursuers—that the mischief here was occasioned by the orders given by the pilot. The only question therefore which remains to be discussed is, whether or not the defenders or their agents in any way conduced or contributed to that mischief?

The points raised on the part of the pursuers are two—They say, first, you had not the proper complement of persons on board for the navigating of this vessel in this river, which is peculiarly liable to accidents from its crowded state, and which is subject to particular rules and regulations in consequence. The accident has been occasioned by the want of your having the proper number and complement of persons on board as well as by the pilot's mistake, and in that manner you have contributed to the injury occasioned by the pilot's error. My Lords, the mode of proving this has been by producing certain orders of the pursuers themselves as trustees of the River Clyde Navigation, which orders do not appear to me, I confess, to have any application to a vessel on her trial trip, or to the present case, beyond indicating (as they may do) what may be considered to be the reasonable number of persons to have on board to discharge the duties, and beyond directing the attention of all of us who have to determine this case to the fact that a certain number of persons are required for the discharge of such duties, and thereby endeavouring to induce us to infer that where such a number of persons are not to be found sufficient assistance is not given to the pilot in navigating the vessel, and therefore there is a contributing to the mischance which has happened through his mismanagement in consequence of his not having that sufficient assistance.

The pursuers say, We will make out our case in two ways—First, we will

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

shew that if the pilot had had sufficient assistance he might have been advised at the moment when his error first commenced, in leaving the helm too long a-port; he might have been told of that error if anybody had been standing with him on the bridge in the position of an ordinary master of a vessel, who might be standing by the side of the pilot, although the pilot had the vessel in charge, and might give him an intimation of any danger he himself saw, such as the danger of having a dredger ahead or the like, or the danger of continuing the vessel in the wrong course. They say the pilot had not that advice and assistance, and if he had had it the accident would not have occurred. Secondly, they say that the vessel might have been saved from occasioning this damage by running her, without danger or injury to herself, on to a soft bank on the south side of the river, lower down than the dredger which she encountered by not taking that course; and that this collision would not have happened if the hawser which attached the steam-tug to the "Colina" had been promptly cast off. There were two steam-tugs in this case, one at the bow the other at the stern of the vessel, and it is said that if the hawser which attached one of the steam-tugs to the bow of the vessel had been relaxed and cast off, so that the pull to the northward which was given by that first steam-tug at the bow would have ceased, and if the vessel therefore had been allowed to fall off to the southward and to run upon the mud bank which was in rear of the dredger in question, the vessel's course would have been arrested by her being thrown upon the mud below the point where the dredger was, and the dredger would have been saved from destruction. The argument has been this—First, that there was no person to advise the pilot of the danger of his running upon this dredger; and secondly, that there was no person to assist him in giving such effective orders to the steam-tug as would have enabled the tug by casting off her hawser to leave the steamer in a position to run upon the mud bank on the south side of the river.

Now, it appears to me that all this is really open, in the first place, to the very serious objection which was taken in the course of the argument by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Selborne). Here are the Trustees of the River Clyde, who give their orders with respect to the proper and due navigation of the river; they are the pursuers in the present case, and they do not appear to have thought it worth while to raise this question in any shape or form whatsoever upon the pleadings. True it is that the evidence has been directed (and Mr Benjamin called our attention to it) to this species of misfeasance, namely, the want of a due supply of men on board the vessel. But the pleading seems to have been directed altogether to a point which wholly failed, namely, the defective construction of the ship, so that she was not in a proper condition to have been navigated upon this her trial trip on a river so crowded as the Clyde was. That part of the case was not pursued, but another part of the case which was not referred to, or if at all referred to, referred to only in the most distant manner by the pleadings, has been the part that has been insisted upon in the evidence. I do not wish to rely upon the absence of that pleading in this matter, although I think it is a point of considerable importance, as tending to throw doubt upon the case of the pursuers when they attempt to attribute the disaster to a want of sufficient assistance afforded to the pilot.

The pilot seems evidently to have been assisted in every way. As regards the number of men on board, although for the most part they were not sailors,

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

they were carpenters, they were men employed in building ships, and accustomed to make trial trips of this kind. But more than that, the person who was afterwards appointed as captain of the vessel was on board. Certainly I agree on this point with the remarks which were made by the counsel for the pursuers in this case, that although he who afterwards became the captain of the vessel when the vessel was handed over to the purchasers was on board, making his observations no doubt, and sometimes throwing out useful observations, he was not there (as he himself says) in any capacity as commanding the vessel. Not only was he not in charge of her, but he was not taking any active part in her navigation. But, on the other hand, there were two other persons on board who afterwards became the first and second officers of the vessel when she was handed over to the purchasers, and they were both of them performing active duties in connection with the navigation. It appeared, in the first place, that Durie, an experienced officer, was on the bridge with the pilot the whole of the time that the vessel was steaming up the river; whether or not he left the bridge to sound the whistle is left apparently a little in doubt in the evidence, although I read his evidence as saying that he was on the bridge the whole time, and I presume he was able to arrive at the whistle whilst he was on the bridge, although, of course, he would not be at the pilot's side at the moment whilst he was sounding the whistle; however, he was on the bridge with the pilot. There was also another man who had had considerable experience, namely, Corrigall, who was afterwards second officer of the vessel when the purchasers took her in hand; he was placed at the wheel-house expressly for the purpose of seeing that the pilot's orders were promptly and explicitly obeyed. Besides that, there were four men at the wheel; one of them was Quigley, a young man only twenty-two years old last year, so that at the time of the accident he was probably about twenty years of age. However, he was accustomed to the sea, and he had as his assistants at the wheel three ship's carpenters, all of whom were superintended by Corrigall.

Then what does the pilot say? He says that every order he gave was attended to; there is no doubt about that, so that nothing whatever could be attributed to any defect on the part of those who were on board to assist him. Any danger or difficulty that did arise must have arisen from the unfortunately mistaken orders of the pilot—when I say "mistaken" I mean erroneous—not mistaken by those who received them, for they were carried punctually and implicitly into effect by those who received them; with respect to that he had every possible assistance in the men who were placed at the wheel, and in the man who was superintending them, and in Durie also. I apprehend it would be a strange thing to say that a party had contributed to the mischief because he did not point out an error to the pilot, who alone had charge of the steering; still, if it were necessary that somebody should be there to point out such an error, Durie was the man, and he did point out to the pilot that the course was erroneous in consequence of the helm of the vessel being kept so long a-port.

Then, my Lords, as regards the steam-tug, the point that is raised is this: It is said several of the witnesses have declared that if the rope had been cast off at the time when the pilot first shouted out to the tug the accident would have been avoided, because the vessel would have run on the south bank.

It appears to me, my Lords, that independent of any evidence about who did or did not shout, the evidence being at last this, that no one seems to have heard any shouting at all, as far as I can make out, but the real result was achieved by the waving of the hand, it only comes to this—if the pilot, who must have been aware that paddle-wheels do prevent people from hearing signals made to them by means of the human voice, had waved his hand in the first instance instead of shouting, nothing of the kind would have occurred.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co

That being so, I think it would be quite preposterous to say that the owners of a vessel can be made liable for damage of this kind, because, if they had placed somebody at the head of the vessel, or if there had been somebody with a louder voice than the pilot to call out, the accident would have been averted, and therefore they must be held to have contributed to the mischief in consequence of the want of having so placed a person. I apprehend that if the pilot had taken the course at first which he did at last, of waving his hand, he might have saved the dredger and avoided the accident. That is the conclusion at which I arrive, looking at the whole evidence, especially that of Durie, who seems to have been a man of great carefulness and watchfulness, as well as skill. Durie's opinion is that it would have saved it. But I hold that it is not necessary to have recourse to his evidence at all. I hold that if the difficulty did arise from the pilot not being able to make himself heard, that difficulty might have been avoided by his resorting to other means of communication. It seems to me that under these circumstances there is no possible pretence for saying that the defenders in this case contributed to the injury to the dredger.

Lord Selborne.—My Lords, the argument for the appellants has been mainly founded upon the suggestion of there being some special rule of law different from the ordinary principles regulating onus probandi between parties applicable to cases of this particular kind. I myself see no reason for inferring from any of the cases which have been cited the existence of any such special or peculiar principle applicable to the burden of proof in this class of cases. If we look at the case on general principles, apart from any dicta in any of the authorities, it would seem to be not difficult to apply those principles to a case of this kind.

In the first place, the pursuers, coming into Court to obtain damages for the improper running-down of their vessel, have, of course, an original onus probandi laid upon them to shew that the dredger was in fact run down through some fault on the part of those navigating the steamer. That, no doubt, is a burden of proof very easily discharged. Then the burden of proof is shifted to the defenders; and they, in order to relieve themselves from liability under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, must prove that the loss or damage was "occasioned by the fault or incapacity of a qualified pilot acting in charge of the ship within a district where the employment of a pilot is compulsory by law." Your Lordships will observe that there are three things necessary to be proved—1st, that a qualified pilot was acting in charge of the ship; 2d, that that was compulsory; and 3d, that it was his fault or incapacity which occasioned the loss or damage.

I apprehend that if a defender proves all these three propositions, and proves nothing more, then the burden is upon the pursuer to lay some foundation at all events for alleging that, notwithstanding the proof given, that there was a qualified pilot in charge, and that compulsorily, and that he committed some fault or shewed some incapacity by which loss or damage was occasioned, yet there was also contributing to the loss or damage other causes for which the owners of the ship were responsible. Some foundation for such a case of contributory negligence must be laid, and, I apprehend, it is clear on general principle that the burden of laying that foundation rests upon the pursuer. The defender, if he has simply proved what he was obliged to prove to exonerate himself, and proved nothing more, is not obliged to travel into the indefinite region of negatives, or to anticipate by denial that for which no foundation is laid to call upon him to deal with it. No doubt the pursuer may discharge the onus lying upon him in that respect either by direct proof tendered by himself or by shewing that in the proof brought forward on the part of the defender there are matters appearing from which fault or negligence which may have contributed to the mischief is legitimately and reasonably to be inferred. Unless he does that he does nothing. When that is done no doubt a further onus probandi is thrown on the defender to rebut the prima facie evidence which has been given of contributory negligence on his part.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

Whatever may be the precise expressions to be found in any of the judgments, I see no reason whatever, referring them, as they ought to be referred, to the facts of the particular cases in which these expressions were used, for supposing that an arbitrary rule was meant to be laid down, inverting the general principle of onus probandi as applied to this particular class of cases. The Lord Justice-Clerk seems to me to have expressed the matter very properly, with the exception perhaps of one single word, which I should prefer to alter, when he says,—"I should prefer to state the law to be that it is not enough for the owners to shew that the damage arose through the fault of the pilot, if there is reasonable room for saying that there was contributory fault on the part of the master or crew." I confess, my Lords, I should not have used the word "room;" I should have used the word "ground," and have said,—"if there is reasonable ground for saying that there was contributory fault on the part of the master or crew." The proof of circumstances which prima facie shew such reasonable ground for saying that there was contributory fault on the part of the master or crew no doubt would throw upon the defender the burden of explaining these circumstances, so as to satisfy the Court that in point of fact the prima facie conclusion from these circumstances is not correct. If he fails to do that he fails altogether. So much with regard to the principles of law; and I think, when they are correctly understood, there is no difficulty whatever in applying them to the facts of this case.

In this case the argument has ultimately turned upon the want of proper officers on board the ship. In the first instance it took perhaps a wider range, and it was said that the ship was not properly manned and officered; but ultimately it was reduced to that, and reference was made to the bye-laws made by the pursuers in their official character for the navigation of the river Clyde. My Lords, I must say, after having studied those bye-laws, that even if it were clear that they did apply to trial trips as well as to other occasions in all respects, I am by no means satisfied there is any proof whatever given in this cause that they were not strictly complied with, substantially complied with at all events. These bye-laws are two. The first is—"Every vessel shall during the day-time have one person, and from sunset to sunrise, or, in time of fogs, two persons, properly qualified, stationed at the bow as a look-out, to give notice in due time of any obstruction or danger, who shall be furnished with a trumpet or horn or whistle, to be used when there is reason to believe another vessel is near." I do not know whether the words "stationed at the bow" point to anything different from being stationed on the bridge, but in this case the evidence makes it quite clear that the proper place for a look-out was the bridge; and, as a matter of fact, the evidence is that this accident occurred in the day-time, when, according to that bye-law, one person only would be sufficient for the look-out, for there was plenty of light and no fog —no fog is suggested. There was not only one person, the pilot, but another, Durie, who practically acted as an officer, on the bridge the whole of the time, to say nothing of a third person, Ferguson, whom I will mention presently, who was there too, but who may not perhaps have been properly qualified. But that the pilot and Durie were properly qualified for this purpose is perfectly clear. They were in the proper place during the whole time, and there was a trumpet to give proper notice; therefore it seems to me that that bye-law, at all events, was duly complied with in this case.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

The second bye-law is—"Every steamer navigating the river shall be manned by an experienced captain or sailing-master and a sufficient number of able-bodied and experienced men, and shall in all cases have a person or persons stationed as a look-out, in terms of article 2." I have already dealt with article 2. It is not now denied that there were "a sufficient number of able-bodied and experienced men," because it is admitted that no case can be made of a want of a proper crew of seamen. The sole question therefore upon that bye-law would be reduced to this—Was the requirement that every steamer should be manned by an experienced captain or sailing-master duly complied with? My Lords, I venture to say that the pilot was the sailing-master in this case, and if there be nothing more than the mere language of that bye-law, considered as applicable, at all events, to a trial trip, I cannot conceive any ground for saying that a pilot might not be a sufficient sailing-master within the meaning of the bye-laws. So much with regard to the bye-laws.

Now, I come to the pleading; and it does seem to me that if ever there was a case in which the pursuers were to be bound by the inferences to be drawn from their own pleadings, this is a case of that description. For who are the pursuers? They are a public body, who have made these bye-laws—a body expressly charged with the care of the navigation of the river Clyde, and whose duty it would therefore be to use all the proper means to prevent all improper practices in the navigation of the river. It is not alleged that they discovered after these pleadings were put in any fact which they did not know before. They knew, therefore, both what was usual in the case of trial trips, and what was reasonably to be required and expected, whether under their own bye-laws or otherwise, in respect of the officering and manning the vessel; and knowing all the facts, they distinctly put upon their pleading this averment, that the accident was due to two causes, or to one or other of those causes, not alleging any other cause besides.

Those two causes were—First, "Negligence or want of proper care and skill on the part of those navigating or steering the vessel;" that is one. The other is—"Gross and culpable defects in her construction and apparel;" in another place more fully expressed thus—"in the hull, machinery, steering-gear, and other appliances of the vessel." Therefore they distinctly alleged two causes—one, improper steering and navigating at the time, and the other, improper construction and fitting up of the vessel itself. But there is a total absence of allegation either that the ship was improperly manned or not properly officered, or that the want of proper manning or proper officering had anything to do with the accident which occurred. I cannot but come to the conclusion that if there were any doubtful points in the evidence, any ambiguous points, any room for the suggestion of possible inferences tending to the conclusion that the ship was improperly officered, all doubt and all ambiguity upon that subject ought to be removed when we bear in mind that those who best understood the matter, and whose interest it was to suggest these objections, if there were any ground for them, have themselves not made such suggestion, and have shewn that they did not rely upon that view of the case.

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

But, my Lords, I think there is no real ambiguity in the matter, for this seems to be the state of the evidence: It is proved, and not in any way disputed, that the ship was manned as is usual on trial trips. I should be very sorry indeed to say anything which could give countenance to the notion that as much care was not to be taken by putting a proper number of skilled persons on board to prevent accidents and to navigate the ship properly upon a trial trip as upon any other occasions; but it would be most unreasonable to suppose that you should put on board a crew and officers engaged and commissioned in the same way as they would be engaged and commissioned when the ship is to be sent to sea, at a time when she is still only in the hands of the builders, when a temporary purpose is in view, and when she is not delivered over to those whose business it will be to engage the officers and the crew. All that is required is, that substantially something should be done by putting on board a sufficient number of men capable of navigating the vessel and obeying orders, and a sufficient number of intelligent persons who will be capable of acting as officers, and assisting the pilot in charge in every way in which assistance ought to be given. That being all that can be necessary, and it being proved that the manning was such as is usual in similar cases, that in itself, I think, raises a considerable presumption of sufficiency, because the navigation of the Clyde is a very important matter, and these pursuers would probably make rules to prevent danger and improper navigation upon trial trips as well as at other times.

That being so, your Lordships have this evidence, that the pilot was in sole charge, and I apprehend, in order to give the defenders the benefit of the exemption under the statute, it was necessary that he should have been so; the pilot was in sole charge, but he had, as my noble and learned friends have pointed out, the assistance not only of a competent crew and of four persons at the wheel (one of them a quartermaster), but also of Durie and Corrigall, who were in substance acting as officers though not having the engagement of officers at that time. Did they or did they not do all that was needful, and were they or were they not in such a position as to make it a right and reasonable conclusion that the pilot had all the assistance which he could possibly require? My Lords, the pilot, whose interest it was, as has been pointed out, rather to exonerate himself than otherwise, does in the result of his evidence say that he has no reason whatever to doubt that all his orders were properly obeyed and attended to, and that he needed no assistance with which he was not provided.—(His Lordship here referred to other evidence to the same effect.)

My Lords, I will not add anything to what your Lordships have said as to a

No. 8.

May 23, 1876.
Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

suggestion, for which I find no ground directly laid in any portion of the evidence, that if there had been somebody stationed at the bow of the vessel at the moment at which the orders were given to the tug, which were not heard, those orders could have been transmitted within the half minute—which was a material space of time—so as to enable the tug to receive them and act upon them sooner than she did. All that I will say upon the subject is, that I could not, as a reasonable man, draw any such conclusion as within the limits of any degree of probability—I might almost say possibility—from the evidence before your Lordships. With regard to look-out, there was plenty of look-out; and the whole result is that the particular causes of the accident alleged by the pursuers stand thus: the first is proved, but then that was due to the fault of the pilot, for which by law the defenders are not responsible; the second the pursuers did not even attempt to prove, and they have entirely failed, in my judgment, in the attempt to fish out from the evidence a third, which they did not allege.

Therefore, my Lords, I entirely agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

APPEAL dismissed, with costs.

W. A. LOCH, Westminster—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—FRASERS, STODART, & MACKENZIE, W.S.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

WILLIAM HARRISON AND ROBERT HARRISON, Appellants.—Aston, Q.C. —Asher.

THE ANDERSTON FOUNDRY COMPANY, Respondents.—Att.-Gen. Holker—Balfour—R. E. Webster.

Patent—Specification.—In the specification of their patent, patentees described their invention as consisting "in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism, for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle boxes of looms," and after describing in detail the various parts of a shuttle box moving and holding mechanism, and a pattern mechanism, and mechanism for connecting the two, they claimed,—

"First, the construction and arrangements of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle box moving and holding mechanism as herein distinguished generally for actuating the shuttle boxes of power-looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings, or any mere modification thereof."

They also claimed,—Second, third, and fourth, particular portions or movements in the general mechanism described in the first claim.

Held (in rev. judgment of First Division) (1) that in a claim for a mere combination it is not necessary to explain what is the novelty and what the merit of the invention, otherwise than by a description of the combination as a whole, nor to specify what of the combined parts are old and what are new; (2) that the claim to certain subordinate parts excludes the possibility of a claim to any other subordinate parts as novel, without any special disclaimer; and (3) that the first claim in the specification was ex facie a valid and sufficient claim for a mere combination, the second, third, and fourth claims in claiming certain subordinate parts as novel by implication disclaiming the rest.

Observed (per Lord Chancellor)—"If there is a patent for a combination the combination is itself ex necessitate the novelty; and the combination is also the merit, if it be a merit, which remains to be proved by evidence. So also

No. 9.

June 20, 1876. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

with regard to the discrimination between what is new and what is old. If it is clear that the claim is for a combination, and nothing but a combination, there is no infringement unless the whole combination is used, and it is in that way immaterial whether any or which of the parts are new."

Observations (per cur.) on the cases of Foxwell v. Bostock, 4 De Gex, Jones, and Smith, 298, and Lister v. Leather, 8 El. and Black. 1004.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Hatherley. Ld. Penzance.

(IN the Court of Session July 2, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 857, and Jan. 20, 1876, Court of Session Reports, postea, p. 386.)

This action for infringement of patent was tried before Lord Gifford and a jury. The jury, at the end of a trial extending from 22d March to 2d April 1875, by a majority, returned a verdict for the patentees. The defenders took several exceptions to the ruling of the presiding Judge, and also obtained a rule for a new trial. The bill of exceptions and the rule were heard together, and, at advising, the Judges of the First Division, on 2d July 1875 (ante, vol. ii. p. 857), disallowed the exceptions which had been taken. At the same time they stated their opinion that the patent was void in point of law in respect of defective specification, but that they could not give effect to this view for want of an exception directed to the point. Being, however, also of opinion that the verdict of the jury was contrary to evidence, they granted a new trial.

A new trial was thereafter held, pro forma, on 22d December 1875, the Judge's notes of the evidence at the former trial being taken as the evidence in the case, and the Lord President directed the jury, in conformity with the opinion expressed by the Judges of the First Division at advising the first bill of exceptions, that the patent was void in law, and that they must therefore find a verdict for the defenders. To this direction and ruling the pursuers excepted. This exception was, without further argument, on 20th January 1876, disallowed by a judgment of the First Division (Court of Session Reports, postea, p. 386).

Against this judgment the present appeal was taken.

For the terms of the letters-patent and specification, and description of the machine patented, see ante, vol. ii. p. 857.

At delivering judgment—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The present appeal is brought from an interlocutor of date 18th January 1876, by which the First Division of the Court of Session disallowed an exception to a direction to the jury given by the Lord President at the trial of a patent action raised by the appellants.

The direction of the Lord President was to the effect that the letters-patent of the 29th October 1868, upon which the appellants sued, were void in law, and that the jury must therefore return a verdict for the defenders. This direction was given in consequence of opinions which had been expressed by the Court of Session at the hearing on a bill of exceptions taken on the occasion of a previous trial of the same action. A motion for a new trial had been made at the same time, and the result of the hearing on the bill of exceptions and the rule was, that though the particular exceptions taken were not allowed, a new trial was granted, upon which new trial the direction now in question was given. On the argument on the former exceptions the learned Judges of the First Divison intimated the opinion that the letters-patent were ex facie void, and sent the case down to a second trial, in order that this opinion might be acted upon.

A considerable body of evidence had been entered into at the previous trial,

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

and this evidence was taken as repeated, pro formâ, at the second trial. Nothing, however, now turns upon the evidence. The question has been treated by the Court, and was treated in argument at your Lordships' bar, as one merely of construction of the specification. If your Lordships should be of opinion that the specification is not ex facie void the case will have to go down again to another trial, and upon such further trial every other question will be entirely open. The invention may turn out not to be new, or not to be useful; or the specification, when tested by evidence, may appear to be not intelligible or not sufficient for the instruction of a skilled workman. All these points will be open, and other questions may possibly arise. The question, and the only question now to be determined is, whether, reading the specification as it appears before us, your Lordships ought to say that it is upon the face of it, by reason of something contained in it or something omitted, invalid.

Your Lordships will find this question to be further narrowed into the construction of the first claim in the specification. The Lord President, in respect to the first claim, says that it clearly fails, because it contains no discovery or explanation of the novelty, but is simply a claim for the whole machine as shewn in the drawings and described in the specification. Lord Gifford, before whom the case had been tried in the first instance, says—"It appears to me that the validity of this patent, in point of law, turns entirely on the first claim in the specification. Had that first claim not been stated I think there would have been no valid legal objection to the other claims—I mean no valid legal objection to these claims as stated, and apart altogether from questions of previous use or previous publication of the invention claimed. It is the first claim which endangers the whole specification. And the objection arises in this way, that the patentees have not in that first claim, or in any part of their specification, complied with the conditions on which alone they are entitled to protection. The absolute and indispensable condition of the patent and monopoly claimed by the patentees is that they must disclose the nature of their invention and the manner in which it is to be performed. While they have done the latter with great minuteness, they have failed in their first claim, or anywhere else, to state what their invention is."

It is necessary therefore to turn to the specification, and to consider what, on the face of it, the patentees appear to claim. The specification commences thus —"Our said invention consists in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle boxes of looms for weaving striped, checked, and other ornamental or figured fabrics requiring two, three, or more shuttle boxes and shuttles in each set." The specification then describes in detail, and by reference to drawings, the arrangements of mechanism in question, numbering the parts from 1 to 35 and from 36 to 62, and then continues,—"What we believe to be novel and original, and therefore claim as the invention secured to us by the letters-patent is—First, the construction and arrangements of the parts of pattern mechanism, and shuttle box moving and holding mechanism as herein distinguished generally for actuating the shuttle boxes of power looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the drawings, or any mere modification thereof."

Following, and apparently distinguished from this first claim, which is a claim for the construction and arrangement of the parts of mechanism as therein distinguished generally—by which I understand the patentees to claim generally or as a whole the combined mechanical arrangement described in the specification—there are added second, third and fourth claims, each relating to particular portions or movements in the general mechanism described in the first claim.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

It is not, as I have already pointed out, disputed by the Court of Session that the 2d, 3d, and 4th claims, if new and useful, are sufficiently expressed in point of form. In my opinion the first claim is also sufficient in point of form. It is, as I read it, a claim for a combination, that is to say, a combination of all the movements going to make up the whole of the mechanism described. It must for the present at least be assumed that this combination, as a combination, is novel,—that it is, to use the words of the Lord President, a new combination of old parts to produce a new result, or to produce a known result in a more useful and beneficial way. It is not doubted that a combination of which this may be said may be the subject of a patent. What, then, are the objections to the first claim viewed as a claim for a combination?

The first is an objection said to be founded upon the case of Foxwell v. Bostock,[1] decided by the late Lord Westbury when Lord Chancellor. It is said to have been determined in that case that where there is a patent for a combination there must be a discovery or explanation of the novelty, and the specification must shew what is the novelty and what the merit of the invention. I cannot think that, as applied to a patent for a combination, this is or was meant to be the effect of the decision in Foxwell v. Bostock. If there is a patent for a combination, the combination itself is, ex necessitate, the novelty; and the combination is also the merit, if it be a merit, which remains to be proved by evidence. So also with regard to the discrimination between what is new and what is old. If it is clear that the claim is for a combination, and nothing but a combination, there is no infringement unless the whole combination is used, and it is in that way immaterial whether any or which of the parts are new. If, indeed, it were left open on the specification to the patentee to claim not merely the combination of all the parts as a whole, but also certain subordinate or subsidiary parts of the combination, on the ground that such subordinate and subsidiary parts were new and material, as it was held a patentee might do in Lister v. Leather,[2] then it might be necessary to see that the patentee had carefully distinguished those subordinate or subsidiary parts, and had not left it in dubio what claim to parts, in addition to the claim for combination, he meant to assert.

The second objection to the first claim in the present case was founded on the doctrine of Lister v. Leather. In the present case, however, no question of this kind appears to me to arise. The patentees claim, as I have said, for a combination under their first claim, calling it "the construction and arrangements of the parts of mechanism as herein distinguished generally," and in their 2d, 3d, and 4th claims they have specified the subordinate or subsidiary parts to which they lay claim as novel, and the specification of these subordinate or subsidiary parts appears to me to exclude the possibility of a claim for any other parts as novel.

The specification therefore appears to me ex facie to distinguish the new from the old where it is necessary to distinguish the new from the old, and to claim for a combination where it is claimed in a manner which is sufficient for a combination of the kind described.

---

[1] 1864, 4 De Gex, Jones, and Smith, 298. [2] 8 Ellis and Blackburn, 1004.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

My Lords, I am therefore of opinion, differing, with great respect, from the opinions of the Judges of the Court of Session, that this action cannot be stopped at the point at which it has been stopped by the Court in Scotland, and that the interlocutor ought to be reversed, and the exception allowed, and the case go down to a new trial, where, as I have already said, every other question will be open, and where the evidence will have to be examined and applied with reference to all the issues in the case. I move your Lordships that the interlocutor be reversed, and the case remitted, with a declaration that the exception ought to have been allowed and a new trial had.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, although the argument on this appeal took a wider range, the only question which is open upon it is the sufficiency ex facie of the specification. It is necessary, in the first place, to the determination of that question, to ascertain whether there is such a description given of the invention by the specification and the drawings annexed to it as will enable a workman of ordinary skill and information, by following them, to produce the thing patented. As, however, no doubt has been raised as to the sufficiency of the description to this extent, it must be assumed.

But the specification may fail in some other essential respect, and so it is said to have done by the First Division of the Court of Session. That Court held that the specification was bad, not because it was ambiguous or uncertain or unintelligible, but, according to what was said by the Lord President, because there was no discovery or explanation of the novelty of the invention. "No doubt," his Lordship said, "a new combination of old parts to produce a new result, or produce a known result in a more useful and beneficial way, may be a good subject-matter of a patent, but only under the conditions that the combination shall be claimed as a combination, and be so described as to shew intelligibly what is the novelty and what the merit of the invention." Lord Gifford, following the same course of reasoning, said—"The patentees have failed to tell the public what they truly claim as their invention. . . . . They should have said what they claimed and what they disclaimed. . . . . The patentees themselves must tell us what is new, and if they claim too much the patent goes."

With great submission, the claim of a combination or arrangement of parts of a machine, without more, is in itself a sufficient description of a novel invention, i.e. of a combination of parts which have never been combined in the same manner before. The explanation of the novelty is to be found in the description of the arrangement of the parts in the body of the specification. Whether the combination claimed is new or not is a question of fact to be proved on a trial. Where a claim is clearly and distinctly made, there can be no necessity for a patentee to distinguish between what is claimed and what is disclaimed. It is enough to say, in answer to Lord Gifford's suggestion, that everything that is not claimed is disclaimed. It may be necessary for a patentee sometimes not to disclaim in his specification, but to state what he does not claim. Where, for instance, it may not be possible to explain his improvements of a machine without describing other closely connected parts of it which are not patented, it may then be proper and will certainly be prudent for him to state that he does not claim these as parts of his invention, and to add a distinct description and limitation of his claim.

The opinions of the Judges of the Court of Session were in the argument maintained on the authority of Lord Westbury in Foxwell v. Bostock—and certainly the observations of that noble and learned Lord closely resemble those which I have mentioned of the Lord President and of Lord Gifford. In the case cited, Lord Westbury said—"The term 'combination of machinery,' which has of late been a favourite form of words with patentees, is nothing but an extended expression of the word machine. It is the word machine writ large, and as a patent for an improved machine, in the specification of which the improvement is not particularly stated and described, would hardly be attempted to be supported, so neither in my judgment can the patent for an improved arrangement or combination be supported, in the specification of which there is nothing to distinguish the new from the old."

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

It cannot be doubted that in a patent for an improved arrangement or combination of machinery, "the specification must" (as Lord Westbury said in Foxwell v. Bostock) "describe the improvement and define the novelty otherwise and in a more specific form than by the general description of the entire machine." But it is clear that if the claim is for a combination of particular parts of the machine, and for that only, the differentia (to use Lord Westbury's expression) is sufficiently assigned. And as it is admitted that there may be a good patent for a new combination of parts, all of which or a portion of which are severally old, upon what principle can a patentee claiming a combination be required to distinguish the new and the old parts from each other?

The argument at the bar extended far beyond the limits of the question, which, as already observed, is confined to the sufficiency of the specification, and a good deal of time was occupied in discussing what was covered by a claim for a combination, and by reference to the decision in Lister v. Leather, that a valid patent for an entire combination gives protection to each part that is new and material, without any express claim of the particular part. It is unnecessary for the determination of this appeal to consider the propriety of this decision, but I cannot forbear expressing a doubt whether it can be supported. If a patent is solely for a combination, nothing is protected by it but the combination, and consequently nothing can be an infringement but the use of the entire combination.

I do not think it right to dwell on this irrelevant matter further, but I return to the question whether the patentee has sufficiently described his invention in his specification. This question turns entirely (as has been said) on the first claim in the specification. The office of a claim is to define and limit with precision what it is which is claimed to have been invented and therefore patented. In the construction of a specification it appears to me that it ought not to be subjected either to what has been called a benign interpretation or to a strict one. The language should be construed according to its ordinary meaning—the understanding of technical words being of course confined to those who are conversant with the subject-matter of the invention, and if the specification is thus sufficiently intelligible it performs all that is required of it.

It is not asserted that the description in the specification is not sufficiently explicit and clear to enable a workman of ordinary skill and information to make the thing patented. In what, then, is the claim in the specification supposed to fail? As far as can be gathered from the opinions of the Judges, it is from the want of an explanation of the novelty of the invention. But if the claim is for a combination, it has been fully shewn that the claim itself is a statement and assertion of novelty.

What is it, then, that the patentee claims, on the head of claim, to which the objection is confined? It appears to me that although this important part of the specfication is not very artistically drawn, it is sufficiently intelligible to be read as a claim for a combination of two separate parts (called improperly the two main parts) of an entire machine consisting of the mechanical apparatus, called respectively the shuttle box moving mechanism and the pattern mechanism, both of which are described in the specification and delineated upon the drawings with great minuteness of detail, and, as must be assumed, with sufficient clearness to enable a workman of ordinary skill to follow the directions.

In the other heads of claim, parts of the mechanical apparatus are claimed separately. There can be no objection to a claim of a combination and at the same time to a claim of the separate parts of that combination, and indeed it is the only way in which those separate parts of that combination can be protected from infringement. And it is immaterial whether the separate parts are claimed first and then the combination, or, as in this case, the combination first, and then the separate parts.

The patentee seems to me to have framed his specification in such a manner as to make it unobjectionable on the face of it, and therefore I think the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD HATHERLEY.—I am of the same opinion.

I think it is a very unfortunate circumstance in this case that the jury at the original trial having been charged with the duty of finding under the several heads usually applicable to patent cases,—namely, the heads of novelty and of usefulness combined with the head of infringement as regards the right of the pursuers to pursue the defenders—the course taken was such as to have led to so singular a result upon the application that was made for a new trial. The jury, not unanimously but by a majority, had decided all the issues originally in favour of the pursuers. A bill of exceptions was thereupon tendered, and without entering into more detail on the subject I may say that the course the matter took was this: When it came up to the First Division the Court was of opinion that the matter had not been properly laid before the jury, and that there was a primary question with regard to the patent itself which ought to have been considered before they came to their conclusion upon either the infringement or the novelty of the invention. That question was as to whether or not, whatever the thing was, whether new or otherwise, it had been sufficiently clearly described and claimed in the specification.

Accordingly the case went back more pro forma, I may say, than anything else, upon this question, to another trial, and the learned Judge who then presided directed the jury as a matter of law, with such amount of evidence only as was necessary to raise that issue, that the specification in itself was bad, because, regard being had to the first claim (the other claims were not further entered into) there was not a sufficiently clear statement on the part of the patentees of what their invention really consisted in, and what it was that the general public were excluded from in consequence of the novelty of the invention, and what it was that they were at liberty to do, it being admitted that a great many of the particular portions of the machinery in question—indeed I think the counsel for the patentees in arguing the case at the bar said he was ready to admit that the whole of the particular movements in question were in themselves and existing separately, as distinct from a combination of them, matters which had been previously known.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

That being the case the Judges of the Court below have, as it appears to me, with great respect, extended the doctrine of Foxwell v. Bostock in their application of it to this case. It was there held, and that I think was all that was held, that it is not competent to a man to take a well-known existing machine and place that before the public and say—"I have made a better machine than that. There is the sewing machine invented by so and so. I have improved upon that—that is mine—it is a much better machine than his." That will not do. You must state clearly and distinctly what it is in which you say you have made an improvement. To use an illustration which was taken, I think, by Lord Justice James in another case, it will not do if you have invented the grid-iron pendulum to say—"I have invented a better clock than anybody else"—not telling the public what you have done to make it better than any other clock which is known.

That principle was laid down in Foxwell v. Bostock, and I do not think that anything further was intended to be determined in that case. It could not have been meant in that case to say that where it happens, as it may well happen, that a person arranging his machinery in a totally different way from the way in which it has ever been before arranged, although every single particle of that machinery is a well-known implement, produces an improved effect by his new arrangement, that arrangement cannot be the subject of a patent. It may be that the levers may be perfectly well known in their mode of action, and it may be that all the other separate portions of the machinery to which the patent relates may be perfectly well known; but if he says, "I take all these well-known parts, and I adjust them in a manner totally different to that in which they have ever before been adjusted; I have found out just what it is that has made these parts, though they may have been used in machinery, fail to produce their proper effect, and it is this—that they have not been properly arranged; I have therefore reconsidered the whole matter, and put all these several parts together in a mode in which they never were before arranged, and have produced an improved effect by so doing." I apprehend it is competent to that man so to do, and that it would be perfectly impossible for him to say what is new and what is old, because ex concesso it is all old.

That, my Lords, I apprehend, is the principle of a patent for a combination. It seems to me that that is just what these gentlemen claim to have done. Whether or not they have really done it will remain to be seen. It is true enough that a majority of the jury in one case found in their favour; but this question will have to be tried and will have to be decided after the case has been remitted as has been proposed by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

Now, what is it that the patentees have taken upon themselves to say? They simply tell you in the first part of their letters patent—"Our said invention consists in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle boxes of looms for weaving striped, checked, and other ornamental or figured fabrics."

Then they proceed to describe that combination, which they say effects the new and improved mode, and they divide for that purpose the composition of a loom into two main parts, which they call the check shuttle box moving mechanism and the pattern mechanism. That is well known to those engaged in this particular pursuit, and there is no question that any workman at all skilled in the manufacture would be able directly from this description to do that which the patentees say they desire to have done for the purposes of effecting their improvement. There are but two parts, namely (first), the part which brings the shuttle box up to the point where the delivery is to take place of the thread exactly in such a position as to be suitable for the work in hand, and (secondly) the mode of connecting that with the pattern mechanism. The patentees tell you they have directed their attention to what they call these two "main points." Having done that, they divide the parts carefully, not however always with extreme precision, inasmuch as sometimes they throw into what they call the check shuttle box moving apparatus two or three numbers which they afterwards seem to include in the pattern apparatus as being a portion of it. But I apprehend there is no confusion introduced by so doing, because the numbers are all given—every portion of the machinery is well described, well figured, and well numbered, and no mistake can be made as to what portions of the machine they intend to describe and to use.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

Having done that, I take occasion to notice, with reference to the claim at the end of the patent, that the patentees farther inform the public that "although the new check shuttle box moving mechanism (numbers 1 to 29) had so far been only shewn and described as applied to a three shuttle box loom, it is equally applicable for working a four, five, or six shuttle box, and it can be worked with the pattern mechanism of check looms now in use where these are in a good state and of a suitable construction, and only the shuttle box moving mechanism required; and many of the improvements in the patern mechanism (numbers 36 to 62) may be applied to other pattern barrels and mechanism heretofore or now in use for check shuttle boxes."

It is rather important to notice that, with reference to the claim at the end of the patent, because what they say is this,—first, we have made a new combination which runs through the whole arrangement of pattern-loom weaving; we have made a whole set of apparatus which we call the check shuttle box moving apparatus, and the function of that check shuttle box moving apparatus which we have so framed in a new combination we apply to any particular pattern, also by an apparatus which is a new combination, and which we have here in our patent described and figured. But they say,—It is not necessary that you should take our combination for pattern machinery; you may, if you like, take your own combination of pattern machinery and apply it to our new check shuttle box moving machinery: or vice versa, you need not take our check shuttle box moving machinery, but you may take our pattern machinery and apply your own check shuttle box moving machinery to that.

Therefore, you would expect a priori that when you came to the description of the claim you would find that they would claim for the general combination of the whole, and they would also wish to secure (as they are entitled to secure, if it be novel and useful) the one-half of their machinery, namely, the machinery for moving the check shuttle boxes according to the improved combination; they would also wish to secure the other half of their machinery, namely, the pattern mechanism, according to their new combination for that. So they say there are three things you must not do—you must not put your whole machinery into a combination which will follow ours with reference to the complete machine; you must not put your check shuttle box moving machinery into a combination which will be our combination for that purpose; and you must not put your pattern machinery into a combination which will be our combination for that particular purpose.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

That, my Lords, is what it appears to me the patentees have done by the claims which are contained at the end of the patent,—"Having thus particularly described the nature of our said invention, and the manner in which the same is or may be performed, we have to state that we do not restrict ourselves to the precise details herein described or delineated, but what we believe to be novel and original, and therefore claim as the invention secured to us by the hereinbefore in part recited letters-patent, is, first, the construction and arrangement of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle box moving and holding mechanism, as herein distinguished generally." That seems to me to be one great claim for the whole. They say, we cannot tell you that this part, or that part, or the other part, is in itself a new engine or a new machine, but we tell you that our combination of all those parts into a complete machine affecting both the shuttle box moving apparatus and the pattern apparatus is a new combination, and we claim to be capable of carrying that out in an improved manner under the specification in our letters-patent.

Well, my Lords, that may or may not be true; that matter has still to be decided. It may or may not be true that it is novel, and that no one ever combined it in that way before; it may or may not be true that when the combination is so effected it is of any use. It may be that the old combination is as good as the new, and that no useful purpose is effected. That again will have to be for the consideration of the jury. But what the learned Judge who directed the jury at the trial, and what the learned Judges who concurred upon the subsequent review of the case have done, is this:—The jury were told that according to Foxwell v. Bostock there is no claim at all in the first claim which is here made—nothing specifically pointing out anything which the patentees describe as being a novelty; whereas, it appears to me, that as far as their words go in their claim (and it is for them to make out their case) they have claimed sufficiently distinctly a total and complete combination—from number 1 to number 62 they have put together every single member in a certain order and manner. Of course, it may be said that this does not preclude a question as to the substitution of a mechanical equivalent which may be substituted in one place or another with the particular object the patentees had in view. For example, as one of the learned Judges put it, if the machine were turned upside down, instead of putting it the right side upwards, would a person on that ground be allowed to say he had not been infringing the patent? In all other respects the combination, if invaded, will only be invaded by that which breaks in on the whole combination which the patentees have here described in their first claim, and which they say they prohibit the public from using on account of their letters-patent.

Then you come to the second, third, and fourth claims. The second claim turns on what I said you would expect to find—a claim as regards a combination which shall imitate the patentees' check shuttle box moving machinery. The third relates to a combination which shall imitate their pattern machinery; and the fourth is also directed to a combination that shall imitate in another respect their pattern machinery.

Having therefore said that there is here one total combination which is new—having said that there are here three special parts which are wholly new in combination—I apprehend they have both told you what they claim; and they have done another thing which appears to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack to be necessary—and in that I entirely concur—they have by the special claims made under the other three heads warned off the public from using those heads, and have left open and have made no claim and are not to be treated as having in any way made a claim unduly or improperly to anything more than the first total combination running through the whole, the subordinate combination running through all the description up to 29 for the check shuttle box moving machinery, and the two other subordinate combinations going up to the higher number 62, which compose the part of the combination for effectuating and making the pattern machinery.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

Under these circumstances, though with that diffidence which one ought to feel in differing from so many of the learned Judges in the Court below, I am of opinion that this interlocutor of the Court of Session cannot be sustained, and must be reversed, with the direction proposed by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

LORD PENZANCE.—I agree in the course which your Lordships have been advised to take, and will shortly state my reasons.

In this case all questions of fact have been withdrawn from the jury, the specification has been held to be bad, and the patent consequently void in law, and the question is, whether the direction of the learned Judge to that effect was erroneous or not.

The objection taken to the specification, as I gather it from the opinions of the Judges in the Court of Session, is as follows:—"There is no statement that any part or parts of either mechanism are new, or that any part or parts are old or disclaimed. . . . The claim is simply for the construction of the pattern mechanism, and the arrangement of its parts in the new and improved manner described in the specification and shewn in the accompanying drawings, and for the construction of the shuttle box moving and holding mechanism, and the arrangements of its parts in the new and improved manner described in the specification and shewn in the accompanying drawings." "Each of these mechanisms," it is said, "is described in the specification and shewn in the drawings as a whole, and thus the claim is in effect for the two entire machines without even an attempt to state in what the novelty of either the one or the other consists." And again, "the combination shall be claimed as a combination, and be so described as to shew intelligibly what is the novelty and the merit of the invention. . . . There is no discovery or explanation of the novelty; on the contrary, the claim is simply in each case for the whole machine as shewn in the drawings and described in the specification. The patent is therefore void in law, in respect of its claiming too much."

These observations, made by the Lord President, are directed to the first claim in the specification (to which alone exception has been taken) and the substance of them, as I understand them, is this—that the patentee has claimed as the subject of his patent the whole of an entire combination of mechanism which he has fully described, but has not gone on to state whether any and if so which of the parts of this combination are new or old; further, that he has not explained the merit of his invention, and that therefore his patent is void as claiming too much.

It will not be denied that a valid patent may be granted for a new combination of parts, all of which are old. If so, the question arises, how should the claim for such a combination be described? The patentees in this case have said—"What we believe to be novel and original, and therefore claim" as our invention, . . . "is, first, the construction and arrangements of the parts," &c. . . . "in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings." Is not this a statement of what the novelty consists in? They lay no claim to novelty in any particular part or subordinate combination of parts, but they say that the "novelty" consists in the entire arrangement of the whole "in the new or improved manner" described. What they say in effect is that such an entire combination has never been contrived before, and that it is a useful one.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

Having thus described what the novelty consisted in, were they bound to go further and state in what the novelty did not consist? in other words, to point out everything that in the several parts, or the subordinate combinations of them, might be old and had been previously used? I cannot think that they were, or that there is any authority in law for this requirement. If such a task were attempted to be fulfilled in reference to a machine so old, so largely altered, and so greatly improved from time to time as the weaving loom, it is not too much to say that it would be hardly possible to fulfil it without insufficiency or error. If the patentee accurately defines on the face of his specification his real invention and the limits within which that which he claims as a novelty is confined, he is not bound, as it seems to me, to go further, and specify how it is and why it is that his invention is novel, or recapitulate all the particulars in which it differs from preceding arrangements.

The cases that have been cited at the bar are all cases of a very different description. They are cases in which the facts have been ascertained, and it has turned out that while the specification claimed an entire combination, the real invention resided in something short of that entire combination, and consequently the patent has been held void as claiming too much. In all of them this proposition is insisted upon, that a patentee who has invented a particular combination of parts, which combination forms a portion only of a larger combination, or of an entire machine, is bound in his specification to limit his claim or description of the thing invented to the particular combination in which the invention resides, and that if in place of so doing he describes or claims the larger combination or the whole machine his patent is void.

This doctrine in respect of patents is to be found shortly and clearly stated nearly one hundred years ago in the passage quoted in the respondents' case—"'The patent must not be more extensive than the invention; therefore if the invention consist of an addition or improvement only, and the patent is for the whole machine or manufacture, it is void,' per Lord Mansfield in different cases, and per Buller, J., in Rex v. Else, 1785." Buller's Nisi Prius, page 76 d. From that time to the present this doctrine has been sustained, but in all the cases in which it has been applied to defeat a patent the real nature of the invention has been ascertained by the proper judges of the facts, whether Court or jury as the case may be; and the description in the patent when compared with the real invention has been found to be larger than the invention which it professed to describe.

But it is obviously impossible to apply a doctrine of this kind to a case in which the Court has nothing before it but the specification itself, and this is the state of things in the present case; for although the evidence in the case was put in pro forma, and was therefore before the Court, the conclusions of fact as to the nature of the pursuers' invention remained to be drawn by the jury, and in the course which the case took under the direction of the learned Judge were never drawn at all.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

The important distinction, therefore, between the cases cited and the present is, that in the present case in the stage at which it had arrived no valid objection to the specification could be entertained which was not apparent on the face of the specification itself; whereas in the cases alluded to the specification was condemned only upon a comparison with the real invention. Thus, in Clarke v. Adie the whole facts were before the learned Judge, who had to decide on fact as well as law. In Parkes v. Stephens, June 4, 1869, L. R. 8 Equit. Ca. 358, Nov. 12, 1869, L. R. 5 Chan. Ap. 36, the Judge was again judge of both law and fact, the facts were fully before the Court, and the real invention compared with the specification. The learned Judge said that "the sufficiency of the specification was a question of fact," and ended by deciding that the defendant had not in fact infringed the plaintiff's patent.

Finally, in Foxwell v. Bostock, the case so much relied on, the true invention was declared by the Lord Chancellor, who was judge of both law and fact, to consist in a single shaft with certain cones upon it, whereas the plaintiff in his specification had described as his invention an entire sewing machine. It was to this state of things, this variance between the actual invention and the description of it—the invention residing only in a part, and the description of the invention embracing the whole, of a sewing machine—that Lord Westbury's remarks were addressed when he said—"I must therefore lay down the rule that in a patent for an improved arrangement or a new combination of machinery the specification must describe the improvement and define the novelty otherwise and in a more specific form than by the general description of the entire machine; it must, to use a logical phrase, 'assign the differentia' of the new combination." The entire machine in that case was a sewing machine. The new combination was "an arrangement of three cones on one shaft," and Lord Westbury held that although "it was true that the cones and the shaft were described indiscriminately with the rest of the machine in the specification, there was nothing to indicate that it was this addition which constituted the improved arrangement or new combination." By "assigning the differentia" there, I understand Lord Westbury to have meant that where the patentee's invention only extended to a portion of an entire machine he must point out the limits of that portion, distinguishing it from the rest of the machine of which it forms a part.

But what has the duty thus cast upon the patentees in cases of that description to do with the present case, in which the patentees on the face of their specification claim that "what is novel and original" is not any portion of an entire combination, but the entire combination itself? On the face of their specification non constat that their invention does consist in anything short of that entire combination, or that it would be adequately described by any words which did not include the whole of it.

Some confusion appears to me to have been imported into the argument of the case by opening the question of what will amount to an infringement of a patent which, like the present, claims as novel an entire combination of several parts, many of which may be old. This question, I think, is quite separate and distinct from the sufficiency of the specification on the face of it, which is all that we have to do with here.

No. 9.

June 20, 1876.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

But the case of Lister v. Leather has been cited and commented upon as an authority for the proposition that a patent for a combination covers and protects all subordinate combinations or parts, or at least such of them as are "new and material." It is plain, however, that that case did not go this length. It decided nothing more than this—that though the patent is for a combination it does not follow that there can be no infringement of it unless every part of that combination without exception is pirated. What the Court said was that the taking of a subordinate part or parts might be, not that it necessarily would be, an infringement of the patent, and that whether it would be so or not depended, as the Court of Error said, "upon what the parts taken were, how they contributed to the object of the invention, and what relation they bore to each other."

This only amounts to saying that on a question of infringement the essential nature of the invention will be regarded, and that there may be cases in which, though the patent is for an entire combination of numerous parts, a collusive imitation of that invention may be effected though some detail of combination is omitted or changed, which is a doctrine familiar enough in patent law.

Upon the whole, then, I am of opinion that the direction of the learned Judge cannot be sustained. The case must, I think, go to a jury, and if on the evidence there is room for the jury to find that the novelty and usefulness of the pursuers' arrangements—in other words, the pursuers' invention—consists in anything short of the entire combination mentioned in the first claim, the jury should be directed that in the event of their arriving at that conclusion they should find for the defenders on the pursuers' issue of infringement on the ground that the patent is void in law.

THIS judgment was pronounced:—"It is ordered and adjudged, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the First Division, of the 18th January 1876, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same is hereby reversed, and that the said cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with a declaration that the exception ought to have been allowed, and a new trial had: And it is further ordered that the respondents do repay to the appellants the expenses to which the respondents were found entitled by the said interlocutor appealed from, in so far as paid by the appellants to the respondents, and that the appellants be found entitled to the expenses incurred in discussing their bill of exceptions before the said Court of Session, as the same may be taxed by the Auditor thereof: And it is also further ordered that the said Court of Session do further in the said cause as shall be just and consistent with this declaration and judgment."

GRAHAMES & WARDLAW, Westminster—HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—GEORGE FAITHFUL, Westminster—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.

FRANCIS KYAN DUNCAN (Petitioner), Appellant.—John Pearson, Q.C.—Badenach Nicolson.
JOHN SCOTT (Respondent), Respondent.—Herschel, Q.C.—Gully.

No. 10.
June 20, 1876.*
Duncan v. Scott.

Lease—Road—Proof.—Held (in rev. judgment of the Second Division) that permission by a landlord to his tenant in a farm to use a private road over an adjoining property, also belonging to the landlord, did not make the right to use the road a pertinent of the farm, and that a person to whom the farm had been let by a subsequent proprietor of both estates was not entitled to use the road in the absence of a contract to that effect.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Hatherley. Ld. O'Hagan.

IN May 1873 Colonel Francis Kyan Duncan, of Firth and Old Woodhouselee, in the county of Edinburgh, presented a petition to the Sheriff, praying that John Scott, the petitioner's tenant in the farm of Firth Mains, should be interdicted from using a private road or avenue passing Firth House, over the lands of Old Woodhouselee.

Scott, in his answers, averred that the road in question had been used as a road to his farm by the tenants thereof for upwards of twenty years, and was the proper road from his farm to Edinburgh.

The following facts were proved:—The petitioner, Colonel Duncan, acquired by purchase the properties of Firth and Old Woodhouselee in 1865. The farm of Firth Mains was then occupied, under a nineteen years' lease, which expired at Martinmas 1868. In March 1868 the farm of Firth Mains was advertised to be let. The advertisement stated that Adam Bruce at Firth House would point out the boundaries. In the following month, by missives of offer and acceptance, Scott took the farm for nineteen years. The missives contained no mention of the road in question, and no reference to the possession by the previous tenant.

A draft lease was subsequently prepared by the landlord's agent, which bore that the farm was to be let as possessed by the former tenant, but it did not describe the farm roads or refer to the road in question. The lease was never executed in consequence of a question as to fences.†

---

* Decided Feb. 22, 1876.

† The only oral evidence adduced by the tenant was as follows:—

John Brown, farmer, deponed to visiting the farm of Firth Mains with the respondent Scott and his brother in March 1868. "Bruce shewed us over the farm. Before we parted I said it was a bad road from Kirkettle, and I asked which was the road to Edinburgh, and he pointed and said it was past the Colonel's, or the laird's house, I am not sure which."

Walter Scott, the respondent's brother, deponed,—"On parting, last witness asked Bruce which was the road to Edinburgh, and he pointed down by the laird's house, and Mr Brown said it was a very bad road, and Bruce said it was the road Mr Good" (the former tenant) "had driven his carts to Edinburgh, that it was steep down and steep up other side."

John Scott, the respondent, deponed,—"Mr Brown asked Bruce the way to Edinburgh, and he pointed by the thrashing-mill, saying that was the road, past the Colonel's house." Cross.—"The conversation with Bruce was all the information I got about roads."

Mary Good, widow of Peter Good, Firth Mains, deponed,—"My husband was tenant of Firth Mains. I produce lease which we got from Mr Brown, the proprietor, for nineteen years from Martinmas 1849. After entering the farm we used the road passing by Firth House, and took our carts with produce by that road when passing to Edinburgh. Husband died in 1861. He told me that Bell, the land-surveyor, had complained to Mr Brown's grieve, a brother of the present proprietor's grieve, to the effect that he was to take his carts by Auchendinny Mains, and my husband said he might do so as he liked, but that he, my husband, would use the road that was pointed out to him when he took

No. 10.

June 20, 1876. Duncan v. Scott.

The Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie), on 20th April 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"For the reasons stated in the subjoined note, refuses the interdict, dismisses the petition, and decerns: Finds the petitioner liable in expenses, allows an account thereof to be lodged for taxation, and remits to Mr Robert Barclay Selby, solicitor, to tax and report."*

On 14th July 1874 the Sheriff (Davidson) on appeal, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that it the farm, which was past Firth House. My husband used the road till his death, and after that I continued to use it with our carts to and from Edinburgh."

---

Jessie Good and Hugh Good, son and daughter of the former witness, gave evidence to the same effect as to the use of the road.

Colonel Duncan, the petitioner, deponed that when he acquired the two properties of Firth and Woodhouselee from Mr Brown in 1865 the farm was occupied by the trustees of Peter Good, and that his widow occupied the farmhouse till the lease expired at Martinmas 1868.

Bruce, who was a witness for the landlord, deponed that nothing was said about roads when he shewed the farm.

* "NOTE.—The road in dispute is the most direct to Edinburgh, and passes along what forms the approach or avenue to the petitioner's mansion, from the high road leading from Edinburgh to Auchendinny. The other road, which, it is contended, the respondent ought to use, joins the same road on the other side of Auchendinny village, and is about three quarters of a mile longer, besides being, it is stated, much steeper. The petitioner became proprietor in 1865, and the respondent entered to his farm at Martinmas 1868; the contract of lease for nineteen years stands upon a missive offer and acceptance—the formal lease, which is in draft, not having been executed, owing solely, it would appear, to the tenant not being satisfied upon the matter of fences. These documents make no special reference to the road against the use of which interdict is sought.

"The question involved is, whether the respondent's right to use the road in question is an incident to, or an accessory of, the farm leased from the petitioner as landlord? This question, the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion, must be answered in the affirmative.

"The considerations which have weighed with the Sheriff-substitute in arriving at the conclusion above expressed are principally the following:—

"1. The petitioner's avenue is not used solely as an approach to the mansion-house, but is regularly used for the purposes of the home farm, which is situated between the mansion-house and the respondent's farm.

"2. During the nineteen years' lease immediately previous to the respondent's occupancy the then tenant and his representatives constantly and regularly used the avenue for farm purposes in going to and returning from Edinburgh. And it would appear from the draft lease that the farm was to be let as lately possessed by the former tenant.

"3. It is clear upon the evidence that, on the occasion of the respondent examining the farm, the petitioner's grieve pointed out the road in dispute as the one leading to Edinburgh from the farm; and

"4. It is also clear that, from his entry at Martinmas 1868, down to a period shortly before presenting the petition, the respondent was in the habit of using the road in connection with his farm without objection.

"In view of these facts, is it possible to hold that the respondent is to be debarred from all use whatever of this road? which is what is prayed for. What appears to be chiefly objected to by the petitioner is the respondent's milk-van passing near his residence at early hours, but it is not easy to distinguish between milk and any other farm produce. Whether keeping a dairy is an unwarrantable misapplication of the use of the subjects let is a matter which does not appear to be here raised, and no opinion therefore need be expressed upon it. If, however, the petitioner can succeed in shewing that it is, he will probably have no difficulty in stopping the objectionable traffic."

No. 10.

June 20, 1876.

Duncan v. Scott.

is not proved that the respondent acquired right, by his lease of the farm of Firth Mains, to the use of the private avenue or road leading through the grounds of the petitioner, to and from the petitioner's residence of Firth House: Therefore interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the said John Scott, respondent, his servants, and all others employed by him, from entering upon or using the said road or avenue as craved." *

* "NOTE.—This road, to which the respondent says he has right, is not a public road; and no claim to it is stated by the respendent on the ground that the public have a right of way upon that road. It is the avenue to and from the mansion-house of the petitioner, extending through policies and grounds of his about his residence. It seems to be the only access to Firth House.

"The respondent claims right to it as tenant of Firth Mains farm. He says it is a road which leads to Edinburgh, and no exception of the use of it by the tenant of Firth Mains having been made in his lease he is entitled to use it.

"Further, he says it was pointed out to him before he took the farm as one of the roads of the farm. But this road forms no part of the respondent's farm. The farm lies to the south of the grounds of Firth House. It is bounded on its north side by a parish road, to which there is a road (or roads) from the farm-house and farm. That parish road leads on the one hand (west) to the Penicuick and Edinburgh road, and on the other hand to Dalkeith. The respondent has also three additional fields on the north side of this parish road, with accesses from them to it. The home farm and the grounds of Firth House lie to the north of these three fields.

"Now, it seems very clear that, without positive stipulation, the tenant of Firth Mains can have no right to the use of this private road through the petitioner's private grounds.

"He cannot, in the circumstances, maintain that he has a right to it, inasmuch as it was not made a condition of his contract that he should not use it. As it is no part of his farm, it is necessary for him to shew that he has, by his lease, an express right to it. He accordingly says it was pointed out to him, and so it is part of his contract that he should have the use of it. The question is, has he proved that?

"No formal lease has yet been executed. Certain documents have been produced (apparently on the call of the respondent), which are said to express the terms of the contract between the parties. There are the letter by the petitioner's agent to the respondent, with his reply to it, being an offer and acceptance (No. 21 of process), the conditions of lease (No. 20), and a draft lease (No. 22), in regard to some part of which parties are at variance. In not one of these documents is there any reference to the use of this avenue. All that is said about roads is an obligation on the tenant—(see conditions of lease and draft lease)—to keep the whole drains, roads, gates, ditches, and fences in good order. That refers to the roads on the farm, of which undoubtedly this is not one. It is proved that the subject of this avenue was never mentioned, either to the petitioner or to his agent, until in 1873 the respondent's use of it was challenged. These are important facts clearly against the respondent's claim. But he says this road was pointed out to him before he took the farm as the road to Edinburgh,—that is, the road to Edinburgh he, as tenant of the farm, would have the use of. It is said it was pointed out to him by Bruce, who was the petitioner's overseer. Bruce had no instructions nor authority to do this. The advertisement as to the farm, set forth in article 1 of defender's statement of facts (and it is admitted to be correct), refers to Bruce only as the person who 'will point out the boundaries.' Bruce states that he did not point out this road,—that they never saw the road, nor were farther north than the parish road, and that he is 'quite sure that the subject of roads was not mentioned at all.' It is somewhat doubtful if a right to the use of this kind beyond the farm could be established against the proprietor by a conversation with an unauthorised servant alone, even if the exact terms and meaning of that conversation were proved in a clear and satisfactory way. But the witnesses for the respondent merely mention an observation made by Bruce in answer to what appears to have been

No. 10.

June 20, 1876. Duncan v. Scott.

Scott, the tenant, appealed to the Court of Session.

On 7th November 1874 the Second Division (abs. the Lord Justice-Clerk) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find it proved in point of fact that, along with the farm of Firth Mains, there was let to the appellant the right to use the road in dispute as a road to Edinburgh, for the purposes of the said farm: Therefore find that the respondent is not entitled to the interdict craved: Recall the judgment appealed against, dismiss the petition, and decern."

The petitioner appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I cannot help regretting that there has been in this case, which does not involve a point of any great importance, so much litigation, and also that your Lordships have not the advantage of having before you the reasons of the Court of Session for the interlocutor which they have ultimately pronounced. What your Lordships have is that that interlocutor professes to "find it proved in point of fact that along with the farm of Firth Mains there was let to the appellant" (that is to say, the appellant before the Court of Session, the respondent here) "the right to use the road in dispute as a road to Edinburgh for the purpose of the said farm."

Now, my Lords, it is not in controversy that the road in question is a private road, and that unless the respondent can establish his right of passage over the road no person other than the owner of it, namely, the present appellant, has any right to use the road. Moreover, it is not in controversy that it cannot in any way be called a way of necessity for the Firth Mains farm, because the Firth Mains farm is provided with a road, somewhat longer, to Edinburgh on the one side and with a road to Kirkettle and other places on the other or eastern side. I turn therefore to the documents in evidence in the case for the purpose of seeing how a right to use this private road has been given to the respondent, because unless that right has been given either by some document, a casual question by a third party, and which, if it really was made, might easily have been forgotten. The respondent and his party had come to Firth Mains by Kirkettle; and John Brown says Bruce 'shewed us over the farm. Before we parted I said it was a bad road from Kirkettle, and I asked which was the road to Edinburgh, and he pointed and said it was either past the Colonel's or the laird's house, I am not sure which.' They did not see the house nor the road. It is impossible to hold what was said in this short and loose conversation as a deliberate agreement between the petitioner and the respondent.

---

"The respondent further founds on the occupation of this private road by the previous tenant, Good. It is not proved that Good, even if he were occasionally allowed to use the road, had any right to the use of it. He did use it to a certain extent, and he was found fault with by the proprietor for doing so. He certainly did not use it in the manner the respondent has recently done; and, having died in 1861, Cunningham, who managed the farm for Good's family, took nearly the whole produce to Dalkeith, and not to Edinburgh. The respondent did not know till after he became tenant that Good had ever used this road.

"The respondent founds also on his own use of it since his entry at Martinmas 1868. If he had no right to it by the terms of his lease, his use of it, whatever it may have been, would not preclude the petitioner putting an end to that use in 1873, when the respondent commenced his daily and continuous traffic of a new kind. There is not distinct evidence of the extent to which this occasional use went; nor is it proved that the petitioner knew of it. No such partial use permitted, or not stopped if known of, between Martinmas 1868 and 1873, would fix a right in the respondent."

or by some express verbal contract or licence, there can be no such right arising by implication of law.

My Lords, the documentary evidence in the case is extremely simple. There was an advertisement put forth for the letting of this farm, which described it as "the arable farm of Firth Mains"—"consisting of 300 acres"—"to which if desired about 20 acres of the adjoining lands may be added. The farm is intersected by the Edinburgh and Peebles Railway, the Roslin station of which is about a mile and a quarter from the house." And the advertisement stated that "Adam Bruce, at Firth House, near Roslin, will point out the boundaries;" and that application was to be made to Mr John T. Mowbray, "by whom offers will be received until the 1st of April next."

My Lords, the respondent went upon the farm and saw it—(I will refer for a moment to what took place on his going upon the farm)—and having gone upon the farm he appears to have indicated that he was ready to take it; and accordingly Mr Mowbray made him an offer in writing. "I hereby agree on the part of Colonel Duncan of Firth and Old Woodhouslee to let to you the farm of Firth Mains, with the additional fields as advertised, at the rent of £400 yearly, on the conditions of lease which you have seen." I pause there for the purpose of saying that these conditions of lease are before your Lordships, although not printed as part of the case, and there is nothing in them which has any bearing upon the question, except possibly one condition. That condition provided that the tenant was to keep "the roads" (without saying more) "in repair." It was not contended, and indeed it could not be contended, that that included or covered the road in question, because the tenant, I apprehend, would have no desire to keep this road, nearly a mile in length, through other property, in repair. The other stipulations in Mr Mowbray's letter are immaterial.

The acceptance of that offer is in writing in these words—"I hereby accept of the above offer on the terms stated; but there are one or two points to which if the landlord can consent I shall feel much obliged." I pass over the first. The second is this,—"I would also ask the landlord as a favour if he would assist me in applying to the Peebles Railway Company for a siding in the farm as the common road is far from being good." Now, the Peebles Railway passed through the farm. "The common road" obviously means the public road, the parish road, which also passed through the farm, communicating on the one side with Edinburgh, and on the other side with Kirkettle. The application therefore is, taking notice that that was the road which otherwise the tenant would have to use, that the landlord would intercede with the Peebles Railway Company to make a siding at which the railway might stop their goods trains and take on his produce from the farm and convey it to wherever the railway was going—to Edinburgh on the one side and elsewhere on the other.

Therefore, my Lords, so far as the documentary evidence up to this time goes, there is nothing whatever which in any way indicates any intention of including or asking for the inclusion of the right to use the private road of the appellant.

I turn, then, to see whether any foundation can be laid for the case of the respondent, and for the interlocutor of the Court of Session, in what took place on the occasion of the respondent going to the farm; and I do not propose to enter into any conflict of evidence there, which probably would not be open for your Lordships to consider; but I take the case as stated in the evidence of the respondent himself. Now, he was told in the advertisement that Adam Bruce would point out the boundaries of the farm. That was the only extent of authority which Adam Bruce had received to his knowledge. He went upon the farm and he saw there Adam Bruce, and the description which is given of what took place is this—The respondent says "Bruce was not in; his son took us to him, going by the west side of farm. We examined steading and farm, coming down with Bruce by the east side of the farm to the steading, and then came down to the parish road. Mr Brown asked Bruce the way to Edinburgh, and he pointed by the thrashing mill, saying that that was the road past the Colonel's house." Lower down he says—"The conversation with Bruce was all the information I got about roads."

No. 10.

June 20, 1876.
Duncan v. Scott.

John Brown, who was with him, says—"We drove to Kirkettle, and we were directed there the road to Bruce's house, and we called there and a boy took us to Bruce, and he shewed us over the farm. Before we parted I said it was a bad road from Kirkettle, and I asked which was the road to Edinburgh, and he pointed and said it was past the Colonel's or the laird's house—I am not sure which. He also said it was a hilly road, but generally well kept." And Walter Scott, who was present, says—"The last witness asked Bruce which was the road to Edinburgh, and he pointed down by the laird's house, and Mr Brown said it was a very bad road, and Bruce said it was the road Mr Good had driven his carts to Edinburgh, that it was steep down and steep up other side." Mr Good had been the former tenant.

With regard to the position of the former tenant, what I understand the evidence to amount to is this:—The former tenant had had a lease; the lease is not in evidence, and it is not suggested that anything was contained in the lease upon the subject of the use of this road; but it is said that the factor of the then landlord, whose name was Brown, had given a licence or permission to Good to use this road for his carts going to Edinburgh. It is said that the landlord expressed much disapprobation at this leave having been given, but the leave was not recalled or revoked. Your Lordships must take it therefore that the former tenant had not, by his lease, or by any contract in writing, but by the permission of the factor of the landlord, been allowed to take his traffic over this road.

Now, my Lords, putting all these facts together, what do they amount to? My Lords, if it had been the case that on the occasion of the respondent going on the farm Adam Bruce had said, here is a road past the landlord's house,—if you take the farm you shall have the use of it, and I undertake that it shall be your mode of passing to Edinburgh—even if he had said that, I apprehend that after the extent and ambit of the authority of Adam Bruce had been distinctly pointed out to the respondent by the advertisement, it would have been impossible for him to rely upon Bruce as having given him any binding contract for the use of the road in question. But in point of fact Bruce did nothing of the kind. Even by the statement of the respondent he did nothing more than this:—he said as a matter of fact that that, pointing it out at the same time, was the private road of the landlord; that that was the road to Edinburgh; that that was the way by which the former tenant had driven his carts to Edinburgh. But the respondent at the same time says that he was aware of and saw the other road, for he says he passed along the parish road to Auchendinny; that is, the same as the Edinburgh road.

Now, my Lords, if that had raised in the mind of the respondent any idea that he was to have the use of this road it was for him, having heard what he did hear from Bruce, to have made a demand or to have exacted a stipulation

No. 10.
June 20, 1876.
Duncan v. Scott.

upon the subject from the landlord. Then he would have ascertained whether the landlord was willing to have made that concession, or whether he would have refused to have made it. But as it was, there was no power, in the first place, in Bruce to have made any engagement upon the subject, and in the next place there is no evidence that Bruce either made or intended to make any engagement upon the subject.

So much therefore for what passed on the farm. My Lords, is there anything else in the case? After the agreement was complete, after the tenant had entered upon the farm, it became necessary of course that a formal lease should be prepared. A draft of this formal lease was prepared by the agent of the appellant, and was handed to the tenant. That draft has not been settled, there being a controversy upon some point other than that now before your Lordships; but it appears that in that draft the property leased was described as the farm in question, with these words—"As possessed lately by the representatives of Good." The farm is described as "possessed." Now, what was possessed by Good? That which was possessed by him was the farm, and merely the farm. He may have had, or he may not have had, a collateral licence, a licence while he was tenant of the farm to use the road in question, but that was no part of the "possession" of the farm, nor was it appurtenant to the possession of the farm. Therefore it appears to me that unless before the exhibition of this draft lease there had been some contract of letting, by which the respondent became entitled to use the road in question, there is nothing in this draft lease exhibited after the contract between the landlord and tenant was complete that would alter or add to that contract.

My Lords, I am therefore, upon the whole, altogether unable to arrive at the conclusion at which the Court of Session has arrived, that "there was let to the appellant the right to use the road in dispute as a road to Edinburgh for the purposes of the said farm." I think, my Lords, that it would be most dangerous if your Lordships were to derive from such materials as I have referred to any conclusion such as that at which the Court of Session has arrived. I can therefore only submit to your Lordships that the two interlocutors of the Court of Session should be reversed; that the interlocutor or judgment of the Sheriff-depute should be revived; and that the appellant should have expenses, not of course of the appeal, but in the Court of Session.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the Court of Session in their interlocutor state that they "find it proved in point of fact that, along with the farm of Firth Mains there was let to the appellant the right to use the road in dispute as a road to Edinburgh for the purposes of the said farm." We have not been furnished with the reasons which led the Court of Session to this conclusion, and, therefore, I find it difficult to understand, whether, by the expression of the Court that it is "proved in point of fact that there was let to the appellant the right to use the road in dispute" they mean to say that upon the documents themselves in evidence there was an actual proof of the letting, or whether they mean to say that from the facts of the case, that is, the conduct of the parties, it may be inferred that there was a letting of this right of road.

My Lords, the question whether or not there was any such actual letting must entirely depend upon the terms of the draft lease, which, having been prepared by the appellant's solicitor, would be evidence against him, and would enable the respondent to call for a lease, to be executed according to the terms of

No. 10.

June 20, 1876.
Duncan v. Scott.

that draft. We have not had that draft before us, but it seems, from the reasons given by the Sheriff-substitute for his interlocutor that it would appear from the draft-lease that the farm was to be let "as lately possessed by the former tenant." With regard to the right of the former tenant, Good, it appears that when he held the farm he had certainly no right of way or anything more than a licence or permission to use this road. That appears from the evidence of Mrs Good, who says,—"He" (her husband) "told me that Bell, the land-surveyor, had complained to Mr Brown's grieve, a brother of the present proprietor's grieve, to the effect that he was to take his carts by Auchendinny Mains, and my husband said he might do so as he liked, but that he (my husband) would use the road that was pointed out to him when he took the farm, which was past Firth House." This shews that there was nothing more at the time he took his lease than that the road was pointed out to him as a road which might be used, which certainly would not amount to a lease of the right, but would be a mere permission to use it. Now, supposing that Good had had a lease of the farm with this right appurtenant to it, and supposing that when the lease was granted to Mr Scott the farm had been leased, "with all ways usually possessed and enjoyed," there is no doubt whatever that this right would have passed as appurtenant to the farm. But Good having had merely a licence or permission to use the road, even if the words in Mr Scott's lease had gone to the extent which I have mentioned, they certainly would not have carried the right of this way to the respondent.

It appears, my Lords, that the words in the draft lease are, as I have said, that the farm was to be let "as lately possessed by the former tenant. What is the meaning of those words? It is quite clear that the right of way over the lessor's land is no part of the farm which is let, and therefore it is perfectly clear that there was no document of any kind which would give the right under the lease to the defendant.

With regard to the facts of the case as establishing any right, if such right could be established by parole evidence, my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has so entirely disposed of that part of the case that I need not trouble your Lordships with any observations upon it.

With regard to what has been said as to the use of this road from 1868 to 1873 by the respondent, even supposing that there had been actual permission to use it, that would not establish any right whatever or enable him to insist now that he has any right to use this road.

My Lords, under these circumstances I agree with my noble and learned friend that the interlocutor appealed against must be reversed.

Lord Hatherley concurred.

Lord O'Hagan.—My Lords, I am quite of the same opinion. I think it is a great misfortune that the House has not before it the judgment in the Court below. The very distinguished judge, Lord Neaves, who signs the memorandum of judgment, must have had reasons for coming to that conclusion, which, I think, are scarcely before us.

So far as I am concerned, I think that the finding of the Court that there was let to Colonel Duncan the right to use the road in question, is absolutely unsustained by the evidence. Mr Herschel argued very ingeniously that inasmuch as Good, the previous tenant of the farm, had used this road in a particular way, it was to be assumed that the succeeding tenant should have a right to use it in the same way. But, as has been said by my noble and learned friend just now, according to the only evidence we have of Good's claim to use it at all, that claim was founded by Good himself upon the mere statement that it had been indicated to him as the road going to Edinburgh at the time he took the farm. He did not pretend that he had any title at all to it. And to say that a man, by his enjoyment of the use of the road for a few years could bind a new proprietor, who came into possession only in 1865, and took a new tenant in 1868, appears to me to be a proposition that is not maintainable.

No. 10.

June 20, 1876.
Duncan v. Scott.

Putting that out of the question, I see nothing really in the case. There is nothing whatever in the documents in favour of the respondent. In the draft lease there is nothing whatever; and, as regards the note and acceptance of it, the argument is against him upon that, because the reference to the "common road" and the siding is a case of expressio unius exclusio alterius. It appears to me that these documents go entirely against his claim now before the House. As to user, mere user could not constitute a title or sanction any pretence of that kind. As far as the pointing out is concerned, we have a man pointing out this particular road, at an important time, no doubt, but in doing so he was going absolutely beyond his authority, inasmuch as we find the advertisement authorising him to point out "boundaries" only, and his own evidence proclaiming that he had no instructions whatever as to roads.

Upon the whole, my Lords, I entirely concur with my noble and learned friends that these interlocutors ought to be reversed.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed with expenses in the Court of Session; the interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-depute of the county of Midlothian on the 14th of July 1874 restored; and the case remitted.

LOCH & MACLAURIN, Westminster—JOHN T. MOWBRAY, W.S.—W. BUSHBY—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

THE PHOSPHATE SEWAGE COMPANY, Appellants.—Napier Higgins, Q.C.—H. Davey, Q.C.—Alexander Young.

JAMES ALEXANDER MOLLESON (Trustee in Peter Lawson and Son's Sequestration), Respondent.—John Pearson, Q.C.—Locock Webb, Q.C.

Bankrupt—Trustee—Claim—Constitution—Process—Foreign—Statute 19 and 20 Vict., cap. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856), secs. 50 and 126.—The estates of a firm, which had offices and carried on business both in England and Scotland, were sequestrated in Scotland. An English company claimed to be ranked in the sequestration for £65,000 as the price paid to the bankrupts under a contract of sale which the claimants alleged to be reducible on the ground of fraud, and at the same time commenced proceedings against the trustee and certain other persons in the Court of Chancery in England with a view to set aside the contract and to obtain a judgment for the £65,000. The trustee rejected the claim as unfounded, and the claimants appealed, and contended that the sequestration proceedings should be sisted pending the issue of the Chancery suit, or otherwise that a dividend or dividends should be set aside to meet the amount of the claim in case it should be sustained. Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that there were no grounds for interfering with the course of the sequestration, and that a proof of the averments on which the claim was based had been rightly allowed.

Fraud—Joint Stock Company—Sale of Concession.—Circumstances in which held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that a joint stock company, who had purchased a concession of a guano island, had failed to instruct fraud on the part of the sellers (who had no beneficial interest in the sale) to the effect of entitling the company to rescind the contract and claim repetition of the purchase-money.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. Chelmsford.
Ld. Selborne.

(In the Court of Session March 18, 1874, ante, vol. i., p. 840.)

The Court having allowed the parties a proof of their averments, evidence was led before Lord Young, and on 2d July 1874 his Lordship reported the proof and whole cause to the First Division.* The facts of the case, as they appeared from the evidence, were shortly as follows:—

In June 1868 the Government of San Domingo granted to Messrs Hartmont† and Company, of London, a concession of the guano, guanito, and phosphates, on the island of Alto Vela, upon certain conditions, for fifty years from 1st July 1869. Mr Hartmont having got an introduction to Messrs Peter Lawson and Sons, who were interested in such manures, induced them to enter into an agreement with him, of date 1st December 1868, whereby he undertook to assign the concession to them, and they, on their part, were to work the guano, and pay to Hartmont one-third of the profits realised. The Lawsons were, however, to take the whole risks, and pay all expenses. A subsequent concession was, on 8th May 1869, obtained by Hartmont from the Dominican Government, which also fell under the above agreement of December 1868. One of the conditions contained in the deeds which constituted these concessions was that the concessionaries were to ship every year from 1st January 1870 at least 10,000 tons of guano and phosphate from Alto Vela, paying the Dominican Government a royalty upon each ton. If this was not done the government reserved power to declare the concession void. The Lawsons proceeded to work Alto Vela during the year 1870, but did not ship 10,000 tons of material. The Dominican Government, however, did not declare the concession void, and the Lawsons continued to work the island and ship guano, &c., and pay royalties, until March 1871. These operations the Lawsons found to be much more expensive than they expected, and, in consequence, they considered, in the autumn of 1870 that it would be expedient to sell the concern to a company. Negotiations, with a view to bringing out a company to work the island and purchase the concession from the Lawsons were entered into between a Mr Begbie, a partner of the firm of Hartmont and Company, acting on behalf of the Lawsons and others who held interests in the concession, and a firm of financial agents in London, named Engelbach and Keir. A note of agreement between these parties was entered into on 21st December 1870, whereby the vendors agreed to sell the concession, with their rights and property in Alto Vela, "for the sum of £65,000 in fully paid-up shares of a company which is about to be formed."

The Lawsons, who, throughout their connection with Alto Vela, had expended upwards of £39,000, were, about March 1871, much pressed for money, and, accordingly, they arranged with Hartmont that he should purchase their whole interest in the concession for £10,000 in cash, and £2300 in acceptances. They were, however, to retain 500 £10 shares of the projected company. These shares were, in March and April 1871, purchased from the Lawsons by Hartmont for two sums of £3000 and £2000 advanced to them, but it was arranged that when issued they should stand in name of the Lawsons in trust for him.

---

* In a note to his interlocutor the Lord Ordinary stated that he had reported the case in order that the First Division, now that the character of the pursuers' case had been more fully disclosed, should have an opportunity of sisting proceedings till the issue of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery, which, in his Lordship's opinion, was the only Court competent to decide whether the claimants could set aside the contract of sale to establish the liability of the bankrupts to restore the price.

† Misprinted "Harcourt" in the report in the Court of Session, ante, vol. i. p. 840.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

The following deeds were then executed:—1. Assignment of the concession by Hartmont and Company to the Lawsons, dated 20th April 1871; 2. Agreement dated 28th April 1871, between the Lawsons, as vendors, and Engelbach and Keir, as purchasers, on behalf of the principal company, for the purchase of the concession, and the whole rights and interests of the vendors in Alto Vela, for the sum of £65,000, to be paid thus—£20,000 in fully paid-up shares, and £45,000 in cash. This agreement in one of its articles stipulated that the purchase-deeds for carrying the sale into effect should contain all usual and proper covenants by the vendors for title, restricted to their own acts and defaults. The prospectus of the company was issued on 10th May 1871, and subsequently on 29th May an indenture was executed between the Lawsons and the Phosphate Sewage Company whereby the vendors assigned and transferred the concession, &c. to the company for the price above-mentioned. The prospectus contained a statement that the Lawsons had expended upwards of £39,000 in connection with the island of Alto Vela, and this expenditure was at the proof established by the production of their books. After obtaining the concession from the Lawsons the company proceeded to work it, but only shipped 5000 tons in the first year.

A settling day and quotation were granted for the company on the Stock Exchange, and large profits were realised by Hartmont and others through sales of the shares, but the Lawsons never sold a single share, and made no profit. The information upon which this settling day and quotation was allowed by the committee of the Stock Exchange was supplied by the chairman and secretary of the company, and was to a large extent incorrect, the great number of shares held by Hartmont and Company and others, as the price of the concession, being concealed.

On 28th August 1872, Colonel Mendes, the agent for the Dominican Government, wrote Messrs Hartmont and Company, the grantees of the concession, complaining that neither in 1870 nor 1871 had the minimum quantity of phosphate been exported, and stating that the Government had in consequence the right to declare that the concession had been forfeited. He, however, proposed that some new arrangement be entered into to obviate the forfeiture. Messrs Hartmont and Company informed Colonel Mendes that the concession had been transferred to the Phosphate Sewage Company, and Colonel Mendes accordingly, on 4th October 1872, wrote to that company in terms similar to those employed in his letter to Messrs Hartmont and Company. Some negotiations were subsequently entered into, but eventually the concession was declared forfeited, and a fresh concession granted to a French company.

It appeared also that 1500 fully paid-up shares of the company, equivalent at the time to £15,000, were handed to Messrs Engelbach and Keir, the original promoters of the company, as promotion money. The balance of the purchase-money of the concession, exclusive of the 500 shares nominally held by the Lawsons for Hartmont, viz., £45,000, was divided among Hartmont, Begbie, Ogle, and others, who had aided in starting the company.

On 2d July 1874 the First Division of the Court of Session refused the appeal, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to confirm the deliverance of the trustee.*

---

* The following opinions were delivered:—

LORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, the memorandum of association of the Phosphate Sewage Company—the appellants and claimants in this case—is dated 1st May 1871, and registered on the 6th of the same month. They claim, in the sequestration of Messrs Peter Lawson and Son, a sum of £65,000, as being a debt due to them by the Messrs Lawson at the date of their sequestration,

No. 11. The Phosphate Sewage Company appealed to the House of Lords against the interlocutors allowing a proof and the interlocutor on the merits.

June 22, 1876. Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

with interest at five per cent from 31st May 1871 to the date of the sequestration, amounting altogether to £70,529; and the affidavit on which this claim is made sets out that these sums are due and owing by the bankrupts under the circumstances set forth at length in a bill of complaint in Chancery, filed on the 19th April 1873, between the Phosphate Sewage Company and a variety of other persons therein named, and they further depone in common form that no part of this money has been paid or compensated to them in any way, and that they hold no security over the bankrupts' estate. This sum of £65,000 is said to be the price paid under a certain contract of sale in which the Messrs Lawson stood in the position of vendors and the directors of the company in the position of vendees, and the claim is made upon the footing that the sale is reducible and may be set aside upon the ground of fraud.

Now, to deal satisfactorily with the question which has thus been raised it is necessary to attend to the history of the proceedings upon which this sale arose. It would appear that in the year 1868 a person of the name of Hartmont—whose name figures in the history of this case in a not very creditable way—had obtained a concession from the San Domingo Government of the phosphates and other similar substances in the island of Alto Vela; and the Messrs Lawson, who were naturally very much interested in all substances that could be used as manure, and who had at the time a great many speculations of their own of that description, came in contact with Mr Hartmont, and agreed with him to work those substances in the island of Alto Vela, and ship them to this country. The agreement which was made between those parties was on 1st December 1868, and the existing concession in favour of Hartmont was dated in the month of May preceding. But there was a new concession obtained in the following year, and it is not disputed that that concession fell under the agreement between Hartmont and the Messrs Lawson. The result was that Messrs Lawson worked the island of Alto Vela during the whole of the year 1870 and a part of the year 1871. They expended, undoubtedly, a very considerable amount of money upon it, and the returns do not seem to have been in proportion to the expenditure. In short, they were not making money by it, and they became desirous in consequence to dispose of their interest in the island, and to obtain in that way repayment of the large expenditure which they had made. It appears quite evidently from some of the letters, and also from the parole evidence, that at this time the Messrs Lawson were in difficulties. It does not appear that they were insolvent, but they were certainly in want of money, and therefore they found that the large expenditure which they had made on this Alto Vela undertaking was a very great inconvenience. I see that so early as 17th October 1870 Mr Graham Lawson had suggested the formation of a joint stock company to take up this concern, which he thought a very good concern, and one likely, by application of sufficient capital, to prove very profitable and advantageous. That is the first suggestion of a company being formed for that purpose, and I am bound to say that in that letter of 17th October, written by Mr Henry Graham Lawson, I do not see the suggestion of anything improper or fraudulent—the object being to get up a company for the purpose of taking over this undertaking upon fair and equitable terms. Mr Hartmont, however, had a very considerable interest and influence in this matter, because he was the person to whom the concession had originally been made by the San Domingo Government, and he still retained, under his agreement with Messrs Lawson, a considerable interest in the affair. And it becomes apparent, as we trace the history of those proceedings, that in the course of 1871 Mr Hartmont, either alone or with some of his other friends who are mentioned, conceived the project of getting this Alto Vela concern and the proposed company very much into his own hands; and I am very far from saying that, in the proceedings which followed, Mr Hartmont and some of his friends did not commit a very clear and gross fraud upon the public. But it rather appears to me that if it had not been for the ultimate object which Mr Hartmont had in view, and which he achieved

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.

Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the circumstances attending the litigation in this case are undoubtedly somewhat peculiar. with great success—viz., bringing this company out with the requisite number of shares having been subscribed to entitle him to go into the market, and, by misrepresentation, obtain from the Stock Exchange a settling-day and quotations, and then getting up the value of the shares in the market by fraudulent representations and deceit, and then selling out at a high price—if these things had not followed upon the history I am now tracing, I do not very well see there would have been any fraud upon the public at all; because merely to convert this Alto Vela undertaking into a joint stock company, got up in good faith and in regular form, would have been certainly nothing wrong in itself. The course of Mr Hartmont's proceedings may be seen very well from some letters which passed in the months of March and April 1871, in which he contrived to buy off Messrs Lawson, and certainly bought them off for no very large amount considering the great expenditure they had made upon Alto Vela. It comes to this, that he pays them £10,000 in cash and £2300 in acceptances, and stipulates that they are to have in addition 500 shares in the company which is to be formed, representing £5000, in all £17,300; and for that amount he acquires the whole right and interest of Messrs Lawson in the concession. Subsequently, however, Messrs Lawson being much in want of money, the £5000 worth of shares which they were to have is also converted into cash, Mr Hartmont first of all advancing £3000 and then an additional £2000, and Messrs Lawson undertaking to hold the 500 shares, when they come to be assigned to them, for behoof of Mr Hartmont. After this, the sale takes place which is said to be fraudulent, and the deeds which pass between the parties are, in the first place, a deed dated 20th April 1871, in which Mr Hartmont and Mr Begbie assign the concession to Messrs Lawson, and then a deed of 28th April 1871, by which Messrs Lawson sell and assign to Engelbach and Keir, the persons who were promoting the company; and then afterwards, when the company is formed, there is a regular deed of transfer by the Lawsons to the company. Now, it is said that there is fraud in the way in which this transaction was carried through, because, in the first place, the subject of the conveyance had really no existence—it had been lost or forfeited before it was made the subject of conveyance. That appears to me to be entirely a misunderstanding of the position of affairs at the time this conveyance was made. No doubt in the concession the parties, the concessionaries, undertook to ship 10,000 tons of guano and other similar substances from Alto Vela in the course of every year, beginning on 1st January 1870, and the San Domingo Government stipulated that if that obligation was not performed they should have the option of declaring the concession void, and making it void. During the year 1870 there certainly were not 10,000 tons shipped, and therefore it may be assumed that at the end of that year the San Domingo Government had the option of declaring the concession to be void, and so putting an end altogether to the rights of the concessionaries. But they did not do so. On the contrary, they allowed the Lawsons to go on, after 1st January 1871, shipping material from this island of Alto Vela; and then, after the company was formed, and when the concession had been transferred to them, they also allowed them to go on shipping for a very considerable period. The amount shipped by the company was, I think, 5000 tons; and all that goes on without any attempt upon the part of the San Domingo Government to exercise their right of declaring the concession to be void, and without there being any remonstrance upon their part as to the small shipments which had been made, until somewhere about the month of October 1872. It appears to me, therefore, that at the date of the contract of sale in May 1871 this concession had certainly not been lost. I think it is extremely doubtful, to say the least of it, whether, after the San Domingo Government had allowed the concessionaries to go on shipping after 1st January 1871, and taken their royalties upon the cargoes shipped, they were entitled still to come forward and say—"Because of the deficiencies of shipments in the year 1870 we will now put an end to this

No. 11. June 22, 1876. Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

The firm of Lawson and Son carried on business in Edinburgh and in London. They were sequestrated or became bankrupt in the beginning of the year 1873, and concession." If it were necessary to go into that subject at all I should say most undoubtedly that they were not entitled to do so—that they had lost their opportunity by allowing the shipments to go on and taking royalties upon these shipments. Of course, if at the end of 1871 there was again a default in the amount of shipments they might again have the right or option of putting an end to the concession; but they could not, I think, after May 1871, when this sale took place, proceed upon the deficiencies of the year 1870 as a ground for annulling the concession. But even supposing that were not so clear in point of law as I think it is, there does not appear to have been any desire on the part of the San Domingo Government to exercise the right they had. On the contrary, from everything we see, they were very anxious to go on with the contract they had made with these English traders; and the communications which passed between the secretary of the Phosphate Sewage Company and the representative of the San Domingo Government shew that the San Domingo Government was very anxious that they should go on, and go on of course on the footing that for the future they should comply with the obligation in the contract of shipping the full amount of 10,000 tons a-year. So that the fraud said to have been committed in this transfer and sale, by selling a thing that had really no value in respect that it had been already forfeited, I think falls entirely to the ground. But still further, it must be observed that even if there had been more apparent doubt respecting the continuance or endurance of this concession, that was a matter which was made fully known by the vendors to the vendees. It is obvious, on the face of the deed and other writings, as well as from the parole evidence, that the whole parties who were concerned in this matter were perfectly aware of the real state of the facts. It is said that a fraud was committed upon the company. I confess I find it exceedingly difficult to understand that statement. When the first deed was made between the Messrs Lawson, and Engelbach and Keir, who were getting up this company, there was no company to deceive; and after the company was formed, the directors, who were the only parties who could have been deceived in the transaction—for they were of course the parties who made the purchase and received the title from the Messrs Lawson—were not deceived, because they also, as it appears, were fully aware of the precise state of the facts. Therefore, there appears to me, in the first place, to have been nothing to conceal; and in the second place, that which was said to have been concealed was in point of fact not concealed but fully disclosed. But then it is said, that a fraud was practised by making it appear that the Messrs Lawson were the vendors in this transaction, and that Mr Hartmont was kept out of sight, his name not being disclosed as having any interest in the transaction. And the reason for doing that, it is said, was to impress people's minds with a sense of the good faith and straightforwardness of the transaction, by shewing that the sellers in the transaction were so respectable a firm as the Messrs Lawson. The Messrs Lawson, so far as I can see, had no object in parading their names, or in lending their names to any fraud. They had made their bargain with Mr Hartmont; they were bought off by the payment of £17,000, and really had no further interest in the matter. But I think it is not difficult to see why Messrs Lawson appear upon the face of the conveyance as the sellers of this concession. Although Mr Hartmont had been the original concessionary, the Messrs Lawson had in point of fact worked the whole concern during the year 1870, and were known to the San Domingo Government as the persons who were working the Alto Vela product; and the San Domingo Government would have been very loath, I should think, to recognise any one who had not obtained a title from Messrs Lawson. Therefore it was, I presume—for I can see no other good reason for it—that three deeds were executed at the time, instead of one deed directly, as has been suggested might have been done, by Mr Hartmont to the purchaser. Mr Hartmont, or rather Hartmont and Begbie, assigned in the first place to Messrs Lawson, to enable them to give a title to the company, and I think, without the trustee of the sequestrated estate was chosen in the usual manner in Scotland. The Phosphate Sewage Company, who are the appellants at your Lordships' bar, that circuity which has been described, it would not have been very easy to have made a perfectly satisfactory and good title in the person of the company or its directors. Therefore I cannot say I see any fraud in using the names of the Lawsons in this transaction.

It is further said that in the prospectus of the company, which was issued upon 10th May, after the company had been registered, there is a false statement introduced, to the effect that the Messrs Lawson had expended £39,000 upon the island of Alto Vela. "In connection with the island of Alto Vela" is the expression; and it certainly turns out, from the evidence of the trustee, that they had expended at least £39,000 in connection with the island of Alto Vela, so that there was in point of fact no mis-statement there at all—no false allegation or suggestion. It is not said in the prospectus that the value of that £39,000 would be found upon the island. That would be a very different statement indeed. The statement is made only for the purpose of shewing that the Messrs Lawson had had so much confidence in the undertaking in which they were engaged that they had expended that large sum of money upon it. But even if there had been any exaggeration or mis-statement in regard to the amount expended as stated in the prospectus, I do not see that the Messrs Lawson should be made answerable for that, or that they were parties to the preparing or issuing of this prospectus. But in truth the whole fraud really occurs after the time when the sale was made. The sale itself was the sale of a subject which had a real existence, and was of value,—whether over-estimated at £65,000 we have no occasion to consider. It is not said that £65,000 was too much for it if it was a real transaction; but that it was a really existing subject, and a subject of value, and was sold for the price specified is quite clear upon the face of these documents. And up to this point I confess I do not see any indication or symptom of fraud on the part of Messrs Lawson. It is very difficult to understand why a respectable firm of that kind should have lent themselves to a proposed fraud. I do not see what they were to gain by it; and I do not very much see, on the other hand, what Mr Hartmont, who is at the bottom of the fraud which was committed, had to gain by implicating the Lawsons in that fraud. And, therefore, unless there were clear proof that the Messrs Lawsons really were implicated in the fraud at the date when this sale was made, I do not think we could possibly sustain this claim, which depends entirely for its soundness upon the proof of fraud in connection with the contract. But, no doubt, after the sale was completed, and after the company was brought into existence, the price was paid of £65,000; and instead of being paid in cash, it was paid entirely in what are called "paid-up shares" of the company. This is made clear by the evidence of Mr Ogle. No doubt he says he received cash; but upon cross-examination it comes out quite clearly that by receiving cash he meant there were cross-entries made in the book which were intended to represent cash, but what he actually got delivered to him were paid-up shares of the company to the amount of £65,000, and these he divided amongst the parties concerned—Mr Hartmont, and Messrs Engelbach and Keir, who were the promoters of the company, and Messrs Lawson to the extent of the £5000 worth of shares which they were to take as part of their payment from Mr Hartmont, but which, as I said before, was afterwards converted into a payment to them in cash. Again, I do not know that there is anything illegal in persons who sell a valuable commodity to a company that has just been formed taking payment for that commodity in paid-up shares of the company. The illegality and the fraud consisted, I think, entirely in the use which was made of those paid-up shares, and in the manner in which Mr Hartmont and his friends went about the sale of those shares. In the first place, it was by fraudulent representation they got the shares of this company into the market at all,—by imposing upon the authorities of the Stock Exchange, and obtaining a settling-day and quotations. It is alleged very decidedly in the record here that the Messrs Lawson were participant in that conceived that they had a right to make a claim against Messrs Lawson and Son or their estate in bankruptcy, on the ground that they had a right as against fraud. Then the holders of those shares took means to raise their value in the market to an entirely fictitious amount by misrepresentation and by fictitious sale; and again, it is alleged on the record very strongly that the Messrs Lawson, and particularly Mr Henry Graham Lawson, who is specified by name as being engaged in this transaction, were largely implicated in this fraudulent sale, and had made large profits thereby. Now, there is not one single word of evidence from beginning to end to connect any of the Messrs Lawson either with the imposition practised upon the Stock Exchange or with the subsequent fraudulent transactions in the stock market. The evidence upon that point is an entire blank, and the Messrs Lawson themselves, who were examined, declared that they never held a share for their own behoof, and never sold a share of the stock. In these circumstances I confess I think the appellants have entirely failed to make out their case against Messrs Lawson. What case they may have against other parties, or in any other form, or in any other Court, it is not for me to say; but in order to success as claimants in this sequestration upon the estates of Messrs Lawson it was indispensable that they should shew that the £65,000 which they claimed was a debt owing by Messrs Lawson to them because it was the price which they had been paid under a fraudulent contract of sale,—a contract of sale which they had been induced to enter into by the fraud of the Messrs Lawson.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.

Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

But there are difficulties in the case, if it were at all necessary to enter into them. I confess I do not very well see upon what ground it is the appellants' company think that that £65,000 is to be paid in cash upon the annulling of this sale. That £65,000 in cash never was paid by the company. What they actually delivered as the price of the concession of Alto Vela was 6500 shares of the company,—paid-up shares, no doubt; but were these shares ever worth £65,000 at any time? Were they worth £65,000 at the time of the sale, or were they ever really of that value? That the shares were nominally of that value at one time in the market, and of much higher value, is no doubt true. But that was brought about by the fraud of parties with whom the Messrs Lawson have nothing to do,—I mean by proceedings with which the Messrs Lawson have nothing to do; and therefore it would be a very great difficulty and obstacle in the way of these appellants, even if they had succeeded otherwise in the foundation of their case, to shew how this debt, for it is claimed as a debt, of £65,000, can possibly be owing. Again, if the sale is to be annulled, even on the ground of fraud, there must be, I apprehend, a restitutio in integrum, and if there is to be a restitutio in integrum on one side, there must be equally so on the other. Now, is this company in a condition to retransfer the concession of Alto Vela to the Messrs Lawson or to anybody else representing the vendors in that transaction? They certainly are not, because it is abundantly clear that by their own proceedings and transactions with the San Domingo Government they have now finally lost this concession. But really these subordinate considerations I do not dwell upon, because I think the true ground of judgment here is that the appellants have entirely failed to bring home to the Messrs Lawson that fraud of which they complain, and which, they say, induced the company to enter into this contract.

I think it is very much to be regretted that we have not had the advantage of a judgment of the Lord Ordinary upon this question. It is a case of very considerable importance, and although I confess I do not entertain any doubt about the conclusion to which I think we should arrive, it has required a very considerable amount of consideration.

LORD DEAS.—I so entirely concur in the observations of your Lordship that it is not necessary for me to add almost anything. The leading ground of this claim is fraud upon the part of Messrs Lawson, and the character in which they are said to have committed that fraud is that of vendors of the concession of the island of Alto Vela, the party or parties upon whom the fraud is said to have them to rescind a contract which had been entered into for the transfer or sale to the Phosphate Company by Messrs Lawson and Son of a certain concession, been committed being the purchasers—the company or shareholders; and the fraud alleged consisted entirely of concealment, with the exception of certain misrepresentations said to have been made in the deed and in the prospectus. Now, in order that concealment may be a fraud by a seller upon a purchaser it must be concealment of something from the purchaser, and if the purchaser knows everything that can be known it is impossible that it can be concealment or fraud. There cannot be concealment from him if there is no concealment. Consequently, I do not see how, if the purchaser here, or those acting for and representing the purchaser, knew everything that the seller knew, there can possibly be that kind of fraud which alone is alleged here. That concealment, after all, seems to consist in a very small matter. It is concealment of the fact that they had not wrought or carried away from that island 10,000 tons in a year, and concealment of the fact that the Government of San Domingo had manifested their discontentment with that. Now, there is no concealment of the fact that they had not carried away 10,000 tons per annum; and as to the other concealment of the effect of that on the Government, the Government had not at that time manifested any dissatisfaction whatever with that fact. On the contrary, as your Lordship has pointed out, the Messrs Lawson were allowed to go on working and carrying away the guano, and the Government were accepting the lordships from time to time, and up to the time when this sale was effected there was no appearance of dissatisfaction, far less an intimation that the Government had availed itself of the option to annul the concession. The Government up to that time did not want to avail themselves of it. It was not a condition—it was not an irritancy in the deed, that if they did not carry away 10,000 tons per annum the concession was to be null. There was nothing of that kind. It was merely an option on the part of the Government that if that happened they might take advantage of it to annul the concession. But they had not only not availed themselves of the option, but it is clear as the sun that they did not want to avail themselves of it. A reasonably advantageous transaction had been entered into for them, and probably also for the parties taking the concession. It was better for the Government to get the substance sold and carried away and paid for than to let it lie there unproductive, as it had done for centuries,—probably longer than we think the world existed. And therefore, even if they were getting less than a fair lordship, it was important for the Government that a transaction of this kind should go on; and it is quite plain that they were very well pleased with the parties who they then supposed held the concession—viz. the Messrs Lawson. I daresay they knew just as much about the respectability of the position of the Messrs Lawson as we know here. They had an active agent apparently, who, I think, behaved throughout this matter with great temper and good sense; and in place of taking the first opportunity of exercising the option and getting rid of good tenants, he was anxious to keep them, and not desirous, apparently, to exchange them for a French company which offered to come forward. The transaction might, no doubt, have been a very good and a very profitable transaction for the original shareholders, who paid £10 per share. They might have been able to get a very good percentage on their money out of it, and, so far as we can see, they would have got a very good percentage out of it if they had had sufficient capital to carry it on. But what would have been a very good return to them would not have been so to gentlemen who paid £59 or £60 per share, and who might not have much capital left behind in order to carry on the affair. So far as we see, the only thing that prevented the Messrs Lawson from carrying on this concession themselves, and making a large profit by it, was the want of such a large amount of capital as was found to be necessary to carry it on, and which led them to think they had better get out of it in the best way they could, in place of going on with a thing that they had not capital to manage. But if they, or the company, had had a sufficient amount of capital to carry it on, there is no reason in the proof to hold that it would not have paid reasonably well. It was with some incidental rights, relating to the guano island belonging to the Government of San Domingo. The Phosphate Company, conceiving they had not originally a bubble. We see nowadays speculations of various kinds; we hear of mines being represented as capable of yielding great wealth when there is no mineral in them at all. That was not said to be the state of this island, or of this concession. The thing was there, and it was a reasonable speculation for anybody with sufficient capital to go through with it. As regards the position of Messrs Lawson, it is very necessary to see how it was that they were brought into this matter at all. Hartmont and other two associates had got the concession before Messss Lawson ever heard of it. They had got the concession in June 1868. Then Mr Hartmont seeks for and gets an introduction to Messrs Lawson, and, according to his account of it, he pays a large sum of money to get that introduction. He says in his evidence,—"Ogle and Begbie were interested with me in the Alto Vela concession from the beginning. (Q.) Do you mean that they paid so much money to you? (A.) They had paid no money to me. (Q.) Had they given you services? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Then that was the value of their services? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What were the services for which they got the £15,000 stock? (A.) Their services were from the beginning of 1868. They introduced me to Messrs Peter Lawson and Son, and when I was in San Domingo they looked after my business in London. (Q.) Anything more? (A.) No. (Q.) What was the nature of the business that they attended to during your absence? (A.) Freighting ships." So that they got £15,000, according to this evidence, for two services—one, apparently, the freighting of ships when he was abroad, and the other to introduce him to Messrs Lawson. I do not say it is proved that he had any sinister object in that, but it certainly looks very odd, because the first thing he does is to represent the concession of the island of Alto Vela in these glowing colours to Mr Graham Lawson. It is not necessary to notice any of the other Messrs Lawson here except Mr Graham Lawson, because if anybody was to blame they were all less to blame than he. He conducted the whole matter, and if there was a fraud it would lie on him and on nobody else. Well, Mr Hartmont represents the island in glowing terms to Mr Graham Lawson, and gets him, on the part of the firm, to agree to take the concession off his hands, upon the footing and condition that they shall disburse all the money. He is not to pay a penny, nor to become liable for a penny. They are to take all the liability, and to make all the disbursements, and he is to have one-third of the profits in name of commission, stipulating at the same time expressly that there is to be no partnership. He is merely to get a commission, but a commission to the extent of a third of the whole profits, they taking the whole risk, making all the disbursements, and paying all the expenses. That is the position into which Hartmont gets with reference to Messrs Lawson and Son. Whether or not he meant to defraud Messrs Lawson, it is plain that they were not meaning to defraud him, or looking to any unfair advantage at that time. Matters go on, and then Messrs Lawson find, not that they have got a bad bargain, so far as we can see, but that they had expended a large sum of money, £35,000 or £39,000. That they did expend a very large sum there can be no doubt, and it seems to have been all entered in their books from day to day in the most regular and accurate manner; and there is no dispute about the expenditure, except £2000 or £3000 less or more. They then found they had not the very large capital necessary to carry on with, and they wrote the letter to which your Lordship has referred. I do not say it is evidence, but it was written at that time to a gentleman who was acting for them, and there is no doubt they were truly representing the state of matters as then existing. In that letter they say they had been led to form an idea of getting a company to take it off their hands, because, they said, "we cannot go on working Alto Vela without help, and to pay handsomely it ought to be worked well." That is exactly what the engineer wrote,—that by laying down railroads and increasing the plant it might be made a very profitable and paying concern. That is the position in which they are when they want, very naturally, to get rid of this speculation, which is too heavy for them. Then, un-

No. 11. June 22, 1876. Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.

Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

this right against the estate of Lawson and Company, applied in the ordinary way to prove a claim or debt against the estate in the month of March 1873. doubtedly, Hartmont takes advantage of their necessities to get into his hands the formation of a company, seeing, very likely, what he could make of it if it were left to him. And he makes a bargain with the Messrs Lawson, that although the value of the concession might be estimated fairly at £65,000 their share of it is only to be £17,000. Upon the footing of relieving them of all further risk in the matter he says, We will make the price £65,000, but my associates are to get the whole of that, except £17,000. It is there, I think, that there comes in the main thing that could be laid to the charge of the Messrs Lawson,—I mean, that although they may not have had any fraudulent intention themselves, the question arises whether it was so negligent on their part to allow Mr Hartmont to lead them into the leading-strings into which he had got them for his own purposes,—whether they should not have seen through the thing to a certain extent, and seen that he was a man who might make a wrong use of matters after he got them into the position into which he wanted to get them. There is a difficulty there undoubtedly,—whether in point of law they were entitled to be so negligent, and just to do whatever was dictated to them by Hartmont, and whether they ought not to have seen what might come out of it, and whether there should not be a liability upon that ground. But that would be a very different liability,—a liability upon negligence; and I do not think it was pressed on us in argument that in point of law any negligence of that kind would lay the foundation of this claim. That is not the ground on which it is put. It is upon the ground of fraud, and the motive of the fraud is distinctly stated on this record. There is no fraud without a motive. You may not be able to discover the motive, but the fraud requires to be very clear in itself if you cannot discover any motive for it. But when the party charging the fraud tells you the motive, you are bound and entitled to take it that that was the motive; and if that motive is not proved, but disproved, then that surely goes very deep into the question whether there can be said to be fraud at all. Now, it is distinctly alleged on record that the object of the Messrs Lawson in entering into this fraud was to make profit by it in the way that the other parties seem to have done. But there is no more remarkable part of this case to my mind,—no part of it that makes me more cautious to throw any doubt on the honesty of the Messrs Lawson,—than this, that while they had the opportunity, if they had chosen, not only to have made money by it, but to have made money by it to an amount that would have released them from all their difficulties, they did not sell one single share in the market at a premium, as these other parties did. It is perfectly plain that if they had chosen to stipulate that they should get paid-up shares, with the power to go into the market and sell them at a profit if they thought proper, they would have got them. There would have been no objection whatever to give them a large amount of shares, which they could have gone into the market and sold. If they had stipulated for that, and got it, there seem to be no bounds almost to the amount of money that they might have made. Mr Hartmont tells us himself that in one hour he sold 1000 shares at £56; so that he made £56,000 in a single hour. How many more transactions of that kind he had he does not tell us. How much money there is in his pocket I do not know. The misfortune is that when money gets into one's pocket in that sort of way it very often burns a hole in it, and it does not remain long there; but if he has kept that in his pocket, he must be a very rich man; and if he could make £56,000 in that way in a single hour is it not clear as the sun that the Messrs Lawson, if they had chosen to stipulate for it, might have gone into the market and sold the shares for £100,000 or £200,000 of profit, and relieved themselves from all their difficulties. But not having availed themselves of that power to the extent of a single share, and that being the motive falsely alleged against them, it seems to me a very startling thing to say that, in the circumstances of this case, we are to reduce the contract upon the ground of fraud. I have only to add that I entirely agree with your Lordship in the remark that it is very much to be regretted that we have not had the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in this case.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

They made their claim before the trustee in the sequestration; and in that claim they stated that they were about to file a bill—in point of fact had prepared a bill to be filed—in the Court of Chancery in England, alleging their

---

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am of the same opinion on the merits of this case, which are now before us for disposal on the proof. The sequestration is here, and is proceeding, and in the sequestration this question has arisen. I feel bound to say that the getting up of this company, the preliminary arrangements in regard to it, the preparation and issuing of the prospectus, and the terms of it, the prior agreement among some of the parties, the large sums paid for promotion-money, and the ultimate sale to the Phosphate Company, were to a large extent the offspring of a fraudulent intention, and the execution of a fraud against the public. In regard to the conduct of some of the parties engaged and acting together in these proceedings I fear there can be no doubt of its fraudulent character. But I entirely agree with your Lordship in thinking that actual personal fraud on the part of any of the Messrs Lawson has not been instructed. The claimants have failed to prove their averments of fraud against the Messrs Lawson, or any of them. The object and purpose of the fraud appears to have been to give to the scheme a false and deceptive attraction, to run up the shares to a premium and sell them at a high price; and this object was probably attained by several, certainly by Mr Hartmont, who says that his motive was "purely philanthropic," but who at the same time sold 1000 shares at £56 a share—shares issued at £10 a share, and of which the last price obtained appears to have been £2, and dear at the money—and who admits that he had besides that dealt largely in the shares. But no shares were so held or so disposed of by Messrs Lawson, or by any of them; and if Mr Graham Lawson, who was the party immediately acting—the discretion and judgment of whose conduct cannot be defended—had really shared and carried out the fraudulent aims of those who got up the concern, he had ample opportunity; for then, as Lord Deas has well observed, he might have made a large fortune, for he could easily have obtained any number of shares, and could easily have sold them at a very high premium, but he did not sell one either at a premium or otherwise. He did not do so, or attempt to do so, and while I admit his indiscretion, I cannot perceive any fraud in his conduct. If there had been here an action by bona fide shareholders who were deceived and defrauded by the parties to the transactions, that would have presented a very different question for decision, and then there would have been an action against the company. It is most important that the public be protected against the fraud of parties acting in combination, in the manner here explained, for the getting up of a company and the disposing of shares. But we have no such case here. Whatever fraud there was in this transaction was fraud on the part of the purchasers as well as on the part of the vendors; and the party who received the subject sold was just as fully in the knowledge of everything as the party who transferred the thing sold. There was no deception between the two. If both were fraudulent, the public was the common victim. But these claimants now before us do not represent the public; and those whom they do represent were not deceived, and not wronged, for they were themselves parties to whatever fraud was perpetrated on the public. My great difficulty is that these claimants, who are in the position of pursuers, have not explained, though asked repeatedly to explain, who were deceived or who were wronged. They talk about the fraud on the part of those who got up the concern, and of those who entered into this transaction; but whom did these parties deceive that is now here? No one. The only parties deceived were the unfortunate parties who bought at a high premium afterwards—not the parties now before us. The company, and those who represent the company, were not deceived. I think the public were undoubtedly deceived, and that the getting up and promotion of the company as instructed by the evidence was a fraudulent device; but it was a fraud on the public. These claimants, however, do not represent the public, nor do they represent any one entitled to restitution.

On the other points I have nothing to add.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

case against the estate of Lawson and Son, and against other persons as to whom they conceived that they were entitled to similar relief. In point of fact the bill in the Court of Chancery in England had not been filed, but it was filed shortly afterwards—I think in the course of a month or two.

On, I think, the 24th of June in that year, within a day or two of the time when, according to the Scotch bankruptcy law, the trustee of the estate would be bound to make what is called his first deliverance—to pronounce his first judgment—on the debts claimed before him, lest the trustee should decide this case the company withdrew their claim, and then, having tided over the first deliverance of the trustee, they re-introduced their claim on the 28th of June, four days afterwards, and kept it alive. The suit in the Court of Chancery in England was in the meantime going on. The respondent Molleson, the trustee, appeared in that suit and protested against the jurisdiction, and said that the proceedings in the sequestration were pending in Scotland, and that the claim ought to be decided there. That was in the month of July 1873, and from that time until the following January it appears that no proceedings were taken in the English Chancery suit. I daresay the delay could be accounted for by the difficulty of getting the answers from the other defendants. But in the meanwhile in Scotland the sequestration and the proceedings under it were going on, and the trustee, having before him a claim made by the Phosphate Sewage Company to prove against the estate, was obliged to adjudicate upon that claim. He did adjudicate upon it, and adjudicated adversely to the Phosphate Sewage Company. He expressed his opinion that they had no right to make the claim.

Thereupon the Phosphate Sewage Company appealed to the Court of Session—an appeal which it was competent to them by the law of Scotland to institute. By the law of Scotland, under an appeal of that kind, it becomes the course, if the case is one worthy of solemn litigation, that the parties have an opportunity of lodging a condescendence and answers, and a proof is given to them. A condescendence was lodged by the Phosphate Sewage Company, and was followed by pleas in law on their part and on the part of the trustee, Molleson. That condescendence and answers are, to all intents and purposes, as your Lordships will observe, the pleadings in an English suit. They were just as much the pleadings of the parties in Scotland as the bill and answer are the pleadings between the parties in England, and to the condescendence your Lordships must look for the allegation of the case upon which the Phosphate Sewage Company found their right to a claim against the estate of Lawson and Son.

The condescendence gives a narrative of the transaction with regard to this concession, and so far as the narrative relates to those transactions I will not delay your Lordships by going through it. But when I examine the condescendence for the purpose of discovering what is the fraud or the misrepresentation by reason of which the Phosphate Sewage Company say they have a right to rescind the bargain made with Messrs Lawson and Son, I find that the allegations amount to these:—There are three grounds, and only three, by reason of which it is alleged in the condescendence that the contract should be rescinded. The first is this, that in a prospectus for the purpose of founding and obtaining subscribers for shares in the Phosphate Company, to be formed for the purpose of taking over this concession, it was alleged that the vendors had expended more than £39,000 up to that time in connection with the island of Alto Vela, the island as to which the concession had been given. The vendors were Messrs Lawson and Son. The second ground was that at the time the concession was professed to be sold by Lawson and Son to the Phosphate Sewage Company the concession had in point of fact become void, because the quantity of guano which Messrs Lawson and Son, the concessionaries, were bound to export every year had not been exported. And the third ground alleged was that certain dealings had taken place on the Stock Exchange with regard to the shares which had been given by the Phosphate Sewage Company as the price for the transfer of the concession.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

Now, as to the first of these grounds, very little was said in argument at your Lordships' bar on the allegation in the prospectus. Even supposing that Messrs Lawson and Son were to be connected with that prospectus—of which I am bound to say I have not seen any evidence satisfactory to my own mind—the allegation in the prospectus was this, that the exporters had expended more than £39,000 up to that time, not in any particular mode of expenditure, but in connection with the island of Alto Vela. And the books of Messrs Lawson and Son having been produced, there is no doubt that that statement is true to the letter. They kept an account of all their expenditure as to the island from the time they became connected with it, and there is no doubt their money accounts shew the expenditure of upwards of the sum of money here mentioned. Whether other items by way of credit ought to be taken into account might be a question if the whole account had to be taken. But what we have to deal with is simply this allegation, which cannot be stated to be in any way a false allegation, or one containing misrepresentation.

My Lords, I will take the third ground next—with regard to the dealings in the shares—because that again has been very little argued at your Lordships' bar, for, in point of fact, my Lords, that is not a part of the case which can have any bearing whatever upon the validity of the contract between Messrs Lawson and Son and the Phosphate Sewage Company. Whether it is the case or not that shares given by the Phosphate Sewage Company as the price for the concession were handled or used improperly—used for the purpose of a fictitious value being run up with regard to them on the Stock Exchange—that is a matter subsequent to the contract altogether. It may be a matter as to which the shareholders in the Phosphate Company may have some claim to redress, but it is not a matter which will in any way go to void a contract which had actually been made before that time, and the validity or invalidity of which must be judged of anterior to the transactions in these shares.

Then, my Lords, I come, in the third place, to the ground which I reckoned as the second amongst the three, namely, the allegation that at the time of the contract the concession had become invalid by reason of the fact that there was not a proper export of guano. Now, the matter stands in this way: The concession contained this clause (the 7th article):—"In the event of the concessionaries not exporting the minimum quantity stipulated in article 3" (the minimum quantity being 10,000 tons of guano, or guanito, or phosphate of lime, annually), "the Dominican Government shall have the right to declare the present concession void, and to take such measures as it may think proper." The concession was not to be void, but there was to be a right in the Government of San Domingo to declare the concession void under those circumstances. My Lords, at the time when the contract with the Phosphate Sewage Company was made it appears that the 10,000 tons per annum had undoubtedly not up to that time been exported. A short time, a year or two, had elapsed before the contract was made, and what course the Government of San Domingo would have taken in consequence, if matters had rested there, might be very doubtful. It does not appear that any price, any gross sum, was paid for this contract in the first instance, which therefore the Government of San Domingo might have retained and held as forfeited. The Government of San Domingo were deeply interested in promoting the continuance of a concession which would bring in to them the royalties which were to be paid upon the exportation of guano. It cannot be said to be a matter of certainty, but it is probable from what we find here that it would not be their interest or intention to take advantage of this clause enabling them to forfeit that contract.

But, my Lords, without dwelling upon that, what your Lordships find is this, that those persons who were acting on behalf of the company, and whose acts on behalf of the company are not in any way impeached on the face of this condescendence, although they have been impeached at your Lordships' bar—those persons, acting on behalf of the company, and for whose acts the company must be responsible, as they take advantage of their acts, were perfectly alive to the fact that the 7th clause of the concession was to the effect that I have read, and they made it one of the requisitions with regard to the title on the sale, that evidence should be given that the minimum quantity of guano had been exported, and that therefore the concession had not become voidable. The answer given to that was not an assurance of any matter of fact, but a statement that the purchasers must rest upon the covenants for title, and that covenants for title would be given. My Lords, when we remember what is done every day—as I took the liberty of reminding the learned counsel at the bar, with regard to sales of leaseholds—when we look at what the circumstances of this particular case were with regard to the Government of San Domingo, it appears to me by no means a strange or unnatural course which was taken in this instance with reference to this question of the voidability of the contract. But at all events it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the matter which brings home to Messrs Lawson and Son any misrepresentation, any concealment, any fraud, for which the contract can, as to them, be voided.

Those, my Lords, are the grounds, and, so far as I can find, the only grounds, in the condescendence upon which it is sought to have it declared that the contract with Messrs Lawson and Son should be rescinded, and that they should be made liable to hand back any benefits they had received under it. But I must mention, in order to make clear what further I have to say, that two more grounds have been alleged at your Lordships' bar, and have been stated at the bar to be grounds which have come into prominence in the litigation in England, and to have been pressed in the litigation—and, as we were told, pressed with success against some or all of the defendants. It is said that in the price paid to Lawson and Son upon the occasion of this purchase by the Phosphate Company—a price which altogether amounted to £65,000—there was included £15,000 which did not go either into the funds of Messrs Lawson and Son or into the hands of those other persons who had interests along with them in the concession—I mean Hartmont and Co., and Ogle—but went, on the contrary, into the hands of two persons of the name of Engelbach and Keir, and that Engelbach and Keir were themselves acting as agents for the Phosphate Sewage Company, and were professing to constitute—to "get up," as it is called—that company; and then it is said that £15,000 having thus been appropriated by those who were acting as agents for the Phosphate Sewage Company with the vendors were Messrs Lawson and Son. The second ground was that at the time the concession was professed to be sold by Lawson and Son to the Phosphate Sewage Company the concession had in point of fact become void, because the quantity of guano which Messrs Lawson and Son, the concessionaries, were bound to export every year had not been exported. And the third ground alleged was that certain dealings had taken place on the Stock Exchange with regard to the shares which had been given by the Phosphate Sewage Company as the price for the transfer of the concession.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

Now, as to the first of these grounds, very little was said in argument at your Lordships' bar on the allegation in the prospectus. Even supposing that Messrs Lawson and Son were to be connected with that prospectus—of which I am bound to say I have not seen any evidence satisfactory to my own mind—the allegation in the prospectus was this, that the exporters had expended more than £39,000 up to that time, not in any particular mode of expenditure, but in connection with the island of Alto Vela. And the books of Messrs Lawson and Son having been produced, there is no doubt that that statement is true to the letter. They kept an account of all their expenditure as to the island from the time they became connected with it, and there is no doubt their money accounts shew the expenditure of upwards of the sum of money here mentioned. Whether other items by way of credit ought to be taken into account might be a question if the whole account had to be taken. But what we have to deal with is simply this allegation, which cannot be stated to be in any way a false allegation, or one containing misrepresentation.

My Lords, I will take the third ground next—with regard to the dealings in the shares—because that again has been very little argued at your Lordships' bar, for, in point of fact, my Lords, that is not a part of the case which can have any bearing whatever upon the validity of the contract between Messrs Lawson and Son and the Phosphate Sewage Company. Whether it is the case or not that shares given by the Phosphate Sewage Company as the price for the concession were handled or used improperly—used for the purpose of a fictitious value being run up with regard to them on the Stock Exchange—that is a matter subsequent to the contract altogether. It may be a matter as to which the shareholders in the Phosphate Company may have some claim to redress, but it is not a matter which will in any way go to void a contract which had actually been made before that time, and the validity or invalidity of which must be judged of anterior to the transactions in these shares.

Then, my Lords, I come, in the third place, to the ground which I reckoned as the second amongst the three, namely, the allegation that at the time of the contract the concession had become invalid by reason of the fact that there was not a proper export of guano. Now, the matter stands in this way: The concession contained this clause (the 7th article):—"In the event of the concessionaries not exporting the minimum quantity stipulated in article 3" (the minimum quantity being 10,000 tons of guano, or guanito, or phosphate of lime, annually), "the Dominican Government shall have the right to declare the present concession void, and to take such measures as it may think proper." The concession was not to be void, but there was to be a right in the Government of San Domingo to declare the concession void under those circumstances. My Lords, at the time when the contract with the Phosphate Sewage Company was made it appears that the 10,000 tons per annum had undoubtedly not up to that time been exported. A short time, a year or two, had elapsed before the contract was made, and what course the Government of San Domingo would have taken in consequence, if matters had rested there, might be very doubtful. It does not appear that any price, any gross sum, was paid for this contract in the first instance, which therefore the Government of San Domingo might have retained and held as forfeited. The Government of San Domingo were deeply interested in promoting the continuance of a concession which would bring in to them the royalties which were to be paid upon the exportation of guano. It cannot be said to be a matter of certainty, but it is probable from what we find here that it would not be their interest or intention to take advantage of this clause enabling them to forfeit that contract.

But, my Lords, without dwelling upon that, what your Lordships find is this, that those persons who were acting on behalf of the company, and whose acts on behalf of the company are not in any way impeached on the face of this condescendence, although they have been impeached at your Lordships' bar—those persons, acting on behalf of the company, and for whose acts the company must be responsible, as they take advantage of their acts, were perfectly alive to the fact that the 7th clause of the concession was to the effect that I have read, and they made it one of the requisitions with regard to the title on the sale, that evidence should be given that the minimum quantity of guano had been exported, and that therefore the concession had not become voidable. The answer given to that was not an assurance of any matter of fact, but a statement that the purchasers must rest upon the covenants for title, and that covenants for title would be given. My Lords, when we remember what is done every day—as I took the liberty of reminding the learned counsel at the bar, with regard to sales of leaseholds—when we look at what the circumstances of this particular case were with regard to the Government of San Domingo, it appears to me by no means a strange or unnatural course which was taken in this instance with reference to this question of the voidability of the contract. But at all events it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the matter which brings home to Messrs Lawson and Son any misrepresentation, any concealment, any fraud, for which the contract can, as to them, be voided.

Those, my Lords, are the grounds, and, so far as I can find, the only grounds, in the condescendence upon which it is sought to have it declared that the contract with Messrs Lawson and Son should be rescinded, and that they should be made liable to hand back any benefits they had received under it. But I must mention, in order to make clear what further I have to say, that two more grounds have been alleged at your Lordships' bar, and have been stated at the bar to be grounds which have come into prominence in the litigation in England, and to have been pressed in the litigation—and, as we were told, pressed with success against some or all of the defendants. It is said that in the price paid to Lawson and Son upon the occasion of this purchase by the Phosphate Company—a price which altogether amounted to £65,000—there was included £15,000 which did not go either into the funds of Messrs Lawson and Son or into the hands of those other persons who had interests along with them in the concession—I mean Hartmont and Co., and Ogle—but went, on the contrary, into the hands of two persons of the name of Engelbach and Keir, and that Engelbach and Keir were themselves acting as agents for the Phosphate Sewage Company, and were professing to constitute—to "get up," as it is called—that company; and then it is said that £15,000 having thus been appropriated by those who were acting as agents for the Phosphate Sewage Company with the knowledge of Lawson and Son, the Phosphate Sewage Company had a right to repudiate the whole of the bargain, and that Lawson and Son, being privy to the mode in which Engelbach and Keir had acted, having allowed them to act as they did, must also be held liable to have the contract rescinded as against them. The second ground was this, that throughout the deeds which completed the sale of the concession to the Phosphate Sewage Company, Messrs Lawson and Son were treated as the vendors, and the only vendors, whereas Hartmont, and his partners Begbie and Ogle, had interests, and that the public at large were induced to look with more favour upon the company, thinking that the property came from and was sold by Lawson and Son, than they would have looked upon it had they known that there were other proprietors who got part of the purchase-money, that is to say, the persons whose names I have mentioned.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

My Lords, I do not propose to ask your Lordships to go into an examination of the validity of these grounds for relief. I may say that upon the materials before your Lordships it is very difficult indeed to be satisfied that Lawson and Son are to be affected in any way with the knowledge that the £15,000 to which I have referred was paid to, was taken by, and was intended for, Engelbach and Keir. And with regard to the other ground, as to the persons who appeared to be the vendors, it seems to me to be a very violent assumption to say that, without more, the fact that those who have a prominent interest in property to be sold appear to be the only vendors selling the property, and that the other persons who have an interest, and who are to receive a part of the purchase-money, are not named or made conveying parties upon the face of the deed, is necessarily a badge or indication of fraud. But, my Lords, it is sufficient to say that those are not grounds alleged upon the face of this condescendence, or this pleading, for any relief whatever in the sequestration in Scotland.

My Lords, in passing from the condescendence to the pleas, your Lordships will find that upon the condescendence, and without referring to the words of the pleas themselves, the issues that were taken were these:—The first issue was this—It was alleged that the suit having been instituted in England, the Court in Scotland ought to sist the proceedings there with regard to this claim, ought not to proceed upon it, but ought to wait for the adjudication upon the case of the Phosphate Sewage Company in a suit in the Court of Chancery, putting aside a dividend to await the result of that litigation. That was the first issue. The second issue was this, that the grounds of relief alleged in the condescendence—those three grounds to which I have specifically adverted already—afforded a reason why the contract should be rescinded and the Phosphate Sewage Company allowed to prove against the estate of Lawson and Son for the purchase-money upon the rescission of the contract. Now, my Lords, if the first of those issues, namely, the issue raised by the first and second pleas, that the proceedings ought to be sisted until the result of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery in England was known, were to succeed, of course your Lordships need not take any account of the other pleas as to the grounds of relief alleged in the condescendence.

My Lords, I will consider first the case for relief arising upon the first two pleas. Those pleas are these—the first plea says—"The present proceedings should be sisted until the issue of the chancery suit referred to, as in the said suit the same questions are raised as in this process, and will fall to be determined in a case in which the present respondent is a compearing party." And the second plea is,—"The amount of the foresaid first dividend, and of any subsequent dividends effeiring to the appellant's claim, ought to be set aside to meet the issue of the said suit in Chancery; and an order should be pronounced upon the respondent to that effect."

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

Now, my Lords, I ask upon what grounds are those pleas to be maintained? There is a bankruptcy in Scotland—the assets to be administered are in Scotland, and the trustee, who is the guardian of those assets, is in Scotland. The persons who make a claim against those assets go to Scotland, and make their claim in Scotland, and they do all that before any proceedings whatever are instituted in England. They are allowed a condescendence, and they are allowed proof in Scotland. They may state any case which they have to allege upon their condescendence, and they may prove it upon their proof. They have a diligence by which they can recover all the documents which are in the possession of the defenders, and, as we observe here, they have the advantage of examining the persons who are principally concerned in the transactions which are impeached.

My Lords, if in that state of things there is any want of power in the Court of Scotland to adjudicate upon a case of this kind, then it may well be that the proceedings should be arrested or stayed in order that some other Court, which has the power, may adjudicate upon the claim which is made. But is there any want of power in the Scotch Court? The learned Judges say there is not. The learned Judges unanimously tell us that it is the common practice of the Courts in Scotland, where a claim is made in a sequestration to constitute a debt, or to constitute a liability to damages, to admit the party claiming to constitute that claim if he is able to do so. A full opportunity has been afforded to the parties here to constitute their claim, if they are able. If they have not alleged in their condescendence as much as they have alleged in their bill in Chancery in England it is their own act, and one for which no person but themselves is answerable. My Lords, I am bound to say that it appears to me that it would be casting upon the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy in Scotland, and upon the administration of the bankruptcy law in Scotland, a very considerable and a very grave reproach, if your Lordships were to accede to the argument that there is any want of power in the Court of Scotland to adjudicate in a case of this kind.

But then it is said that there are other persons who are parties to the suit in England, and that it is much more convenient that the matter should be adjudicated upon once for all in the presence of all parties. My Lords, I say, in the first place, it would be a very grave question whether the adjudication of the Court in England would not be examinable in Scotland, so far at all events as the judgment of a foreign Court is examinable. But I by no means accede to the proposition, at least as a self-evident proposition, that it is convenient to have this adjudication in the presence of all the parties concerned. Your Lordships have been told that the circumstances under which upon a claim of this kind proof is admitted in Scotland upon a bankruptcy are extremely different from the circumstances under which it is admitted in bankruptcy in England. The Court in England is asked to declare, not merely that Messrs Lawson and Son are liable, but that there is to be a right to a particular proof against their trustee in a Scotch sequestration. How is the Court of Chancery in England to tell what is the course in Scotland with regard to proof, or what is the kind of proof which, according to the Scotch law of sequestration, ought to be allowed? The case against Messrs Lawson, be it well founded or be it not well founded, is one which can be perfectly well separated from the case against the other parties, who are said to be liable to the Phosphate Sewage Company; and I can see no reason why the case, if there is power in the Scotch Court to adjudicate upon it, should not be adjudicated upon there. And I repeat, I also see no reason to doubt that there is perfect power in the Scotch Court to adjudicate upon it.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

Therefore, my Lords, I submit to your Lordships that the first two pleas in this case entirely fail, and that the Court in Scotland were right—the Lord Ordinary in the first instance, and the Court of Session afterwards—in holding that there was no ground for sisting the proceedings, and that the claim must be tried upon its merits.

Then, my Lords, upon the merits of the claim this other plea is alleged (the fourth)—"The sale of the concession in question having been fraudulently made to the appellants' company by the said firm of Peter Lawson and Son and individual partners thereof, for the purpose and in the circumstances condescended on, and the same having been annulled, the appellants are entitled to be reimbursed the sum paid therefor, with interest, all as contained in the appellants' claim, and the respondent should be ordained to admit the said claim accordingly." The fifth plea is,—"The said concession having, to the knowledge of the said Peter Lawson and Son, and individual partners, been at the date of the said sale liable to be forfeited, and having been subsequently declared void in respect of what had occurred prior to the said sale, the appellants are entitled to have repetition of the purchase-price paid by them, and they ought to be admitted as creditors accordingly." Your Lordships will observe that those two pleas are both of them in terms founded upon what is alleged in the condescendence, and I have already referred to what is alleged in the condescendence and submitted to your Lordships, that it does not found a case for relief against Messrs Lawson and Son.

My Lords, to what I have said I have very little more to add, but I must call your Lordships' attention to another circumstance connected with the case. On the materials before your Lordships I own that it appears to me that if there were not those objections to the claim of the Phosphate Company to which I have already referred, there would have to be considered another very serious objection, arising from the delay which took place before any claim was made to rescind the contract in question. The contract is completed in the year 1871—I think in the month of May of that year; the claim to rescind it is made early in the year 1873. There are certain vague allegations as to the company's having been in ignorance—there is an allegation that what first came to their knowledge was a communication from the Government of San Domingo which resulted in a notice or threat to forfeit the concession. Now, my Lords, upon that I must make this observation. Your Lordships find that from the middle of 1871, when the company was formed, when they either took possession or were entitled to take possession of the concession and the place where it was to be worked, until the date of this communication from the Government of San Domingo, the matter was in the hands of the Phosphate Company themselves. It was for them to take care that they kept alive the concession by exporting the necessary quantity of guano. There is no evidence that they might not have done so. There is no evidence whatever as to what the state of the island was, or the quantity of guano or guanito that might have been obtained. In point of fact they did not apparently export the necessary quantity; but it would rather appear from the communication to which I have referred, from the Government of San Domingo, that their claim to forfeit the concession was as much for what had been omitted to be done after the concession came into the hands of the Phosphate Company as for anything that was omitted to be done before that time; and it would appear to me that the great probability (to say nothing more) in the case is that if the Phosphate Company had adhered to the terms of the concession from the time they came into possession no forfeiture of the concession whatever as against them would have been made.

But apart from that, my Lords, I want to know what is the justification given for the delay in making any claim to rescind the contract? Everything which ought to have been known, or could have been desired to be known, with regard to the subject-matter, must have been in the hands of the agents of the Phosphate Company from the time that company was formed. It has been said, No doubt the agents of the Phosphate Company knew this—the directors and the secretary and the other officers knew it; but it is said, they were all more or less implicated in what has been termed the conspiracy—the scheme to defraud the company at large. My Lords, I have to look at the condescendence in the present case upon that subject, and I find in the condescendence no allegation whatever of that kind; and I find upon this condescendence a perfect blank as regards any explanation of the delay between the middle of the year 1871, when the company was founded, and the beginning of the year 1873, when the claim to rescind this contract was made. Perhaps it is not necessary in this case to ground any decision upon this delay, but if it were necessary it appears to me that the delay alone would be fatal, upon the allegations with which we have to deal, to the case of the appellants.

My Lords, I will add one word more to what I have said. I have anxiously endeavoured in what I have laid before your Lordships to avoid even the appearance of expressing any opinion whatever upon the litigation which has been proceeding in the Court of Chancery in England. That litigation is not in any way before your Lordships. Your Lordships are called upon to pronounce an opinion upon the proceedings in Scotland, and upon these proceedings only. I say that, because your Lordships were informed by the learned counsel at the bar that the proceedings in England are not yet terminated, but are, at all events in some respects, the subject of a rehearing or appeal. It is therefore most important that your Lordships should not be supposed, upon pleadings which are not before you, and upon evidence which is not before you, to give any opinion which might lead to misapprehension and misconstruction elsewhere. The opinion which I have ventured to express is formed upon the Scotch pleadings in the sequestration and upon the evidence taken in Scotland, and upon that alone.

I need not say, my Lords, after what I have expressed, that the advice which I shall offer to your Lordships is to affirm the interlocutors which are appealed against here, and to dismiss the present appeal, with costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—As I agree entirely with all that has been said by my noble and learned friend, the few observations which I propose to add will relate solely to the question as to the refusal to sist the proceedings by the Court of Session.

The appellants, the Phosphate Company, proceeded under the Scotch sequestration to make a claim of a debt from the bankrupts' estate upon the ground of their being liable to damages for being parties to a fraudulent transaction by which the company were deceived into purchasing a worthless concession of a guano island in San Domingo. The trustee decided against the claim. The appellants appealed in regular course against the decision. The Court of Session considered all the circumstances of the transaction, and exonerated the bankrupts from being implicated in the fraud, and affirmed the trustee's deliverance.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876. Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

The appellants assert that the Court of Session being informed that there was a proceeding in Chancery in England to rescind the sale and to make the bankrupts and others liable in damages to the whole extent of the purchase-money, the Court of Session ought to have sisted the proceedings until the determination of the Chancery suit. The appellants hardly go the length of saying that the Court of Session was bound to sist the proceedings, but only that they should, in the exercise of a just and proper discretion, have done so. But the Court having regular possession of the proceedings, there was no reason why they should hold their hands until it should be known how the English Court would deal with the suit before it. They were competent to decide whether the trustee had properly rejected the claim, and, fully examining the evidence and all the circumstances, they determined that if there had been a fraud committed there was no evidence to shew that Messrs Lawson were implicated in it, in which, I think, they came to a right conclusion. This certainly constituted a sufficient reason against remitting the case to another forum, and for affirming the deliverance of the trustee.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. I take it to be quite clear that the Scotch jurisdiction in a Scotch bankruptcy is exclusive, and that when in an Act of Parliament provision is made, as it is made, for establishing claims upon which the dividends cannot yet be uplifted according to law, that must prima facie mean according to the due course of law as that would be understood in the Courts of Scotland. I am far from saying that there might not be cases imagined in which, from the nature of the subject in litigation, or other circumstances, a proceeding in a foreign Court might be regarded by the Courts in Scotland as a satisfactory way of ascertaining the legal rights of parties; as for example, when, according to the nature of the contract between them, some foreign law was to determine those rights, it might in that case well be considered that the country whose law was in question would in its own Courts be best able to inform the Courts in Scotland of the proper application of their law to the facts of the case. Again, if a claim depended upon a joint cause of action only against a bankrupt in Scotland and other persons who were in England, and if there were pending a suit or action in England against those joint parties, some of whom would not be amenable to the Scotch jurisdiction, I am not prepared to say that the Scotch Courts might not be proceeding in a very proper manner in desiring to see what the result of that action might be before proceeding themselves to determine the claim. But in any case, even if that course should be taken, and properly taken, the ultimate determination of the claim, with or without the benefit of the materials afforded by the adjudication of a foreign Court, must be with the proper forum of bankruptcy in Scotland.

At the most, therefore, it can be no more than a question of judicial discretion,

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.

Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

and for my part I think the proposition one very difficult to follow which the appellants are obliged to advance, and which really is this—that where the demand, though several, against the Scotch bankrupts, is made in respect of transactions in some of which they and others are implicated, and in others of which others perhaps and not they are implicated, but which are such as may be considered as against all the parties concerned in them, by an English Court in an English Chancery suit, that on account of the very intricacy and number of the questions (which from the nature and from the proceedings in the Court of Chancery in England may be combined in one suit), for that very reason it is more consistent with justice in a Scotch bankruptcy to sist the proof there until all the questions in the English Chancery suit against all the parties to that suit shall have been determined.

Now, I will not undertake to say that no case may exist in which the Court of Session in Scotland, exercising a judicial discretion, might think fit to take that course; but I do say that it is a proposition by no means self-evident, and not commending itself to my reason, and on those principles of judicial discretion, which it is a miscarriage of justice not to follow, the Court in Scotland, being informed that there is a Chancery suit pending in England against the trustee in a Scotch bankruptcy and a dozen or twenty other persons, involving such a number of issues as were in question here, are to delay the administration in bankruptcy as between all the persons interested in that administration in Scotland until that English suit has been brought to its conclusion. Happily we live in times in which, even if that proposition were advanced, it might still be hoped that the delay might not be more than two or three years, or perhaps four or five, if the matter were ultimately brought to this House for determination. But we all know that if a proposition be sound in point of law it must have been equally as sound thirty or forty or fifty years ago as it is at the present time; and I need not remind your Lordships of the length and nature of the delay which might have occurred in the winding up of a Scotch bankruptcy if such proceedings had occurred then.

My Lords, I do not say that the Court of Session in Scotland might not, if they had thought fit, have delayed this proof, but in the exercise of such discretion as they have they determined not to do so. They determined that the merits should be gone into upon regular pleadings and regular proof before them, which has been done; and I can hardly conceive a greater miscarriage of justice than it would be if, after a complete suit has been instituted and fought out to the end on pleadings and proof in Scotland for the purpose of determining this question between these parties, your Lordships were now to turn round upon a point of discretion and to say—All that is to go for nothing; there ought to have been a sisting of the proceedings in the Court of Session; the Court of Session must take into consideration what has been done in the English suit; after being informed of the decision of the English Courts, which perhaps have not yet considered that suit, and ascertained whether or no those proceedings are final, they must then determine whether or not they are to bind them in Scotland, and whatever may be the result of any such consideration all that has yet been done in Scotland is to go for nothing. My Lords, I am happy to find that none of your Lordships are of opinion that it is our duty to take that course.

Then I come to the case upon the merits, and I entirely agree with your Lordships that we must deal with the facts before your Lordships secundum allegata et probata, as we find them upon this record. I am bound to say that, looking at the long inventory of the evidence, including a great number of documents which it has not been thought necessary to print in the printed case or appendix, I see no reason to suppose that there was any lack of material before the Court in Scotland for the necessary purposes of justice.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876. Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

Well, then, what is the case? The case, stated at the highest, is one of fraud. Now, supposing fraud were established prima facie upon this evidence against other persons, and not against the Lawsons, could your Lordships come to the conclusion that the Lawsons were to be answerable for the fraud of others unless they appeared to have personally derived a profit or benefit from that fraud? My Lords, I know of no principle on which in a Court of Equity, or in a Court administering equity, such a conclusion could be arrived at upon the facts of this case. It appears to me that, if there was any fraud, the Lawsons are not shewn to have participated in it, or to have derived any benefit from it; because, my Lords, as far as benefit is concerned this appears sufficiently pleaded by them upon the condescendence, and established upon the evidence. In real truth it has been the foundation of part of the argument of the appellants at the bar that before the final deeds or instruments were executed by which the concession in question was agreed to be sold to the company, and conveyed, if that is the proper term, to the company by the Lawsons before these transactions, although subsequent to the original contract of the 21st December 1870 with Engelbach, the Lawsons had by arrangements with Hartmont parted with all beneficial interest in the sale to the company, and consequently when the company carried that sale into effect the whole consideration passed into other hands, with the exception, in form only, of a certain number of shares which were transferred to them, but of which shares, upon the evidence, they were trustees only for Hartmont, and which afterwards were sold not for their benefit, but for Hartmont's. So stand the facts upon the evidence. Consequently, if the Lawsons were not personally participating in, or cognizant of, any fraud, and were not personally lucrati by any fraud of others, I know no principle of equity by which they could be held responsible in repetition or in damages for any such fraud. Now, my Lords, what is the fraud alleged? It is not that Engelbach, who was the purchaser as an agent for the company, received an improper bonus or benefit: for no such case is even suggested in any part of the condescendence. And, my Lords, I may say that, although it does come out in the evidence that Engelbach did receive some benefit, even if it had been upon such a condescendence open to the appellants to prove the knowledge of that by the Lawsons, and to fix the Lawsons with a liability on that account, there appears to me to be nothing in the proof from which any such knowledge of the Lawsons of any such arrangement with Engelbach ought to be considered proved, or to be inferred. The absence of any distinct allegation upon the condescendence is a very ample reason why your Lordships should not take the statement which was made by Mr Ogle, that he understood the original arrangement to which the Lawsons were parties to have included this payment to Engelbach, as a proof of that fact. The Lawsons were asked no questions about it. Ogle said that whatever arrangements of that kind were made were not negotiated by him; and there is not upon the condescendence, as I have said, a suggestion of any such case. Under those circumstances, it appears to me that that part of the case must be laid aside entirely, as not really arising before your Lordships.

What is there in the rest? There is an allegation in the condescendence stopping considerably short, as I read it, of what is in the bill in Chancery, although the bill is for certain purposes referred to in the condescendence. There is an allegation in the 8th paragraph that Hartmont and Begbie, Peter Lawson and Son, and Ogle, "well knowing (as the fact was) that through their default the concession had become and was then voidable and liable to forfeiture, determined to form a joint stock company for the purpose, amongst other things, that the company should purchase the said concession from them at the price of £65,000. For this purpose they entered into communication with 'Engelbach and Keir,' and a provisional committee was formed, consisting of Begbie, Engelbach, Keir, and a Mr William Lewis Grant, for the purpose of carrying the said scheme and design into effect."

Your Lordships will observe that in that paragraph of the condescendence a statement is made inconsistent with the argument at the bar that the sum of £65,000 was arrived at by attributing £50,000 to the interest of the Lawsons and £15,000 to Engelbach; for the condescendence tells us that that sum was arrived at by Hartmont and Lawson and Ogle as partners, having in view their own benefit, and before they got into communication with Engelbach at all. So far, therefore, the statement in the condescendence negatives the argument from the amount of the purchase-money which was ingeniously pressed upon your Lordships at the bar. But it alleges that, with the knowledge that through their fault the concession was voidable and liable to forfeiture, they determined to form a joint stock company. In a later paragraph the bill in Chancery is referred to in a manner which may perhaps entitle the appellants to say that they ought to have the benefit in this appeal of any allegations in that bill, "a printed copy of which bill is signed by the deponent and the said Justice of the Peace as relative hereto, and is herewith produced and held as repeated brevitatis causa." That bill, my Lords, goes beyond the allegation in the condescendence in this respect, that it alleges the fraud—the substantial fraud which it sets out—to consist in the intentional concealment of the fact that the concession was voidable and liable to forfeiture from the persons who became shareholders of the company. But the bill also says that the facts relative to the concession, and to the manner in which it had been worked, the concession itself, and all the other documents of title, were perfectly well known to the provisional committee, and in fact to all the persons who originally formed and constituted the company, and who included other persons besides those who were the partners, or connected with them as partners.

My Lords, in the case before your Lordships of Overend, Gurney and Company v. Peek, Lord Westbury, dealing with a somewhat similar state of allegation, expressly said, that as far as the facts were concerned, if all the facts were disclosed at the time to the persons forming the company and the persons who negotiated for the future company, and if, as was there the case, and as is the case here, on the very face of the memorandum of association the company was formed for the express purpose of making this purchase, whatever other point could be made, the point of concealment of those facts could not be made; that the company must be taken to have been formed with a full disclosure and knowledge of those facts. And accordingly we find that there was that disclosure, and that this purchase was expressly taken upon the footing of a covenant for title and with the knowledge of its voidable quality. Therefore, my Lords, all allegation of fraud on that ground falls to the ground; and, unless the point of failure of consideration by reason of the subsequent avoidance of that contract by the Government of San Domingo can be made good under, I think, the fourth plea in law, the whole case entirely fails.

No. 11.

June 22, 1876.
Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson.

But, my Lords, as to that the case stands thus:—More than a year after the concession had been acquired by this company, they remaining in possession during the whole of the time, the Government of San Domingo write and communicate through their agent in this country to the company a note, which is stated, I think, in the 54th paragraph of the bill and elsewhere in the proceedings. That note contains these passages—"The Dominican Government takes into consideration the fact that neither in the course of the year 1870," which was before the sale, "nor in that of the year 1872," the greater part of which was after the sale, "have the grantees complied with this most essential clause of their contract. In consequence thereof the Government has the right from this moment to declare the said grantees as having forfeited their concession. This right the Government reserves to itself, even in the event in which the minimum quantity stipulated for were to be reached by the grantees in future. The Government, however, is quite disposed to enter into fresh arrangements with the said grantees with the view of saving to the latter the above forfeiture, provided the future interest of the Government is not prejudiced thereby."

Upon that statement it appears to me, my Lords, to be quite impossible to say that the ultimate forfeiture of the contract was solely or directly due or necessarily to defaults which had occurred before this sale took place; more especially as in the evidence of Mr Peach, the chairman of the company, he says distinctly that during the whole working by the company the necessary quantity was not worked. He is asked, "Though the concession had been subsisting all through last year you would not have been bringing phosphate home? (A.) We could not have brought home more when we have so large a quantity which we find no use for. (Q.) Suppose the concession had been handed over to you with the obligation on you to bring home 10,000 tons a-year, must you not necessarily have stopped fetching it home? (A.) Unquestionably. (Q.) Therefore you have, in reality, as a company, lost nothing as yet from the San Domingo Government having stopped the concession? (A.) We have lost in this way, that the company has got a bad reputation;" and so on. The result is that they did not attempt to work the concession so as to keep it alive, and it would necessarily have been forfeited if the San Domingo Government had been disposed to insist upon those terms, even if at the time of sale nothing had taken place by reason of which a forfeiture had been incurred.

My Lords, I do not inquire what may be the rights of the parties under that state of circumstances in any other point of view than that which is raised by this condescendence; but I do say, my Lords, that under these circumstances it is impossible that a case of repetition can be made upon the footing of failure of consideration and disappearance of the subject-matter of the contract.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

JOHN HOLMES, London—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—LAURENCE, PLEWS, BOYER, & BAKER—STUART & CHEYNE, W.S.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

1875–1876.

JOHN WILSON, Petitioner.—J. C. Smith.
LORD ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Burnet, A.-D.

No. 1.

Oct. 20, 1875.
Wilson v. Lord Advocate.

Bail—Furtum grave—Statute 1701, c. 6.—Held that the crime of stealing from the person "a gold or other metal watch," aggravated by two previous convictions of theft, was a capital crime, and therefore not bailable, under the Act 1701, c. 6, on the mere demand of the accused.

Bail—Furtum grave.—Petition to be admitted to bail refused, in respect that the crime charged was a furtum grave, and therefore capital, and that the Lord Advocate had refused his consent to bail being accepted.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Ardmillan. Lord Neaves. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was a petition to be admitted to bail presented to the High Court of Justiciary by John Wilson, a prisoner in the prison of Ayr.

Wilson was charged with "the crime of theft, aggravated by his having been previously convicted of that crime, actor or art and part," in so far as upon the 24th day of September 1875 he had, from the pocket or person of a certain Robert Weir, stolen a gold or other metal watch, and had been previously convicted of the crime of theft."

On this charge, after the usual procedure, the Sheriff-substitute granted warrant of commitment.

Two extract convictions for the crime of theft were produced before the Sheriff-substitute purporting to refer to the petitioner.

The Lord Advocate refused consent to Wilson's being liberated on bail on the ground that the case was a daring case of pocket picking committed in Ayr Railway Station after the Ayr races, and that the prisoner was an Englishman, having command of considerable means, who could easily find bail, and who would in all probability fly the country if the opportunity were given him by admitting him to bail.

Wilson accordingly presented this petition to the High Court of Justiciary.

Argued for him;—(1) The Court had discretion to admit to bail in all cases,[1] and even if this were technically a case not bailable on the mere demand of the accused under the Act 1701, c. 6,[2] it was still a case in [1] Thomson, July 15, 1871, 2 Coup. 103, 43 Scot. Jur. 561.

[2] The Act 1701, c. 6, enacts, "that all crimes not inferring capital punishment shall be bailable."

No. 1.

Oct. 20, 1875. Wilson v. Lord Advocate.

which in modern times to refuse bail must be regarded as mere oppression. But (2) the crime charged was not a capital offence, and was therefore bailable. The warrant of commitment was what determined the nature of the charge, and it must be strictly read.[1] Now, here the charge was of stealing a gold or other metal watch, aggravated by having been previously convicted of theft. Since it was not stated how often the petitioner had been previously convicted, it must be assumed that there was only one previous conviction, and this was therefore neither a furtum grave nor a theft accompanied by two or more previous convictions such as under the old law inferred capital punishment.[2]

Argued for the Lord Advocate;—The application ought to be refused. Nothing had been advanced to shew that the Lord Advocate had not wisely and justifiably exercised his discretion in refusing bail. Without his consent, or without the direct interference of the Court, the crime was not bailable. The theft of a gold watch was in itself a furtum grave and a capital crime,[3] and so was any theft aggravated by two previous convictions.[4] Though the number of previous convictions was not stated in the warrant of commitment, nothing was there said which was inconsistent with there being more than one, and the Court were entitled to look behind it at the extract convictions produced to ascertain how many were really founded on.

Lord Ardmillan.—I do not entertain any doubt on the first point raised by Mr Smith. I do not think this application incompetent. I do not say that the Court could not, in the exercise of their discretion, authorise liberation on bail in this case if they thought that the nature and circumstances of the case really required it. But, while I think that there is nothing to preclude the Court from granting the prayer of this petition, were they satisfied that it was right to do so, still I must keep in view that a large discretion rests on the Lord Advocate, that the Court trusts him, and has every confidence that he exercises it well, unless good ground to the contrary be clearly shewn.

If this is a capital charge, according to the strict letter of the law, then the practice of restricting the pains of law does not, in relation to this question of bail, alter the category in which it is placed. In point of strict law the crime of stealing an article of value from the person, coupled with previous convictions, is a capital offence. That is the charge laid against the petitioner, for I cannot limit the words "having previously been convicted of that crime" to a single previous conviction, especially when I find that two extract convictions are produced. The petitioner is therefore charged with what is still a capital crime, requiring the pains of law to be restricted. The Lord Advocate, in the exercise of his discretion, refuses his consent to liberation on bail; and I see no grounds on which the Court would be justified in interfering.

Lord Neaves.—I frankly say that if there were any doubt whether or not this was a capital offence it would be our duty to apply our minds to that question. But I think that this is clearly a case which falls under the graver category. The charge is one of serious theft, and aggravated by previous conviction, which, with your Lordship, I cannot limit to a single conviction. That is in strict law a capital offence. It may be that the punishment is in practice always restricted, but that does not remove the crime from the category in which [1] Hume, 2, 88. [2] Ib. 1, 91 and 95. [3] Ib. 1, 91. [4] Ib. 1, 95.

No. 1.
Oct. 20, 1875.
Wilson v. Lord Advocate.

it formerly stood. It still remains there, and the Legislature has left it there, and not improbably with the very view of preventing the offence from becoming a bailable offence. We have, at any rate, the analogy of the Acts 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 123, and 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 73, which, when taking away their capital nature from certain classes of forgeries, expressly left them non-bailable offences.

The law then has retained the offence here charged in the category of capital offences. And, though I do not doubt our power to admit to bail, no cause has been shewn why we should exercise that power in this case, and interfere with what appears to me the very wise discretion of the Lord Advocate. I think we have no alternative but to refuse this petition.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinions of your Lordships. It is quite true that in the present case the punishment of the crime with which the petitioner is charged is capital. The practice is certainly in every case to restrict the pains. But it does not follow that this practice of restricting the pains renders the offence a bailable offence. There are many important and serious offences, which, though they are not now punished, or even in some instances punishable, with death, are yet not bailable. And I think that it is the deliberate policy of the law to keep them so, unless special cause be shewn to the contrary. In this case no good cause has been shewn, and I am therefore quite satisfied to refuse this petition.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that the offence charged is a furtum grave, and therefore a capital offence, and that the Lord Advocate has refused his consent to bail being accepted, refuse the petition."

WILLIAM CROAL, L.A.—J. A. JAMIESON, W.S., Crown Agent.—Agents.

No. 2.
Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v. Rodger.

ANDREW CLENDINNEN, Suspender.—Moncreiff.
PETER AND GEORGE RODGER, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Muirhead, A.-D.

Indictment—Relevancy—Fraud—Insolvency—Putting away Goods to defraud Creditors.—Held (dis. Lord Young) that an indictment which charged in the major premise "fraud, particularly the wickedly, fraudulently, and feloniously putting away, carrying off, or secreting by an insolvent or other debtor, of his funds or effects, with intent to defraud his creditors," was not relevant, by reason of the interjection of the words "or other" between "insolvent" and "debtor."

Observations (per cur.) on the cases of M'Rae, Sept. 17, 1867, 5 Irv. 463, and Sneden, April 10, 1874, ante, vol. i. (Just.) 19, 2 Coup. 532.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Deas. Lord Ardmillan. Lord Mure. Lord Young. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was a suspension of a conviction obtained before the Sheriff of Selkirk and a jury at the instance of Peter and George Rodger, joint procurators-fiscal of Court, against Andrew Clendinnen, draper, Galashiels.

The major proposition of the indictment was "That albeit, by the laws of this and every other well governed realm, fraud, particularly the wickedly, fraudulently, and feloniously putting away, carrying off, or secreting by an insolvent or other debtor, of his funds or effects, with intent to defraud his creditors, is a crime of an heinous nature, and severely punishable."

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875. Clendinnen v. Rodgers.

The minor proposition was

"In so far as the said Andrew Clendinnen having commenced and carried on business as a draper and clothier in Galashiels, in the county of Selkirk, and having become indebted to various individuals or companies in certain sums of money, which he was unable to pay, or pretended to be unable to pay, and in particular to Stewart and M'Donald, warehousemen in or near Buchanan Street, Glasgow, in the sum of £193, 11s. 2d., or thereby; . . . . . and the said Andrew Clendinnen having become, or having pretended to become insolvent, and having on or about the 7th day of July 1875 executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of George Dunlop Cramond, writer in Galashiels, the said Andrew Clendinnen did, on the 19th day of August 1875, or on one or other of the days of that month, or of July immediately preceding, or of September immediately following, wickedly, fraudulently, and feloniously, with intent to defraud his said creditors, or such of the said companies as were his creditors, clandestinely put away, carry off, or secrete, or cause or procure to be put away, carried off, or secreted, from or from near the shop or premises then and now or lately occupied by him, in or near Bank Street, in or near Galashiels, in the county of Selkirk, the various articles specified and contained in inventory No. 1, hereunto annexed as relative hereto, or part thereof, forming part of his effects, and did, wickedly, fraudulently, and feloniously conceal the same, or cause or procure the same to be concealed in or near the dwelling-house or premises situated in or near Green Street, in or near Galashiels, in the county of Selkirk, then and now or lately occupied by Henry Elliot, then and now or lately a miller, then and now or lately residing there; and all this the said Andrew Clendinnen did, with intent to appropriate the same to his own use, and to defraud his said creditors, or such of the said companies as were his creditors."

The verdict of the jury was, "Find the panel guilty as libelled."

It was objected for the complainer;—(1) The major proposition of the indictment did not contain an indictable offence. The effect of interjecting the words "or other" between "insolvent" and "debtor" was that "insolvent or other debtor" must be read as simply equivalent to "debtor." Now, a debtor might put away his effects without being guilty of a crime. To charge a man with doing an innocent act "with intent to defraud" was not a relevant charge.[1] Insolvency was in truth the essence of the charge intended to be made, and without a specific averment of insolvency the charge was not relevant.[2] (2) If the charge was relevant it could only be so because the word "or" introduced a proper alternative. Then the charge being alternative the verdict was general, and therefore void from uncertainty.

Argued for the respondents;—The intent to defraud qualified the act of putting away goods by a debtor. It necessarily inferred the attempt to avoid paying just debts. A solvent debtor might do this just as well as an insolvent. To put property beyond the reach of creditors with the intention of defrauding them was a crime whether the debtor was solvent or insolvent.

---

[1] Hume, 1, 28, et seq.; Lord Advocate v. Shepherd, April 26, 1842, 1 Broun, 325; Lord Advocate v. Ure, Feb. 15, 1858, 3 Irv. 10, 30 Scot. Jur. 310; Lord Advocate v. Hinchy, Sept. 30, 1864, 4 Irv. 561, 37 Scot. Jur. 24.

[2] Hume, 1, 172; Alison, 1, 362; Lord Advocate v. Neill, Feb. 3, 1873, 2 Coup. 395; Lord Advocate v. Sneden, April 10, 1874, 2 Coup. 532, ante, vol. i. (Just.) 19; Rae v. Linton, Dec. 11, 1874, ante, vol. ii. (Just.) p. 17; Hume, 1. 509; Alison, 1, 567; 1621, c. 18; 1696. c. 5; 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 33; 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 20; Lord Advocate v. Dick, July 16, 1832, 5 Deas and And. 513; Lord Advocate v. O'Reilly, July 14, 1836, 1 Swin. 256; Lord Advocate v. M'Intyre, Sept. 14, 1837, 1 Swin. 536.

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v. Rodgers.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This suspension has been maintained on two grounds. The first objection to the conviction and sentence is, that the major proposition of the indictment does not contain a statement of an indictable offence. The second objection is, that the verdict was not effectual, because it proceeded on a charge which was alternative, and did not discriminate between the alternatives libelled, and was thus void from uncertainty.

As regards the last plea, I am of opinion that it is not well founded. There is no proper alternative in the major proposition of the indictment, which is this, that "fraud, particularly the wickedly, fraudulently, and feloniously putting away, carrying off, or secreting, by an insolvent or other debtor, of his funds or effects, with intent to defraud his creditors is a crime," &c. Though it certainly contains the disjunctive "or," this is not an alternative charge. The expression "insolvent or other debtor," is an amplification of the specification of the crime, and is used not to introduce an alternative but merely to enlarge the scope of the charge. A general verdict is therefore perfectly good if the major proposition is relevant.

There remains the other question, whether the major proposition as it stands charges an indictable offence. The major proposition amounts to nothing but this, that the putting away of his effects by a debtor with the intent to defraud his creditors is a crime. Now, is that an indictable offence? We have a long catalogue of precedents on this point in our books. I have considered them carefully, but I can find no instance in which the element of insolvency has been entirely omitted. Hume deals solely with such offences as committed by an insolvent or one in contemplation of bankruptcy. Fraudulent bankruptcy is a specific and definite crime. There was indeed one case lately (Lord Advocate v. M'Rae, Sept. 17, 1867, 5 Irv. 463) where Lord Neaves, at the Perth Circuit, sustained an indictment in the same terms as the present, but the report is meagre, and the case stands alone, and the general result of the whole series of authorities is that insolvency is an element in the offence which cannot be omitted. And as insolvency is excluded by the terms of this major the question remains whether the removal of his goods by a person who is solvent in order to defraud his creditors is a relevant article of dittay.

Crimes of this nature may be of three distinct classes. First, where a debtor, being insolvent, removes his effects from the reach of his creditors for the purpose of defrauding them; second, where a debtor, who is solvent, removes his effects from the reach of his creditors, as a part of a fraudulent design to make himself appear to be insolvent; third, where a debtor, whether solvent or insolvent, removes his effects for the purpose of defeating a specific right constituted in another, as in the case of a private trust-deed or a sequestration.

These are three crimes totally and essentially distinct. With regard to the first, though I participate in the doubts that have been expressed by Lord Young in the case of Sneden, I am not disposed to go against the long series of precedents in which it has been held a relevant charge. My doubt would have been whether, so long as there is no overt act by which creditors are injured, there has arisen any such absolute right in the creditors as to warrant its being said that the removal of his effects by an insolvent is a fraud upon that right. But though I cannot help expressing my doubts, the point seems to be conclusively ruled, and I am not prepared to go back on it. The defence of the relevancy of such a charge rests on the principle that if a man finds he is unable to pay his debts he is bound to make all his goods forthcoming to his creditors, and though his creditors have no vested or specific right, still they have an inchoate right, which it is unlawful for him to defeat or diminish by carrying off and putting away his goods.

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Clen-linnen v. Rodgers.

When, however, we come to the case of a solvent man it is different. A solvent man is entitled to deal with his effects as he likes. The assumption is that his creditors will be paid, and they have no title to inquire what he does with them. Therefore for a solvent man to carry off and put away his effects is not in itself criminal. The adjecting of a criminal intent to an act itself innocent or indifferent does not raise the innocent act to the level of a crime.

A solvent man may indeed be guilty of an offence falling under the second category above mentioned. Being solvent he may attempt to evade payment by putting away his effects and pretending to be insolvent. But there the essence of the offence is not the putting away his effects, but the pretending to be insolvent, and without this element the charge is irrelevant. That is a totally different class of offence from the first, and certainly is not covered by this indictment.

As to the third class, however, where a debtor after granting a divesting deed has put away his effects with intent to defraud his trustee and his creditors, it matters not whether the debtor was solvent or insolvent. The fraud is the same. But there the essence of the crime is the fraud on the prior right, and this must appear in the major proposition.

What I have now stated was, I think, well exemplified in the recent case of Neill (Feb. 3, 1873, 2 Coup. 395), which embraced all the three classes of charges to which I have referred. The objection was stated that the indictment was inconsistent with itself, and, though I declined to sustain the objection, I put it to the prosecution to choose the alternative on which they meant to stand, and which they desired me to put to the jury.

On the whole matter, then, I think we must hold that the major proposition of this indictment is faulty by the adjecting of the words "or other" before "debtor," and that, therefore, the charge is not relevant.

Lord Deas.—I agree entirely with what has fallen from your Lordship, with this explanation, that I entertain no doubt at all that if the words "or other" had been omitted from the major proposition the libel here would have been a perfectly relevant libel. The relevancy of such a libel has been sanctioned and sustained again and again throughout a long series of cases, and it would be a lamentable view of our criminal practice if doubt could now be thrown upon what was done in these cases. I may just mention one of them, because it was tried at Glasgow when the Lord Justice-General, now present (then Lord Justice-Clerk), and myself were Judges on the Circuit, viz., the case of Margaret Smith or Eccles, Sept. 1866. Decisions and practice make the great body of our criminal law, which even a Judge upon Circuit, and still more a Sheriff, naturally holds it his duty to follow out. If there be a good objection to the relevancy of the major proposition of this libel I certainly cannot hold it to be obviated by reference to the minor. The major proposition of a libel or indictment must be correct and complete in itself. Our indictments have always been framed in a syllogistic form, and it has immemorially been held that each branch of the syllogism must be complete in itself. The major proposition sets forth that such an act or acts as it describes is or are contrary to law, and consequently punishable, and the description of the act or acts must be sufficiently explicit to enable the Court to see on the face of the libel that this is so, otherwise the Court can look no further. The minor proposition states what is alleged to have been done, and this description must be such as to amount to the crime or crimes set forth in the major. The conclusion is then deduced, that upon proof of the fact the accused ought to be punished with the pains of law. All this is purely elementary, but all the more important because of its being so. The syllogistic form of our indictments has been a great means of enabling the Court to enforce that precision which is the distinguishing feature of our criminal procedure, and which is so valuable for the information and safety of parties accused, and I should extremely regret its being relaxed or departed from. If, therefore, there is a flaw or defect on the face of the major proposition of this libel that flaw or defect must be fatal to the libel.

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v. Rodgers.

Now, while I can have no doubt that the relevancy of this libel would have been clear had the words "or other" not been introduced into the major proposition, I am of opinion that the introduction of these words vitiates the whole by reducing the major proposition to an allegation that it is a crime for any debtor, and in any circumstances, to put away, carry off, or secret his effects with intent to defraud his creditors. Now, that, I think, is too vague a proposition to be safely made the foundation of a criminal libel. I place no weight on the introductory words "wickedly, fraudulently, and feloniously." The allegation that what was done by the accused party was done "with intent to defraud his creditors" is more serious and creates more difficulty. These words make the question a narrow one. Still I think the allegation is too general to be safely proceeded upon. It is not confined to insolvent debtors nor to debtors on the eve of bankruptcy, nor to debtors in any specified position. It is quite conceivable that such acts by a debtor who pretends to be insolvent when he knows he is not so may be at least equally fraudulent as if he were actually insolvent. But if that was meant here it ought to have been so said. In short, I think there is too much novelty and vagueness in this major proposition to authorise its being sustained.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I shall confine my observations entirely to the major proposition of this indictment. With that alone we have to deal. The major proposition must stand or fall by its own terms, and cannot be supplemented by reference to the minor. Our indictments are drawn, as Lord Deas has observed, in the form of a syllogism. If the major proposition is not complete, the syllogism is imperfect,—its coherence is destroyed.

Now, if the major proposition here is alternative, then the second objection taken is good, namely, that the verdict is general. But if the major is read as the Lord Justice-Clerk reads it, as not containing a proper alternative, then it must be taken in mitiore sensu. Where you have words occurring in an indictment connected by the disjunctive "or," if they do not introduce a proper alternative, they must be read in the sense most favourable to the panel. Read in that sense the charge amounts to this, that the putting away of his estate and effects by a debtor, whether solvent or insolvent, is a crime. No doubt the words "with intent to defraud his creditors" are added. But if the act itself is not criminal, the addition of these words will not make it criminal. Action, not intent, is within the sphere of criminal jurisprudence. Wisely and concisely did Lord Neaves say in the case of Hinchy (Sept. 30, 1864, 4 Irv. 561),—"The law does not take cognisance of things done that do not pass into overt acts. It has nothing to do with the intent of a party, or with his secret actions, till he does something that comes to the light of day." If the act libelled be the act of a solvent man, who is not pretending to be insolvent, he has committed no crime—for, if solvent, and not pretending to be insolvent, he may do what he likes with his own. To the act so libelled intent can never add the quality of guilt. Intent can never make that act a crime which is not one in itself. Of this we have innumerable examples in our law. An attempt to steal is no crime, though housebreaking with intent to steal is a crime, because there the housebreaking is an overt act, and a violent act, and the intent is reasonably and legally added as a quality. Forgery, even though the intent to defraud were proved, is not a crime, unless accompanied by the overt act of uttering. Perjury, a crime which is always with a bad intent, is not always within the reach of the law. But still more closely touching the present case, "attempt to defraud" has been found to be not an indictable offence; and, if the attempt is not, the intent cannot be. Unless, therefore, it is a crime for a solvent man to put away his goods, you cannot make it one by adding the words "with intent to defraud his creditors."

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v Rodgers.

Accordingly, I read the libel as charging this offence against a debtor simply as a debtor, whether solvent or insolvent, and so reading it, I cannot hold it relevant.

True it is that it may be a fraud and a crime for a man who is really solvent to put away and conceal his effects for the purpose of pretending and inducing a false belief of insolvency, and then becoming bankrupt, or making a favourable settlement with creditors on that footing. But there the essence of the crime is the false pretence, the counterfeiting insolvency for a fraudulent purpose, and that must be specifically stated in the major proposition of the indictment.

I have only to add that I have no doubt that, assuming the insolvency of the debtor accused, and reading the alleged intent to defraud as applicable to the putting away his estate by such insolvent debtor, that part of the charge would be relevant. This has been long and conclusively settled, and I am not prepared to disturb it.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD YOUNG.—The suspension is rested on two grounds, viz., (1) that the libel is irrelevant, and (2) that the verdict is ambiguous.

This objection to the relevancy of the libel applies to the major premise, and turns upon the effect of the words "or other" occurring between "insolvent" and "debtor," and for the insertion of which it is said, apparently with truth, there is no precedent, except one case upon Circuit, in which they were sustained (the suspender contends erroneously) by Lord Neaves. The words are undoubtedly material, for their insertion is exactly equivalent to the omission or suppression of the word "insolvent," by which they are immediately preceded, and which they in effect strike out. The words "an insolvent or other debtor" mean simply "a debtor," and the longer expression was probably employed only to indicate more pointedly what would have been sufficiently indicated by the shorter, viz., that the solvency or insolvency of the prisoner was, in the prosecutor's view, immaterial to the charge.

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v. Rodgers.

The question for our consideration on this head therefore is, whether or not the word "insolvent" is essential to the charge. If it be, then the introduction of the word objected to is fatal—otherwise not.

The question must necessarily have been presented to the Sheriff before trial as I have now stated it. Coming, as it does, before us after verdict, it might have been contended that the objection, assuming it to be good, was cured by the verdict, had the terms of it been such as to shew that the jury had affirmed the insolvency of the prisoner. But the verdict being in general terms with reference to the charge as it stands in the libel there is no room for this contention, and it must be assumed that the jury took no account of the question whether the prisoner was solvent or not, regarding it as immaterial, no doubt under the direction of the Sheriff, whose Substitute also must have held this opinion when he sustained the words objected to and allowed them to stand in the libel.

The second ground of suspension, viz., that the verdict is ambiguous, need not therefore be separately considered, all that need or can be said on the subject being, that if the objection to the relevancy of the charge is good the verdict does not cure it. The validity of the charge and that of the verdict both depend on the same question, viz., whether or not it is essential to the offence with which the prisoner was charged, and of which he has been found guilty, that he should have been insolvent when he committed it; or, in other words, whether the offence is such as can only be committed by an insolvent debtor.

Now, the substance or gist of the offence in every case of the class to which this belongs consists in this, that a debtor dealing with his creditors, whether under the provisions of the Bankrupt Act or upon a private arrangement, has, while professing to make a full disclosure and surrender of his property for division among them, cheated, or attempted to cheat them, by fraudulently concealing and withholding part of it. I am myself of opinion that it is essential to the offence that something shall have occurred to impose upon the debtor the legal duty of disclosure and surrender, being a duty of another order and character than that which is upon every man to pay his debts according to his ability, and to regulate his expenditure and use his property with a due regard to the interests of those to whom he is indebted. The most familiar case is that of sequestration; but a private arrangement whereby the creditors agree to forego in their debtor's favour any of their rights, on condition of a fair disclosure and surrender of his property, which he on his part professes to make, is in my opinion equally available to impose the legal duty for a violation of which, by a fraudulent concealment and withholding of property, the debtor will be criminally responsible. In the case of Sneden at Dumfries, in the spring of 1874 (Couper, vol. ii. p. 532), I was of opinion that the essential feature of the offence did not exist, or at least was not well libelled, and therefore held the indictment irrelevant. Such a question, which must depend on the terms of the libel in the particular case, we have no occasion to consider here—(1) because no objection to raise it was stated to the Sheriff, or is presented to us by the bill of suspension, and after verdict it is, I think, no part of our duty to take such an objection, even if the terms of the libel appeared to afford grounds for it; and (2) because a trust conveyance in favour of creditors is libelled, which, although briefly and perhaps insufficiently described, yet being produced may have established, and probably did establish, the duty of surrender, which I desiderate as necessary to the crime. I therefore think that we must consider the only objection which the bill presents to us on the assumption that the offence is otherwise well charged, and that the prisoner has been properly convicted, provided only that it is such as a solvent debtor—which we must assume he may have been—could commit.

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v. Rodgers.

Of course no honest man, being able to pay his debts in full, will seek an arrangement with his creditors in any form, whether under the Bankrupt Act or otherwise. But a rogue may, and the purpose of every such arrangement being to procure to the debtor, at the expense of his creditors, the benefit of a forbearance from diligence and a settlement and discharge without full payment, I should think that the worst fraud of the class and kind which we are considering is that which is committed by a man of large but fraudulently concealed wealth. The fraud, as I have observed, consists in the cheat practised on the creditors by their debtor concealing and withholding a part of his effects, while professing to disclose and surrender the whole, as the condition of a benefit bargained for, or accorded by law on that footing; and I should have thought it clear that the extent to which any such fraudulent debtor had concealed and withheld his property on the one hand, or disclosed and surrendered it on the other, affected, not the legal character of the offence, but only the magnitude or heinousness of the particular instance of it. The mischief against which the law that punishes such fraud is directed is the injury thereby inflicted on the creditors, who are the victims of the fraud, and the measure of this injury is the value of the property which has been fraudulently concealed and withheld. It is greater or less in any particular case according to the extent of the debtor's property and the proportion which what he has dishonestly withheld bears to what he has honestly surrendered. The property which has been withheld, plus that (if any) which has been surrendered, together constitute the debtor's estate, and if sufficient to pay his debts in full he is solvent. But if, while professing to make full surrender according to his duty, he surrenders only enough to pay a small dividend, and fraudulently conceals and retains the balance, how shall he be acquitted of fraud, or how is the character, as distinguished from the degree, of his offence affected by the fact that the balance so fraudulently concealed and withheld was sufficient to pay his debts in full? It seems clear that the magnitude of the offence and the degree of the offender's criminality increase according to the amount of property concealed and withheld, at least up to the point of being sufficient, when added to what has been surrendered, to pay his debts in full; and I must profess my inability to appreciate any view of the offence according to which it changes with respect to its legal character, if indeed it does not entirely vanish when this point is reached, because of the offender's solvency thereby manifested.

By my judgment in the case of Sneden, and the observations which I have already made in this case, I have expressed with sufficient distinctness my opinion, to the effect that a criminal Court can take no account of the manner in which a debtor disposes of his property prior to the time when the law lays upon him a distinct obligation to disclose and surrender it. If when that time has come and is past he fraudulently keeps it in concealment with a view dishonestly to withhold it from those who are entitled to have it, his previous dealing with it may be good evidence against him. But if he shall then

No. 2.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v. Rodgers.

honestly disclose and surrender it, or if the time never arrives at all, it is, in my opinion, beyond the cognisance of a criminal Court to inquire where or with what intention, never fulfilled, he may previously have placed it. I say "intention never fulfilled," because the event with reference to which it was entertained, on the assumption I am making, never happened. But however this may be, I am unable to see how the circumstance of the debtor's solvency or insolvency affects the question. In every case of the kind it must be averred and proved that the prisoner did in fact conceal and withhold property from his creditors with intent to defraud them. But the act, the intention, and the mischief being precisely the same whether the perpetrator was solvent or insolvent, the reason, if there be any, for requiring the prosecutor to aver and prove that he was insolvent is certainly not obvious, and must depend on some other considerations than usually determine the materiality of a fact to the constitution of an offence. Are there any such? Insolvency in the sense of the Bankrupt Act is simply inability to meet liabilities, and a man may be insolvent and properly made bankrupt, and his estates sequestrated under the statute, whose estate, when realised, is found sufficient to pay every one, and leave a surplus. The question whether or not a man was solvent at a given time is, in the civil Court, and with a view to civil remedies, frequently attended with much difficulty, involving an investigation into the state and condition of his affairs. Why should there be such an investigation in the course of a criminal trial for fraud? No doubt insolvency opens certain civil remedies to creditors if they choose to resort to them in order to restrain their debtor in the use of his property. But if let alone, the insolvent debtor remains absolute proprietor of his estate, and no man is required by any rule of law to ascertain the state of his affairs before dealing with his lawfully acquired property as he pleases. A trader may, and frequently does, think he is solvent when a strict examination into his affairs would shew that he is not, and there are instances of an erroneous opinion in the opposite direction. It does, at first sight at least, seem strange that the success of a prosecution for deliberate fraud should depend on the result of an inquiry into the state of the panel's affairs, to ascertain whether or not he was in a condition, had he been honestly-minded, to pay his debts in full. Insolvency certainly does not impose upon a debtor a legal obligation to call his creditors together and surrender his property to them. If, finding it expedient, he shall determine to meet his creditors and seek an arrangement, and does so, his position with respect to his property is immediately changed, and the case presents one of the familiar occasions on which such a fraud as is here charged may be committed. The libel we are considering, as I regard it, charges a fraud by the prisoner in such circumstances, and after verdict I must assume that he in fact committed it by surreptitiously removing his property with intent to defraud his creditors, to whom he was bound to surrender it. It is suggested that nevertheless, and for aught that appears to the contrary, the property which he so surreptitiously and with fraudulent intent removed and concealed was sufficient to pay his debts in full; in other words, that he may have been solvent. I cannot agree in thinking that this is a favourable suggestion for him, or that he can take benefit from it. I cannot hold that the prisoner is entitled to be acquitted on the law or the fact—because it may possibly be true that his fraudulent act and purpose were so extensive that his victims were cheated, or intended by him to be so, out of the difference, not between one dividend and another, but between a small dividend and full

No. 2.
Dec. 2, 1875.
Clendinnen v. Rodgers.

payment, which his fraudulently concealed and withheld estate is able to afford. That he surrendered sufficient to pay his debts in full might have been an answer to the charge on the fact of fraud, but that the amount fraudulently retained would, if honestly surrendered, have afforded full payment, is, I think, very clearly no answer at all. If two debtors, the one solvent and the other not, remove their property, and themselves with it, to a place abroad, or to an obscure retreat in this country, each with intent to defraud his creditors by leaving them unpaid, are we to announce it as law that the one commits a crime and the other not? For my part I can see no distinction between them except this, that the solvent debtor is the greater rogue of the two—not as regards the quality, but only the degree of his roguery. Whether or not the criminal law will reach either must, in my view, depend on considerations to which I have already sufficiently adverted; but assuming no distinction between them except that the one was solvent and the other not, I am clearly of opinion that it extends to both or neither.

I therefore think that the Sheriff was right in holding that the insolvency of the prisoner was not necessary to the offence with which he was charged, and that he properly repelled the objection to the libel, and passed sentence on the verdict.

Lord Justice-General.—I think it right to say that I concur in holding that the major proposition of this indictment is irrelevant, by reason solely of the presence of the two words "or other." If these words were not there, the major would be a relevant proposition. That is a matter so settled, both by decision and practice, that it is in vain now to attempt to deal with it as an open question.

The major of the indictment as it stands charges the putting away of his goods and effects by a debtor, whether solvent or insolvent. Now, it may be a fraud of a serious nature for a solvent man to put away his goods, so as to reduce himself to a state of apparent insolvency. But though that may be a very serious fraud, I certainly should not libel it in terms of the major proposition of this indictment. The essence of that crime is the pretending to be insolvent when really solvent, and that must appear on the face of the major proposition.

Upon the point before us I entertain no doubt whatever. Indeed, I do not think it would have deserved the attendance of a full bench had not the relevancy of the ordinary form of this indictment, where the words "or other," which occur here, are omitted, been called in question by a recent decision of one of your Lordships.

Lord Neaves was absent.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the major proposition of the libel is irrelevant; therefore pass the bill: Suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern: Find the respondents liable in expenses," &c.

Dove & Lockhart, S.S.C.—J. A. Jamieson, W.S., Crown Agent.—Agents.

JOSEPH DAWSON WORMALD, Petitioner.—Fraser—Mair.
THE LORD ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Gloag, A.-D.

No. 3.
Dec. 3, 1875.
Wormald v. Lord Advocate.

Crime—Breach of Trust or Theft—Bail.—A prisoner was committed on a charge of breach of trust or alternatively of theft, based upon the allegation that he had been employed by a person to uplift money and apply it to a particular purpose, and that he had not so applied it, but had appropriated it to his own use. Bail having been refused by the Crown, the prisoner applied to the Court to be admitted to bail, on the ground that the petition on which the warrant of commitment had been granted did not set forth facts which constituted theft, but only breach of trust, and that the charge of theft had been added simply to deprive him of the benefit of being admitted to bail.

Held that the facts alleged might either fall within the category of breach of trust or theft, according to the circumstances, and petition refused.

HIGH COURT. Full Bench. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was an application to be admitted to bail presented by Joseph Dawson Wormald, W.S.

The petitioner set forth that he had been originally incarcerated in the prison of Edinburgh on 20th November 1875, on a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition; that, having been admitted to bail by the magistrates of the city of Edinburgh, before an opportunity was given him of finding bail, he was again on 30th November committed to the prison of Edinburgh on a charge of breach of trust or theft; and that the Crown had refused to consent to his being admitted to bail.

The petition for the second warrant of commitment set forth, as the ground of the charge of breach of trust or theft, that the prisoner had uplifted from the Bank of Scotland a sum of £404, 11s. 6d., and from the Union Bank a sum of £236, 11s. 11d., the property of Andrew Donaldson, by whom he had been employed as agent to invest these moneys on heritable security, and had appropriated them to his own purposes.

The prisoner contended that the charge of theft had been added to the charge of breach of trust in the second petition for warrant to commit simply to make it a non-bailable offence, and to prevent him getting out of prison to prepare for his defence and otherwise attend to his interests; that the procurator-fiscal had acted maliciously and oppressively in inserting the charge in his petition for warrant of commitment, and that it was not competent for the magistrate to grant warrant of commitment on a charge of theft on a petition which only disclosed the species facti which constituted breach of trust.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We are not now considering the question of the relevancy of an indictment, but an objection to the petition on which the warrant of commitment has followed. This is an application by the prisoner to be admitted to bail, first, on the ground that the petition did not set forth any circumstances out of which an offence which is not bailable could emerge; and, in the second place, on an appeal to the equitable power of the Court in the circumstances of the case. If we were scanning the petition as if it were an indictment, it might be that the allegation in point of fact, which is very general, savours so much of breach of trust as to leave little room for a charge of theft. But then we are not considering any such question. The petition contains a general allegation that at a particular time a Mr Donaldson entrusted the prisoner with certain sums of money for a particular purpose, and that he did not apply them to that purpose but appropriated them to his own uses and purposes. Whether that may turn out in point of fact to be theft or breach of trust it is impossible for us at present to say, and therefore, upon that ground, I think we should not interfere in the matter. If the charge of theft had been inserted in the petition in order to prevent the offence from being bailable, without any reasonable ground in the facts stated, we might interfere, but where the question is between breach of trust and theft, the division or partition between which is so very narrow, we should be quite wrong if, at this stage, we were to come to a decision as to which of these two categories the crime ought to be presented under. I am therefore for refusing the application on these grounds. In regard to the other ground upon which the application is rested I do not think it would be right in us to entertain it. The Crown will consider the matter, and I feel certain will not act oppressively.

No. 3.
Dec. 3, 1875. Wormald v. Lord Advocate.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL, LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, LORD YOUNG, and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THE COURT refused the petition.

WM. OFFICER, S.S.C.—J. A. JAMIESON, W.S., Crown Agent.—Agents.

No. 4.
Dec. 8, 1875. Stewart v. Edwards.

ROBERT STEWART, Appellant.—Balfour—Asher.
ANDREW EDWARDS (for the Police Commissioners of Partick), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Brand.

General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 130.—Held that the 130th section of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, which required "owners of common stairs," &c, to make, on the requisition of the Police Commissioners, "provisions for lighting such common stair," &c. "in a suitable manner, and for that purpose to provide and erect all necessary lamps, and alter, repair, and renew the same," did not impose on the owners the duty of supplying gas or other illuminating substance.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Ardmillan. Lord Mure. Justiciary Clerk.

THE question raised in this appeal, under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, from the judgment of the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Partick, was, whether the appellant, Robert Stewart, as owner of house property in a burgh (to which the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, applied), which included common stairs or passages, was bound, under the provisions of the 130th section * of that statute, when required by the Police Commissioners of the burgh, "to provide gas as well as gas pipes and jets or burners for lighting the said common stairs and passages."

It was contended for the appellant that the 130th section required the owner to "make provisions for lighting," and specified what these provisions were, namely, "to provide and erect all necessary lamps, and alter, repair, and renew such lamps," while the 131st section laid upon the occupant the duty of cleaning and lighting the lamps so erected; and that this duty laid on the occupant necessarily implied the supplying of the illuminating substance. Further, that this was made clear by the terms of the 126th section, which, when providing for the lighting of public streets, carefully distinguished between the making provision for lighting, and the actual lighting or entering into contracts for lighting by means of oil or gas or other illuminating substance.

* 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101 (The General Police and Improvement Act, 1862), sec. 130, enacts,—"The owner or owners of common stairs or passages or private courts, or of lands or premises having a right of access by any common stair or passage or private court, shall, when required by the commissioners, within seven days next after service of an order for that purpose, make provisions for lighting such common stair or passage or court in a suitable manner, and for that purpose provide and erect all necessary lamps, and alter, repair, and renew such lamps to the satisfaction of the commissioners; and in default of compliance with any such order, such owner or owners shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day that he or they shall so make default."

Argued for the respondent;—The case of the Police Commissioners providing for the lighting of public streets, and that of a private owner providing for the lighting of a common stair or private court, were very different. In the former case no one but the commissioners who supplied the lamps could supply the gas. But in the latter case the commissioners might be satisfied that one or two lamps were sufficient for a common stair or court in which a dozen or twenty different families resided. It was impossible that the Legislature could have intended to devolve the responsibility of supplying gas for the common stair or court upon the occupants as a body. For there was no provision for arranging for rateable payments for the gas consumed. The attempt would be utterly unworkable, and the commissioners would never know who was responsible, or against whom they were to proceed in the event of failure. Whereas, if the owner provided the gas, the occupants might be trusted in their own interest to light it.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—There runs through all the clauses of the General Police Act relating to lighting a distinction between two duties, the one of making provision for lighting, the other of lighting after such provision has been made. To make provision for lighting plainly implies the supply of the fixed materials—gas-pipes, lamps, burners, &c.—which are necessary. While to light as plainly implies the supplying of the illuminating material and the keeping it lighted. Now, it would be very extraordinary if the sections of this statute which deal with the matter of lighting should invert the ordinary arrangement between landlord and tenant, which is, that the owner supplies the fixed and permanent apparatus for holding or conveying the illuminating substance, while the occupant supplies the illuminating substance which is to be consumed, and lights it when required. If it was the intention of the statute to invert the ordinary rule for general police considerations, then one would expect that this should be clearly provided. But I find no such thing. On the contrary, it is plain that the statute adopts the general rule. I therefore think that the determination of the commissioners must be reversed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Reverse the determination of the magistrate, and remit the case to him to dismiss the complaint, and find the appellant entitled to expenses in this Court: Remit the account thereof to the Clerk of Court to tax and report, and decern."

J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 5.

Dec. 8, 1875.
Donaldson v. Linton.

JAMES DONALDSON, Appellant.—D.-F. Watson—R. V. Campbell.
THOMAS LINTON, Respondent.—M'Laren—Brown.

Public-House Certificate, breach of—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, schedule (A), No. 2.—In an appeal against a conviction for breach of a public-house certificate by selling exciseable liquor to a child "apparently under fourteen years of age," held that though there would be no breach of certificate committed by supplying liquor to such child when he is a messenger for an adult, yet the publican is not entitled to assume, without inquiring and satisfying himself, that the child is the messenger of an adult.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Ardmillan. Lord Mure. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was an appeal presented to the High Court of Justiciary on a case stated under the "Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875," for James Donaldson, public-house keeper, Edinburgh, against Thomas Linton, procurator-fiscal of the Edinburgh Police Court.

The appellant had been convicted by the Sheriff in the Police Court of breach of certificate by selling exciseable liquors in his premises, No. 7 Hamilton Place, Stockbridge, on 28th October 1875, to Robert Matheson, aged eight years or thereby.

One of the conditions of a public-house certificate (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, schedule (A), No. 2) is that the publican "do not sell or supply exciseable liquor to girls or boys apparently under fourteen years of age."

The appellant's public-house on the day in question was in charge of his daughter-in-law, Mrs Helen Ross or Donaldson, and an assistant, Sarah Weir. The facts set forth in the case by the Judge in the Police Court were—"The boy Robert Mathieson, being a boy between eight and nine years of age, and apparently under fourteen years of age, was sent alone into the appellant's shop about ten o'clock in the forenoon of the day libelled, and at his request was supplied with half a gill of whisky put into a bottle, and for which he paid twopence-halfpenny for the whisky, and a penny for the bottle. The boy Mathieson in so acting had been sent to the shop by another boy, William Mason, who had also supplied him with the money for the whisky and bottle. Mathieson was asked no questions in the shop as to whom the liquor was for, he was not known in the shop, and he left the shop carrying with him the bottle containing the whisky, which he handed to the boy Mason in a neighbouring street, out of the sight and knowledge of the person in charge of the appellant's shop. Mason, with other boys then present, drank the whisky, Mathieson not getting any part thereof. The person in charge of the appellant's shop had on the same day, about an hour previous to Mathieson's visit, refused to sell whisky when Mason, accompanied by two or three other boys, but not by the boy Mathieson, had come in a party into the shop for it. Mason was about thirteen years of age. He was a message boy in the employment of a licensed grocer in the neighbourhood of appellant's shop. Mrs Helen Ross or Donaldson and her assistant, Sarah Weir, stated in evidence that their custom in managing the shop was to supply boys and girls with exciseable liquors when they believed that they came only as messengers for adults, and to refuse such supply when they knew, or had reason to suspect, that it was for the children themselves and their own consumption. Mrs Helen Ross or Donaldson further stated, that in this particular case she believed that the boy Mathieson was acting only as such messenger, and that the drink supplied to him was not for his own consumption.

"The questions of law for the opinion of the Court of Justiciary were:—(1) On the facts stated, were the spirits sold by the appellant to the boy

No. 5.

Dec. 8, 1875.
Donaldson v. Linton.

Robert Mathieson, contrary to the terms and intent of the appellant's certificate? (2) Is it necessary, to constitute the breach of certificate libelled, for the prosecutor to prove that exciseable liquors were sold to the boy Robert Mathieson for himself and his own consumption? (3) Was it a sufficient defence for the publican that, under the circumstances above stated, he believed the boy to be a messenger, and that the liquor supplied was not to be consumed by him or other boys under fourteen years of age?"

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is a very clear case. The appellant has been convicted under the Public Houses Act of 1862 of a breach of his certificate, in respect that on 28th October last he sold whisky to a child of eight years of age.

The species facti as disclosed in the complaint laid against him were that "he did, in his licensed premises at Hamilton Place aforesaid, sell spirits or other exciseable liquors to Robert Mathieson aged eight years or thereby," &c. That appears to me to be a relevant charge. True, it might perhaps be more correct, and in the general case even necessary, to add "and apparently under fourteen years of age," but in the case of so young a child as Mathieson that was hardly requisite. The facts alleged were found proved.

Now, I do not think that the mere fact of sale to a child apparently under fourteen years of age is itself conclusive. For I would not carry the operation of the statute so far as to say that, if the child comes as a messenger from an adult, and the publican is satisfied that he is such messenger, yet the publican if he supplies the child with liquor is to be held to have committed a breach of certificate. Nor would I say that if the publican knows the child to be in the habit of coming as a messenger from a certain adult, he is not entitled to trust to that use without making any special inquiry. But what I am clear of is this, that the publican is not entitled to sell to a child apparently under the age of fourteen years without inquiring and satisfying himself that the child is truly a messenger for an adult.

Now, how do the facts in this case stand? The child entered the shop, and asked for so much whisky, and tendered the price. The whisky was thereupon put into a bottle and given to the child, who took it away. The child was unknown to those in charge of the shop. They had never seen him before. They asked no questions, made no inquiry, and took no steps to satisfy themselves whether the child was a messenger or not.

Under these circumstances I entertain not the slightest doubt that a breach of certificate was committed, and that the Sheriff's judgment in the Police Court was sound.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question in the case in the affirmative, and the second and third questions in the negative: Affirm the determination of the inferior Judge: Dismiss the appeal: Find the appellant liable in expenses," &c.

ALEX. WYLIE, W.S.—GRAHAM & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 6.

Dec. 16, 1875.
Black v. Bradshaw.

EBENEZER STOTT BLACK, Appellant.—Gloag, A.-D.
DAVID BRADSHAW, Respondent.

Pouching—Day Trespass Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68), sec. 1—Person residing with Tenant.—Held that a person who resided with his sister on a farm of which she was tenant, and who assisted her in the management thereof without remuneration except his board, was not, as regarded the said farm, protected from the operation of the Day Trespass Act by reason of the provision in the first section thereof, which allows a person charged with a trespass to prove, by way of defence, any matter which would have been a defence to an action at law for such trespass.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Ardmillan.
Lord Mure.
Justiciary Clerk.

THE respondent, David Bradshaw, designed in the appeal as "lately a flesher, and now or lately residing at High Glenluig in the parish of Mochrum and county of Wigtown, or at Low Glenluig in the parish of Mochrum foresaid," was charged at the instance of the appellant, Ebenezer S. Black, procurator-fiscal in the Justice of Peace Court, Wigtownshire, with a breach of the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, committed on the farm of High Glenluig above mentioned.

A preliminary plea was taken for the respondent founded on section 1 of the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68,* to the effect that being a member of the family of the tenant of the land he could not be guilty of the offence charged.

This plea the Justices, after proof led, sustained.

The procurator-fiscal took an appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

The facts stated in the case, as proved to the satisfaction of the Justices, were, that the respondent was the brother of Mrs Livingstone, the tenant of the farms of High and Low Glenluig; that Mrs Livingstone was a widow without children, and resided on the farm of Low Glenluig; that the respondent resided with her there, and had done so for at least five years; that he assisted her in the management of Low Glenluig, and worked occasionally on both that farm and High Glenluig without receiving wages; that he lived in family with Mrs Livingstone, and received his board from her; that he was not bound as a servant or to continue with Mrs Livingstone longer than he felt inclined.

The question of law stated for the opinion of the Court was,—"Whether the respondent, in the circumstances stated, is guilty of the offence of trespass under the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68?"

Argued for the appellant;—The tenant was the only person who could not commit an offence under the Day Trespass Act.[1] It had been held that a farm servant was not excluded from the provisions of the Act,[2] and the position of the respondent was even less favourable than that of a farm servant.[3]

No appearance was made for the respondent.

---

* 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1, enacts, ". . . . . Provided always that any person charged with any such trespass shall be at liberty to prove, by way of defence, any matter which would have been a defence to an action at law for such trespass."

[1] Smellie v. Lockhart, June 1, 1844, 2 Broun, 194; Kinnoul v. Tod, Dec. 15, 1859, 3 Irv. 501, 32 Scot. Jur. 154.

[2] Selkirk v. Kennedy, Dec. 14, 1850, J. Shaw, 463; Reaper v. Duff, Feb. 6, 1860, 3 Irv. 529, 32 Scot. Jur. 478.

[3] Porter v. Duff, March 22, 1858, 3 Irv. 57, 30 Scot. Jur. 518.

At advising,— No. 6.

Dec. 16, 1875. Black v. Bradshaw.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the respondent, Bradshaw, was charged before the Justices of Peace for the county of Wigtown with a breach of the Day Trespass Act. The Justices came to the conclusion that the respondent, from the circumstance of his residence on the farm on which the trespass was libelled as committed, could not be guilty of an offence under the Act.

Though the brother of the tenant, the respondent does not seem to have had any official position in regard to the farm. He assisted in the management, and even sometimes himself worked, but he was free to go or come as he pleased, and to do as much or as little as he liked. Whether at the time of the charge he had any other occupation does not appear from the case stated, but apparently at one time he was a flesher. It is in fact impossible to distinguish his position from that of an ordinary visitor, though his visit may have been one of a long duration. The question is whether under these circumstances he comes under the provisions of the Day Trespass Act.

Were the question open I should hold it to be one of difficulty. A tenant has been held to be excluded while a farm servant has been held to be included within the category of possible offenders under the Act. Now, it is not easy to draw a logical distinction between these two cases. The question in both was, how far was the panel committing a trespass on the occasion libelled by being on the land. And the argument for the panel in both was that the offence charged could only be committed by a person who had no right whatever to be upon the land, and it is somewhat difficult to see why the argument should have been accepted in defence of the one and rejected in the case of the other.

But the question is concluded by authority. On the one hand the tenant has been held not to be within the provisions of the Act. It is true indeed that in the case of Smellie (2 Broun, 194) Lord Mackenzie did say that every one with the leave of the tenant would be in the same position as the tenant himself, but the Court has not followed that dictum out to its conclusion. For on the other hand it was found in the case of Selkirk (J. Shaw, 463) that a farm servant did come within the provisions of the Act.

Now, the respondent here was not even in the position of a farm servant. There was not the same necessity or call for him to be on the land. He was not there in respect of his ordinary occupation, and cannot therefore be in a more favourable position than a farm servant. He does not, in my opinion, differ from a mere stranger who may happen to be residing with the tenant. I think, therefore, the appeal should be sustained.

LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—I also concur. And I think that there are provisions in the statute which warrant a distinction being drawn between the case of a tenant and that of a farm servant or a visitor, and more especially because there are certain powers conferred on the tenant or occupant authorising him to do certain things towards carrying the Act into effect.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I am of the same opinion. I am quite satisfied, and very much on the grounds stated by Lord Mure, that the distinction between a tenant and a farm servant is a sound one.

No. 6.

Dec. 16, 1875.
Black v. Bradshaw.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the question in the case in the affirmative: Reverse the determination of the Justices; remit the matter to them with this opinion, and direct them to proceed in consistency therewith: Find no expenses due, and decern."

J. AULDJO JAMIESON, Crown Agent.—Agent.

No. 7.

Mar. 1, 1876.
M'Adam v. Laurie.

WILLIAM M'ADAM, Appellant.—Lang.
WILLIAM KENNEDY LAURIE, Respondent.—Mackintosh.

Game—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68—Trespass—Rabbits—Tenant's Power of delegating right to kill Rabbits.—The tenant of a farm, who resided at a distance, put his daughter and her husband into the farm to manage it. Held that the rabbits not being reserved to the landlord, the tenant was entitled to authorise his son-in-law to kill rabbits, and that the son-in-law was, in virtue of the tenant's authority, exempted from the provisions of the Day Trespass Act.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Ardmillan. Lord Young. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was an appeal to the High Court of Justiciary under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, from the Justice of Peace Court of the stewartry of Kirkcudbright.

The case stated set forth that the appellant, William M'Adam, had been charged at the instance of the respondent, William Kennedy Laurie, of Woodhall, with a contravention of the Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68), sec. 1, inasmuch as on 3d September 1875, he did "unlawfully enter, and was, without leave of the said William Kennedy Laurie, found trespassing upon the lands known as the farm of Cullenoch, in the occupation of George Henderson and James Henderson, or one or other of them, in the parish of Balmaglin, the property of the said William Kennedy Laurie, in search or pursuit of game."

That the appellant denied the charge of trespassing in pursuit of game, but admitted that he had on the day libelled killed three rabbits on the farm of Cullenoch, and maintained that he was entitled to do so, his wife being tenant of the farm, and he having written permission from her to kill rabbits thereon, which he produced, and in the event of its being found that his wife was not tenant of the farm, the foresaid George Henderson being so, and he having also written permission from him to kill rabbits thereon, which permission he produced.*

That the appellant managed the said farm of Cullenoch, and, with his wife, who was a daughter of George Henderson, occupied the farm-house. That they and their family were the only persons resident upon it. That George and James Henderson occupied other farms at a considerable distance from Cullenoch, and resided there.

That it was admitted by the respondent that the tenant of the farm of Cullenoch was entitled to kill rabbits thereon, there being no reservation of them in the lease.

That it was proved that the appellant was found trespassing on the farm of Cullenoch as libelled.

That the Court found it established that George Henderson was tenant of the farm of Cullenoch.

That the Court found the appellant guilty of the contravention charged, "upon the ground that the said George Henderson could not grant him

* It was at the time of the prosecution and of this judgment of the Court of Justiciary a depending question in the Court of Session whether the appellant's wife or George Henderson was tenant of the farm of Cullenoch.

No. 7.

Mar. 1, 1876.
M'Adam v. Laurie.

permission to kill rabbits on said farm, so as to protect him from prosecution under the Day Trespass Act."

The question of law submitted to the Court was:—"Can the appellant, in the circumstances stated, be convicted of the trespass libelled?"

It was stated for the respondent when the case came to be argued before the Court of Justiciary that the admission that the rabbits were not reserved to the landlord in the lease of Cullenoch was erroneous, and made by his agent per incuriam, and he offered to produce the lease. The Court, however, declined to look at it.

It was also stated for the respondent that the letters founded upon by the appellant, both from his wife and from George Henderson, giving him permission to kill rabbits, were granted after the date of the offence libelled. This appeared to be the case from the dates they bore. The letter from George Henderson, however, was to the effect that the appellant "has had, and now has," such permission.

Argued for the appellant;—Taking it that George Henderson was tenant of the farm, still it was admitted that he did not reside on it, but put his daughter and the appellant, her husband, into it, to manage it. As a tenant was held not to invade any person's right by being on his farm in pursuit of game, so neither did a person put into the management of a farm by an absentee tenant. The latter could not any more than the former be guilty of a contravention of the Day Trespass Act. Further, a tenant who has right to kill rabbits is entitled to delegate that right to any one, and particularly to his manager, when he himself does not reside on the farm. Otherwise he could neither keep down rabbits nor claim against his landlord for damages in respect of them.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant, as merely manager of the farm, must be held to be in the position of a farm servant, and to be capable of a contravention of the Day Trespass Act.[1] The tenant who, though contrary to the fact, must in this case be held to have right to kill rabbits, was not entitled to delegate that right, and even if he was so entitled he had not in point of fact so delegated it at the date of the offence libelled, but only attempted to do so ex post facto for the purpose of the defence to this prosecution.

LORD YOUNG.—There was here no trespass in any admissible sense of the word. The ordinary meaning attached to the word "trespass" is the entering upon land where you have no right to be. The appellant was certainly not guilty of trespass in that sense.

But for the decisions which have been pronounced on the point I should be inclined to say that trespass upon land in pursuit of game meant trespass in the ordinary sense above noticed, and not trespass upon a right attaching to land. But the only other admissible sense of the term trespass is that in which it is frequently popularly employed—namely, transgression—invasion of the rights of others. Now, there was nothing of that sort here. Even assuming that the true tenant of this farm was the appellant's father-in-law, surely he was entitled to put him into the farm to manage it, and, at the same time, to communicate to him the right which he had to kill rabbits. Had the rabbits been reserved to the landlord then there might have been a trespass upon the landlord's right, and that would have raised a different question. But the case stated to us assumes that the rabbits were not reserved to the landlord.

[1] Earl of Selkirk v. Kennedy, Dec. 14, 1850, J. Shaw, 463; Black v. Bradshaw, Dec. 16, 1875, supra, p. 18.

No. 7.

Mar. 1, 1876. M'Adam v. Laurie.

A suggestion was made in the course of the argument that the permission to kill rabbits granted to the appellant by his father-in-law was an after-thought to meet the exigencies of the defence. But the suggestion does not commend itself to my mind. There was no reason why leave should not have been given all along. It was the most natural thing in the world that it should be so, and there was no necessity for its being in writing. On the whole matter, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that the conviction was bad, and ought to be set aside.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I do not think there can be any doubt that the presence of the accused on the ground, if innocent, is not in itself a trespass; and, therefore, the prosecutor must prove that the accused by his conduct shewed that he was truly a trespasser. Now, even setting aside the question whether the appellant's father-in-law or his wife is the tenant of this farm, at any rate it is stated as a fact, and we must so accept it, that the rabbits were not reserved. The tenant had therefore right to kill them, and having this right he was not bound to exercise it proprio manu. He was entitled to employ a man to keep down rabbits. If, then, he gave his son-in-law, who resides on the farm, authority to kill rabbits on the farm, that son-in-law could not be convicted of poaching by trespassing in pursuit of game, by reason of his acting under that authority.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first thing pleaded by the respondent was that the Justices had found the appellant guilty of trespassing as libelled, and that we must infer that they had satisfied themselves on the evidence of that fact. But I cannot look at that as a finding in fact. It is rather, I think, an inference in law from the facts set out in the case, which bear the appellant's admission of having killed three rabbits, but say nothing about any other evidence of the contravention libelled. Therefore the case comes to this, that the appellant, being the husband of the occupant of the farm, killed these rabbits with permission of the tenant, who was not himself the occupant, and the question is, Is the appellant therefore liable to be convicted under the Day Trespass Act? I am of opinion that he is not. The appellant's wife occupied the farm, and the appellant managed it. Even without leave of the principal tenant he was entitled to kill and keep down the rabbits, if nothing were said to the contrary. But the rabbits were not reserved by the landlord, and the appellant had the leave of the tenant. I concur therefore in thinking that the answer we must give to the question put to us by the inferior Court is that the appellant cannot, in the circumstances stated, be convicted under the Day Trespass Act.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Answer the question in the negative: Reverse the determination of the Justices, and remit the case to them to dismiss the complaint: Find the appellant entitled to expenses in this Court: Remit the account thereof," &c., "and decern."

DANIEL TURNER, S.L.—RUSSELL & NICOLSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 8.

Mar. 4, 1876. Simpson v. Lord Advocate.

ALEXANDER SIMPSON, Petitioner.—Macdonald—J. A. Reid.
THE LORD ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Muirhead, A.-D.

Crime—Running Letters—Criminal Letters.—A person was apprehended on 30th October, and committed to prison on 6th November 1875, on a charge of theft. On 18th December the prisoner obtained letters of intimation, which were intimated to the Crown on 20th December 1875. On 17th February 1876 the prisoner was served with an indictment citing him before the High Court of Justiciary on 28th March, these dates being respectively the fifty-ninth and ninty-ninth days from the date of the prisoner commencing to run his letters. On the averment that he had been already four months in prison, and that he believed it was not the intention of the Crown to proceed to trial on the 28th March 1876, but to apply for warrant to serve criminal letters on him under 1701, c. 6, and try him at the Dundee Spring Circuit Court, the petitioner craved the Court, before granting warrant for serving criminal letters upon him, to appoint him to appear and shew cause why such warrant should not be granted.

No. 8.

Mar. 4, 1876.

Simpson v. Lord Advocate.

Petition refused—and observed that even if the petitioner had made out a case of hardship the Court would not interfere with the issuing of criminal letters, but would only require the Crown to give notice to the petitioner before a warrant of recommitment was applied for with a view to the service of the letters.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS petition, presented to the High Court of Justiciary, set forth that the petitioner, Alexander Simpson, joiner, Dundee, was on 30th October apprehended and on 6th November 1875 committed for trial on a charge of theft.

That bail was refused and the case remitted for trial before the Sheriff and a jury, but that this order for trial was countermanded.

That on 11th December 1875 the petitioner applied to the High Court of Justiciary to be admitted to bail, but that the application was refused.

That on 18th December 1875 the petitioner obtained letters of intimation, intimation of which was made to the Crown authorities on 20th December 1875. That no step was, however, taken by the Lord Advocate until the 17th February 1876, being the fifty-ninth day after the intimation of the letters, when the petitioner was served with an indictment charging him with theft, and citing him to appear before the High Court of Justiciary on 28th March 1876, being the fortieth day from the date of citation, and the ninty-ninth day from the date of the intimation of the letters.

That the petitioner had reason to believe that it was not the intention of the Crown authorities to proceed with his trial on the 28th March 1876, but to apply for warrant to serve criminal letters upon him under the Act of 1701, c. 6, and under these letters to try him at the Dundee Spring Circuit Court.

That the petitioner had already been four months in prison, and would have been five months by the 28th March 1876. That since the date of his commitment no additional charge had been brought against him, nor had anything occurred to prevent the Crown bringing him to trial, and in particular that nothing had since occurred which could warrant the Crown in delaying the trial, or of a kind contemplated by the Act 1701, c. 6, the whole information on which the Crown were proceeding having been in their possession from the first.

That in delaying his trial for the period of five months the Crown authorities had acted oppressively, and should be granted no further delay beyond the 28th March 1876.

And that in the circumstances he was entitled to be heard before a warrant for serving criminal letters upon him was granted.

The prayer of the petition was,—"May it therefore please your Lordships, after such intimation to the Lord Advocate as to your Lordships shall seem proper, to appoint the petitioner, before any warrant is granted for serving criminal letters upon him, to appear, by his agent or counsel, before your Lordships, and to state to your Lordships the grounds upon which he humbly entreats said warrant should not be granted."

No. 8.

Mar. 4, 1876. Simpson v. Lord Advocate.

The petition was, on 1st March, appointed to be intimated to the Lord Advocate, and was heard on 3d March.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This petition is substantially of the nature of a caveat that criminal letters should not issue on a bill without notice to the petitioner. There is at present no application for criminal letters on the part of the Crown. On the contrary, the prisoner has been indicted for trial before this Court on the 28th of this month. If I thought that the petitioner had disclosed a case of hardship I should not have interfered with the issuing of criminal letters, which by long practice does not require the intervention of a Judge, but I might have required the prosecutor to give reasonable notice to the prisoner before a warrant of recommitment was applied for with a view to the service of the letters. But seeing that the Dundee Spring Circuit, at which the prisoner may probably be tried, commences on the 29th of this month, and looking to the terms of the prisoner's declaration, which I have read, there is no case stated which calls for the interference of the Court.

THE COURT refused the petition.

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—J. A. JAMIESON, Crown Agent.—Agents.

No. 9.

Mar. 27, 1876. Lord Advocate v. Wormald.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Gloag, A.D.
JOSEPH DAWSON WORMALD.—Fraser—Mair.

Indictment—Theft—Relevancy.—In an indictment charging alternatively theft and breach of trust, it was stated in that part of the minor which related to the charge of theft that the panel, being a law-agent, and having been entrusted by a client to uplift a sum belonging to him, deposited in bank, for the special purpose of investing the same in heritable security, did then steal and theftuously away take the said sum. Held that this was a relevant charge of theft.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Justiciary Clerk.

JOSEPH DAWSON WORMALD was charged with the crime of theft, as also breach of trust and embezzlement, "in so far as (1) you, the said Joseph Dawson Wormald, being a writer to Her Majesty's signet, and being, time first after libelled, in practice as a law-agent in Edinburgh, in partnership with Charles Anderson, sometime law-agent in Edinburgh, under the name and firm of Wormald and Anderson, writers to the signet, and the said firm of Wormald and Anderson having been employed as law-agents for Andrew Donaldson, causeway-layer, now or lately residing in or near Buccleuch Street, Edinburgh, and you, the said Joseph Dawson Wormald, having, as law-agent of the said Andrew Donaldson, or otherwise, become aware that he, the said Andrew Donaldson, had certain sums of money belonging to him deposited in his name in the bank of Scotland at Edinburgh, and in the Union Bank of Scotland at Edinburgh, did, on various occasions in the months of August and September 1871, represent to the said Andrew Donaldson, who was at that time an inmate in the Royal Edinburgh Asylum for the Insane at Morningside, near Edinburgh, that the said sums should be uplifted from the said banks and invested in his name on heritable or other sufficient security; and the said Andrew Donaldson having, in consequence of your representations as aforesaid, on or about the 8th September 1871, authorised and entrusted you as law-agent foresaid, or the said firm of Wormald and Anderson, to uplift the said sums belonging to him, and deposited in his name in the Bank of Scotland and Union Bank of Scotland as aforesaid, for the special purpose of investing the same, when so uplifted, in his name on heritable

No. 9.
Mar. 27, 1876.
Lord Advocate v. Wormald.

security, with the exception of £100 thereof; and having instructed and entrusted you so to invest the said sums, with the exception foresaid, when you so uplifted the same, and you, the said Joseph Dawson Wormald, having, on the authority foresaid, on or about the 8th September 1871, uplifted and received, on behalf of the said Andrew Donaldson from the Bank of Scotland at the office of the said bank in Bank Street, Edinburgh, the sum of £404, 11s. 7d. sterling, being the amount contained in a deposit-receipt of the said bank in name of the said Andrew Donaldson, dated 11th February 1871, and interest thereon, you did, on the said 8th day of September 1871, or on some other of the days of that month, or of the month of October immediately following, and within or near the premises of the said bank in Bank Street aforesaid, or within or near the premises in Princes Street, Edinburgh, then occupied by the said Wormald and Anderson, or elsewhere in the city of Edinburgh to the prosecutor unknown, wickedly and feloniously steal and theftously away take the said sum of £404, 11s. 7d. sterling: or otherwise you, the said Joseph Dawson Wormald, did fail to invest the said sum of £404, 11s. 7d. sterling, or any part thereof, on heritable security in the name of the said Andrew Donaldson, or to account therefor to the said Andrew Donaldson, and you did, time and place above libelled, wickedly and feloniously, and in breach of the trust reposed in you as aforesaid, embezzle and appropriate to your own uses and purposes the said sum of £404, 11s. 7d. sterling, the said sum of money so stolen or embezzled and appropriated by you, as above libelled, being the property or in the lawful possession of the said Andrew Donaldson, and consisting of bank or banker's notes, and of gold, silver, and copper or bronze money, or one or more of them."

There was a similar charge in regard to another sum of £236, 11s. 11d.

Objected for the panel;—On the face of the indictment there was manifestly no obligation on the panel to deliver the money in forma specifica, and therefore there could be no relevant charge of theft.[1]

Replied for the Crown;—In the case of Climie, relied on for the panel, there was great difference of opinion on the bench, and the case was a special one. The mere fact that a certain amount of trust was connected with the possession of the money was not in itself sufficient to take appropriation of the money by the person so entrusted out of the category of theft.[2] The libel disclosed with sufficient plainness that the panel had obtained control over Donaldson's deposit-receipt, not that he might become his banker, but for the sole purpose of investing the money.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The objection raises a somewhat nice and delicate question—perhaps not one of very great practical importance, in so far as the interests of the prisoner are concerned, for the crime remains practically the same in character whether it be theft or breach of trust. But still it is necessary, the question having been raised, that I should dispose of it. Assuming the statement in the minor proposition in as far as regards the charge of theft, the whole amounts to this—that Mr Donaldson had money in the bank to the amount of £600, that he was advised by Mr Wormald, as his law-agent, that it would be desirable to have that money invested in heritable security, and that in consequence of that he granted the necessary authority to Mr Wormald, as his law-agent, to invest the money in heritable security for him, and that in order to [1] Climie, May 21, 1838, 2 Swinton, 118.

[2] M'Intosh, Feb. 2, 1835, 13 S. 1168; Murray and Tait, Nov. 18, 1829, cited in Alison's Criminal Law, vol. i. p. 251; Smith and Wishart, May 18, 1842, 1 Broun, 342.

No. 9.

Mar. 27, 1876. Lord Advocate v. Wormald.

enable Mr Wormald to carry out his instructions, Mr Donaldson endorsed in his favour certain deposit-receipts which he held for the money. Now, the duty of a law-agent, in these circumstances, clearly was to seek for an heritable security, and when he had found one, then to uplift the money from the bank and pay it to the borrower. But he certainly had no authority in the circumstances disclosed in the indictment to uplift that money until he had obtained an heritable security. Therefore, when he uplifted the money without having obtained the heritable security he did an act which was not authorised by Mr Donaldson at all, and the statement is that in such circumstances he uplifted the money on the 8th September 1871, and on that day stole the money. Now, in these circumstances, I am driven to the conclusion that this is a relevant charge of theft.

THE objections to the libel were accordingly repelled, and the libel found relevant.

J. A. JAMIESON, Crown Agent.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 10.

April 4, 1876. Barlas v. Chalmers.

WILLIAM BARLAS, Appellant.—Millie.
WILLIAM CHALMERS, Respondent.—Muirhead, A.-D.

Administration of Justice—Trespass—Question of Civil Right.—In a criminal prosecution before a Justice of Peace Court, for fishing for salmon without leave of the proprietor, the accused admitted having fished for salmon on the day and at the place libelled, but maintained that as a member of the community of Perth he had a right to fish at the place libelled, and in support of his contention produced a copy, admitted to be correct, of a royal charter in favour of the citizens of Perth, and offered to prove that possession had followed upon the charter of the right to fish for salmon at the place libelled from the date of the charter to the present period.

The Justices stated their opinion that they could not go into the question of heritable right, and, on the ground that a prima facie title had been produced by the complainer, convicted the accused. Held, that a question of civil right being involved, the Justices should have either sisted procedure or dismissed the complaint, and—conviction quashed.

Perth Circuit. Ld. Ardmillan. Ld. Craighill.

ON 23d September 1875 a complaint under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, was presented to the Justices of Peace for the county of Perth by William Chalmers, solicitor in Perth, on behalf of the Tay District Board, against William Barlas, ironmonger, Perth, in which the accused was charged with having contravened "The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868," and the Act 7th and 8th Vict. c. 95,* incorporated therewith, "in so far as upon Saturday the 4th day of September 1875, or about that time, the said William Barlas did wilfully take, fish for, or attempt to take or aid or assist in taking, fishing for, or attempting to take salmon, grilse, sea-trout, whitling, or other fish of the salmon kind in or from the river Tay, at a part of said river near to or between the fishing station on the left bank of said river, commonly called or known by the name of 'Thumbie' station, in the parish of Scone and county of Perth, and the fishing station on the right bank thereof, commonly called or known by the name of 'Muirton' station, in the parish of Perth and county foresaid, and that without having a legal right or permission from the Right Honourable the Earl of Mansfield, proprietor of the salmon-fishings there, and did on said occasion take or kill fish of the salmon kind."

* 7 and 8 Vict., c. 95, sec. 1, quoted infra, p. 28.

No. 10.

April 4, 1876.
Barlas v. Chalmers.

Upon the 28th September 1875 Barlas compeared before the Justices, and pleaded not guilty.

The procedure before the Justices sufficiently appears from the following excerpts from the minutes of procedure;—"The complainer put in an extract registered disposition by the Earl of Kinnoull to the Earl of Mansfield, dated 10th April, and registered in the General Register of Sasines 20th September 1875." . . .

At an adjourned diet on 13th October 1875, the defender's agent "stated that the defender had a right to fish for salmon at the place libelled without permission from the Earl of Mansfield, and denied that the Earl of Mansfield was exclusive proprietor of the salmon-fishings there. The defender also admitted that he did fish for and kill salmon on the day and at the place libelled, in virtue of his own right to do so. . . .

"The defender's agent here put in a printed copy of a charter by King James VI. in favour of the town of Perth, dated 15th November 1600, and a translation thereof. Mr Chalmers, the prosecutor, admitted the correctness of the copy charter produced, and the defender's agent offered to prove that possession had followed upon that charter of the right to fish for salmon at the places mentioned in the complaint from the date of said charter to the present period, and also of the salmon-fishings themselves at these places, and tendered for examination the following witnesses" (here follows a list of the witnesses tendered). . . .

"The Justices refuse to allow such a proof, as they are of opinion that they cannot go in this case into a question of disputed title, and they are satisfied that a prima facie title has been produced and made out by complainer, which is all that is necessary for the decision of this case of trespass or fishing without leave of a proprietor. . . .

"At Perth, the 13th day of October 1875 years, the Justices, in respect of the admissions by defender and evidence adduced, convict the said William Barlas of the contravention charged against him as libelled, and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay to the complainer the sum of ten shillings of modified penalty for the said contravention, together with the sum of two pounds as modified expenses, and ordain instant execution," &c.

Barlas appealed to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, under the 30th section of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868.

Argued for him;—The Justices, while refusing to go into the question of disputed title, had virtually decided that question against the accused.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The appellant questions the right of the complainer to prosecute him for fishing in the Tay. He pleads that, as a citizen of Perth, he has an ancient right to fish for salmon in the place libelled. The complainer, or prosecutor, produces a recent title in favour of Lord Mansfield. A dispute having arisen as to the title, the Justices had two courses to choose between, and either of them would have been a competent course. They might, on the one hand, have said, "This case involves a question of heritable right, and we cannot convict until that question is tried in the ordinary way in which such civil questions are tried," and they might have sisted procedure; or, on the other hand, they might have dismissed the case, as involving a question which they could not competently decide. The latter, I think, would have been the most appropriate course, for the object is, obviously, to try the question of right, and a conviction on this prosecution, without disposing of the question of right, must be most unsatisfactory. I am of opinion that the conviction, obtained without ascertaining the rights of the parties, is liable to serious objection, and should be quashed accordingly.

No. 10. LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

April 4, 1876. Barlas v. Chalmers.

THIS judgment was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal, recall the judgment complained of, and discharge and annul in toto the conviction recorded against the appellant: Find the appellant entitled to expenses; modify the same to the sum of £5, 5s., for which and the dues of extract decern against the respondent."

WILLIAM YOUNG, Perth.—PARTY.—Agents.

No. 11. WILLIAM GRANT, Appellant.—D.-F. Watson—Balfour.
NICHOLAS WRIGHT, Respondent.—Innes.

May 31, 1876. Grant v. Wright.

Crime—Contravention of Salmon Fisheries Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict. c. 95).—A fisherman was charged with a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1844, sec. 1, by unlawfully and wilfully taking, fishing for, or attempting to take sea-trout by means of set lines. It was stated in defence, that, finding sea-trout upon lines which, as he averred, he had baited and set for flounders in a bay or estuary of the sea frequented by both kinds of fish, he had appropriated them. He was acquitted by the Sheriff after evidence led. In an appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, at the instance of the prosecutor, held that the question whether the respondent had wilfully taken the fish, in contravention of the statute, was one of fact for the inferior Judge; that there was no question of law for the Court; and appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Ld. Craighill. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was an appeal on a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, from the Sheriff Court of Elginshire.

The case set forth that the respondent, Nicholas Wright, was charged at the instance of the appellant, William Grant, writer in Elgin, who prosecuted for the Local Fishery Board, with having been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 95,* in so far as, on Friday, 31st March 1876, he did unlawfully and wilfully take, fish for, or attempt to take, one or more salmon, &c., by means of set lines, in or from the estuary of the river Findhorn, at a place near Elvin Point, and opposite the village of Findhorn, without a legal right or permission from the proprietor of the salmon-fishings there.

That at the trial, which took place under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, before the Sheriff-substitute (D. Macleod Smith), on 7th April 1876, the respondent pled not guilty, and that evidence was led to the following effect:—

"Elvin Point is on the west side of the estuary of the Findhorn, about opposite to the village of Findhorn, which is on the east side of the estuary. The distance between the village and Elvin Point is about half a mile. The estuary expands inland for about two miles beyond the village into what is known as the bay of Findhorn, which is covered by the tide at high water to the extent of several square miles." . . . .

"On the occasion in question, about eight o'clock in the morning, the respondent and another man were seen from the village of Findhorn hauling fishing lines at Elvin Point, and coming across in a coble from there to the village. On arrival at the village side of the estuary they

* The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict. c. 95), sec. 1, enacts that, "if any person, not having a legal right or permission from the proprietor of the salmon fishery, shall, from and after the passing of this Act, wilfully take, fish for, or attempt to take, or aid or assist in taking, fishing for, or attempting to take, in or from any river, stream, lake, water, estuary, firth, sea loch, creek, bay, or shore of the sea, or in or upon any part of the sea within one mile of low-water mark, in Scotland, any salmon, grilse, sea-trout, whitling, or other fish of the salmon kind, such person shall forfeit and pay," &c.

No. 11.

May 31, 1876.
Grant v. Wright.

saw one of the salmon fishery constables and the village constable and the manager of the salmon fishery waiting for them. They thereupon tried to go away again with the coble and its contents, but she was seized hold of by the salmon fishery constable. The respondent taking with him one of the fishing lines and a basket thereupon jumped into the water. The line, on being taken hold of by the constable, broke, and on the part of it retained by the constable there were found three sea-trout. There were ten trout on the other part of the line which remained in the basket, some of which were sea-trout, and the witnesses were uncertain as to the description of the remaining three. There were also some flounders in the coble. The lines were ordinary haddock lines, baited with sand eels."

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that he was fishing for flounders in the ordinary manner, in a place where the public were entitled to fish for them, and that he was not fishing for sea-trout or other fish of the salmon kind, but that the trout having come upon his lines, he was entitled to appropriate them.

The Sheriff also stated that "it was proved that the estuary and bay of Findhorn are frequented by flounders, and that it has been the custom to take them there from time immemorial. It was also proved that sea-trout frequently came upon the lines so set, and that it has been the practice of the fishermen so finding them to appropriate them. On the other hand, some of the witnesses expressed an opinion that the place where the respondent was seen hauling the lines was, from the nature of the bottom, a more likely place for trout than for flounders. In point of fact, however, both kinds of fish were got there."

The Sheriff assoilzied the panel, whereupon the prosecutor took this appeal.

The question of law stated for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether the respondent, professing to be fishing for flounders, and having fished in a manner adapted for that purpose in the estuary of the Findhorn at a place, stated by some of the witnesses of the complainer to be more likely for catching sea-trout than flounders, but which was, in point of fact, frequented by both kinds of fish, and one or more sea-trout having come upon his line, and having been there found by him, and having been taken by him from the line and appropriated, has thereby rendered himself liable to the penalties of the statute founded on in the complaint?"

After hearing counsel for the appellant,—

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think it is necessary to call for a reply. The question was put to the counsel for the appellant at an early stage of the case, what exactly was the error in law complained of? His answer was that the Sheriff had gone wrong in holding that a person finding fish of the salmon kind upon his line and wilfully appropriating them, did not wilfully take them, and was not therefore guilty of an offence under the statute.

I cannot accept that answer as satisfactory. I cannot assent in the least degree to the view that an offence under the Act is committed by merely taking a fish of the salmon kind—say a sea-trout—which comes upon the taker's line, while he is lawfully and innocently fishing for other fish. By the statute founded on it is made an offence punishable by fine, &c., wilfully to "take, fish for, or attempt to take, or aid or assist in taking, fishing for, or attempting to take" fish of the salmon kind. Whether upon any occasion a person has wilfully taken or attempted to take such fish is prima facie at least a question of fact to be determined by the magistrate. It may be that in dealing with this question of fact the magistrate may fall into an error in point of law. But the error in point of law must be of a different complexion, in order to entitle the party to the remedy of appeal to this Court, from the error of coming merely to a wrong conclusion on the evidence submitted to him.

No. 11.

May 31, 1876.
Grant v. Wright.

On this evidence, of which the Sheriff has given a precis in the case, I think it is not improbable that any one of your Lordships would have arrived at a different result. I do not say that your Lordships would have done so, but only that it is not improbable. But that would be a totally different thing from holding that the Sheriff has proceeded on an error in point of law. For that would be to hold that the Sheriff had taken an erroneous view of the meaning of wilfully taking fish of the salmon kind.

Designedly, and with a certain intent, is, I conceive, the meaning of "wilful," as used in the statute. Whether the party so acted was a question of fact. It is not for the magistrate to give to the Court a general account of the evidence, as he might to a private friend, and ask, "in your view of the law should I have convicted." But even on this lengthy statement it does not appear to me that the Sheriff had an erroneous view on this point, that to constitute an offence under the Act the thing must have been wilfully done.

Mr Balfour stated to us that if the appellant, finding a salmon on his line, even in a dead or moribund condition, took it off and put it in his creel, that that amounted to wilful taking; but that if finding it there, he threw it into the water, or into a ditch, or sent it to the owner or lessee of the fishery, with a message expressive of regret that it had come in the way of his line, that that would not have amounted to wilful taking. But if he took it wilfully he is not relieved of the consequences by the manner in which he disposed of it.

On the whole matter, it is a question of fact on the evidence, whether, under any circumstances, a party is guilty of an offence under the Act. But this question of fact is for the magistrate and not for the Court, and it is not on such a narrative of evidence as we have here that we are to interfere.

I may add, with reference to one statement in the Sheriff's note, that taking fish contrary to an Act of Parliament does not hinder the fish becoming the property of the taker as feræ naturæ, and that this is the origin of the clause of forfeiture of the fish taken introduced into most of the statutes for the protection of salmon-fishings.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In order to prevent misapprehension, I am anxious to explain that I by no means say that the species or class of facts stated in this case may not justly lead to the conclusion, in point of fact, that the accused wilfully fished for salmon. It cannot be denied that the respondent was at one time in the possession of these fish, having taken them off the hook, or having them on the hook of the line which he had set. That is a fact which, coupled with other facts, may prove that the taking—the catching—was wilful. The Sheriff must decide first on the fact, which depends on the evidence, and if he had decided that the facts did prove the statutory offence, we could not have interfered. The only question of law really involved seems to be whether, if the capturing or attempt to capture be innocent, and the fish is brought to land innocently, the subsequent appropriation of the fish amounts necessarily, and by itself, to the offence provided for in the statute. I am of opinion that the statutory offence implies and requires wilful capturing, or wilful attempt to capture, and that if this was not proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff his judgment contains no error in law which we are called on to rectify. No. 11.

May 31, 1876.
Grant v. Wright.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"In respect the facts stated do not raise any question of law for the opinion of the Court, affirm the determination of the inferior Judge, dismiss the appeal: Find the appellant liable in expenses," &c.

HORNE, HORNE, & LYELL, W.S.—BOYD, MACDONALD, & LOWSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

HENRY NIXON, Inspector of Poor of Port-Glasgow, Pursuer and Respondent.—Brown.
DAVID CALDWELL, Inspector of Poor of Ayr, Defender and Appellant.—Rhind. No. 12.

June 1, 1876.
Nixon v. Caldwell.

Process—Jurisdiction—Small Debt Act (1 Vict. c. 41).—Held that it is competent for the Sheriff in the Small Debt Court to entertain an action by an inspector of poor for recovery of payments of aliment to a pauper not exceeding £12, notwithstanding that it may be necessary to determine incidentally the question of the pauper's settlement.

The inspector of poor of the parish of A raised an action in a Sheriff Small Debt Court against the inspector of poor of the parish of B for payment of £1, 15s. of aliment paid by the pursuer to a pauper alleged to have a settlement in the parish of B. The defender denied the alleged settlement, and pleaded that the action was incompetent in the Small Debt Court, as the decision required the determination of the question of the pauper's settlement, and involved the future liability for the pauper's aliment. Held that the action was competent.

THIS was a small debt appeal certified by Lord Mure from the Circuit Court at Ayr.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Ld. Craighill. Justiciary Clerk.

On 22d July 1875 the respondent, Henry Nixon, inspector of poor of the parish of Port-Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Small Debt Court at Ayr against the appellant, David Caldwell, inspector of poor of the parish of Ayr, concluding for the sum of £1, 15s., as per account. The account contained seven items of 5s. each, paid as stated therein, "as aliment (by the parochial board of Port-Glasgow, from date of statutory notice on 5th December 1874 to intimation of pauper being struck off, sent on 24th February 1875) to the pauper Jane M'Geary or Heaney, whose settlement is in the parish of Ayr."

The defender objected that the action was incompetent in the Small Debt Court, (1) in respect that whilst nominally the demand in the action was payment of a debt, the real question to be decided was the question of settlement, a matter which it was not competent to decide in that Court; and (2) in respect that the determination of the question of the pauper's settlement would involve the determination of continuing liability* of the parish of Ayr for future aliment to the pauper.

The Sheriff held the action competent, and, on a proof, determined that the pauper's settlement was in the parish of Ayr, and decerned in favour of the pursuer for the sum sued for.

The defender appealed to the next Circuit Court of Justiciary, and Lord Muir certified the case to the High Court, in respect of the judgment in the case of Caldwell v. Collins, September 1, 1875, 3 Poor-Law Mag. (new series), 530.[1]

* It was averred by the defender that the pauper had been struck off the roll with the object of creating jurisdiction in the Sheriff to try the case, and that on the expiration of the last fortnight, for which the aliment sued for in this action was given, she again became chargeable, and renewed notice of chargeability was at once sent by the pursuer to the defender. This notice, dated March 1875, was produced in process.

No. 12. June 1, 1876. Nixon v. Caldwell.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an important question, and is raised perhaps in a purer form than in any case to which we have been referred.

I put aside the averment, on the one side, that the pauper had been struck off the roll, and on the other side that the pauper, if struck off the roll at all, was so struck off with a view to the action, and was again placed on the roll at the termination of the last fortnight for which the aliment is sued for. Passing by that, the question is, whether an amount of aliment, which I must assume in this inquiry to be due, can be sued for in the Sheriff Small Debt Court. I am of opinion that if it can be sued for at all in an inferior Court it can be sued for in the Sheriff Small Debt Court. It is a debt or demand not exceeding the value of £12.

The first objection of the defender is, that though the amount sued for is less than £12, and nothing more than £12 can be demanded under the summons, and therefore the action is ex facie competent, yet the competency depends on what is stated in defence, namely, that the defender's parish is not the parish of the pauper's settlement. That, it is said, raises a question which cannot competently be determined in a Small Debt Court. Now, I cannot think that the competency of any action can depend on what the defender states in defence to that action, although, of course, the Judge, being competent to entertain the action, may yet give effect to the defence, and dismiss the action. If in this case the defender had admitted the pauper's settlement but disputed the amount due, or maintained that the relief ought not to have been given, there would have been little doubt as to the competency of the action. If the Sheriff has jurisdiction over the process, is not that conclusive, whatever may be stated in defence? Putting aside all question as to how far future liability is involved in the decision, I have arrived at the opinion that the action is competent. At the same time, if the defender is not satisfied with the decision of the Sheriff on the question of settlement which he has raised, and if he thinks the matter of sufficient importance to justify the course, this Court is always open to him, and he may come here with a declarator.

But it is said, in the second place, that the decision in this case virtually decides the question of continuing liability, and that therefore the summons involves a great deal more than is actually concluded for in it. Now, here I would draw attention to the distinction between the words used in the Small Debt Act,—"All civil causes . . . . . wherein the debt, demand, ... in question shall not exceed the value of . . . . . ," and those used in the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, limiting the reviewable causes to "causes not exceeding the value of ." Now, in the latter case the value of the cause may be a great deal more than the pecuniary amount actually concluded for, and therefore the amount of the debt or demand in question has not been held conclusive, in such cases, of the competency of review. But in the former case there is nothing to entitle us to go beyond the pecuniary conclusion in the summons in judging of the abstract competency of the action in the Sheriff Small Debt Court. It is [1] Authorities referred to.—Lindsay v. Barr, June 23, 1826, 4 S. 748; Drummond v. Hunter, Jan. 12, 1869, 7 Macph. 347, 41 Scot. Jur. 203; Macfarlane v. Friendly Society of Stornoway, Jan. 27, 1870, 8 Macph. 438, 42 Scot. Jur. 209; Robertson v. Melville, Feb. 24, 1860, 22 D. 893, 32 Scot. Jur. 375; Anderson v. Gill, Dec. 22, 1860, 23 D. 250, 33 Scot. Jur. 111.

No. 12.

June 1, 1876.
Nixon v. Caldwell.

another question whether the Sheriff, in the exercise of his discretion, will entertain the action, or will not rather say to the parties, I must sist this action until you determine this important question on which it turns in a more deliberate manner. But it is a matter for the Sheriff's discretion. If he chooses to entertain it, it cannot be said that the action is incompetent; and I should be sorry to come to any conclusion that would lead to this result, that the small debt jurisdiction could not be made available in the case of any payment falling due periodically where one of the termly payments has fallen into arrear. Generally speaking, there is no question as to liability raised in such cases, but only as to amount. But even where there is a question of liability raised, it would be a most unfortunate thing if the matter could not be summarily disposed of, leaving the settlement of the ultimate right to be decided, if the parties wish it, in a competent Court.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I must, however, confess that there are some features in the case which at one time occasioned a measure of doubt in my mind.

I would first call attention to what appears to me to be the leading point in the appeal, namely, that we are tied down to a hard and dry question of jurisdiction. The case comes before us under the Sheriff Small Debt Act, and in cases brought under that Act appeal is only competent (setting aside corruption, malice, and oppression, as having no place here) "on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done, or on incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the Sheriff." It is only under the ground of defect of jurisdiction that the appellant's case can possibly be brought. It is only if there is want of jurisdiction in the Sheriff over this process, or the parties to it, that the appellant can prevail.

Now, on the face of the summons, the Sheriff has jurisdiction. The cause is a civil cause. The debt sued for does not exceed £12. The ground on which the debt is demanded may apply to other demands which are future or contingent, and may be conclusive of them so far as the Sheriff Small Debt Court is concerned, but nevertheless the debt sued for is under £12, and the Sheriff, prima facie at least, has jurisdiction.

The question is, whether, when it appears from the nature of the defence that the Sheriff is asked to determine a question which might involve continuing liability, and might go a certain length to establish it, his jurisdiction ceases.

One can conceive many cases in which it would be very proper for the Sheriff to supersede consideration of a small debt case, and refuse to apply himself to the consideration of an important question incidentally raised, and having a wide application, but necessary to be determined for the decision of the case before him. For instance, were it answered to a summons against a man for necessary furnishings made to his wife, that the woman in question was not his wife, I can conceive that the Sheriff, if he believed the defence to be seriously stated and insisted upon, might very properly sist procedure until the question was determined in an appropriate action.

But all that does not touch the question of jurisdiction, but only the propriety and expediency of its exercise in a particular case before something else is done; and even so the Sheriff must always be on his guard against such defence being stated for the mere purpose of temporarily avoiding his jurisdiction.

No. 12.

June 1, 1876.
Nixon v. Caldwell.

But though the Sheriff has this power in his discretion to supersede consideration of a cause, it does not follow that he is not at liberty to proceed in a cause within his jurisdiction if he considers that he can do complete justice in it without waiting for the determination of any point raised in a more deliberate manner. Of that matter he is the sole judge, and with his discretion we cannot interfere. If he has competent jurisdiction our review is excluded.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Dismiss the appeal: Find no expenses due therein, and decern."

W. K. THWAITES, S.S.C.—ADAM SHIELL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 13.

June 30, 1876.
Nicol v. M'Callum.

DUNCAN NICOL, Appellant.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
ARCHIBALD M'CALLUM, Respondent.—D.-F. Watson—Asher.

The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), secs. 81 and 82.—In virtue of their powers under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which is incorporated in the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, the Greenock Harbour Trustees appointed and licensed a sufficient number of persons as weighers within the limits of the port and harbour of Greenock. By the 82d section of the first-mentioned Act it is provided that where a sufficient number of meters and weighers have been appointed by the trustees, masters of vessels and owners of goods discharged at the port shall not employ any person other than a weigher or meter licensed by "the trustees, or appointed by the Commissioners of Customs, to weigh or measure the same;" and if in such case any person other than a meter or weigher, licensed by the trustees, or appointed by the Commissioners of Customs, shall weigh or measure any such goods as aforesaid, such person, as well as the person by whom he shall be employed, shall incur a penalty.

Held that the object of the provision was to exclude the employment for hire of unlicensed weighers, but not to prevent merchants and others weighing their own cargoes by the hands of their own clerks.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Ld. Craighill. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was an appeal on a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, by one of the magistrates of the burgh of Greenock.

The object of the proceedings raised in the Burgh Court was to determine whether or not shipowners and merchants were bound in weighing their cargoes at the port of Greenock to employ the licensed weighers appointed by the harbour trustees.

The Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, which incorporated generally the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, appointed the Magistrates and Town Council of Greenock, along with nine trustees elected by the shipowners and ratepayers, trustees of the harbour of Greenock.

The Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, sec. 38, empowered the harbour trustees to appoint "meters and weighers, and all other officers authorised by the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, herewith incorporated."

The Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27) enacted, sec. 81,—"Where, under the special Act, the undertakers (i.e. the harbour trustees) shall have the appointment of meters and weighers, the undertakers may appoint and license a sufficient number of persons to be meters and weighers within the limits of the harbour, dock, and pier, and remove any such persons at their pleasure, and may make regulations for their government, and fix reasonable rates to be paid or other remuneration to be made to them for weighing and measuring goods." No. 13.

June 30, 1876. Nicol v. M'Callum.

Sec. 82.—"When a sufficient number of meters and weighers have been appointed by the undertakers, under the powers of this and the special Act, the master of any vessel, or the owner of any goods shipped, unshipped, or delivered within or upon the harbour, or dock, or pier, shall not employ any person other than a weigher or meter licensed by the undertakers, or appointed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, to weigh or measure the same; and if in such case any person other than a meter or weigher licensed by the undertakers, or a meter or weigher appointed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, shall weigh or measure any such goods as aforesaid, such person, as well as the person by whom he shall be employed, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and the weighing or measurement of any such goods by any such person shall be deemed illegal."

The facts set forth in the case were—The Greenock Harbour Trustees had in March 1876, in virtue of the statutory powers conferred on them, duly appointed and licensed a sufficient number of persons to be weighers within the limits of the port and harbours of Greenock, and these appointments were thereafter duly notified to the public by advertisements.

The harbour trustees had made and published bye-laws for the government of the licensed weighers so appointed, and had fixed rates for the remuneration, and had prescribed the duties to be performed by them.

Though cargoes of timber, grain, oil, and other articles, the contents of which are ascertained by measurement, were unshipped within the limits of the port and harbour of Greenock, the harbour trustees had not appointed meters as well as weighers under their statutory powers.

In the case selected to try the question in dispute between the harbour trustees and the shipowners and merchants of Greenock a vessel had arrived at the port of Greenock with a cargo of sugar, of which 1940 bags were consigned to Messrs Robert Fraser and Company. The whole of the cargo was to be ascertained by the process of weighing. The rest of the cargo was duly weighed by a licensed weigher upon beams and scales belonging to the harbour trust. Robert Fraser and Company, however, refused to employ a licensed weigher to weigh the portion of the cargo consigned to them. Instead thereof the appellant, Duncan Nicol, a clerk in the employment of Robert Fraser and Company, attended at the discharge of the portion of the cargo belonging to them, and performed the functions of weigher, seeing to the adjustment of the beams and scales, which belonged to Robert Fraser and Company, his masters, and not to the harbour trustees, superintending the porters employed to assist in the manual operations of weighing and recording the weight.

The harbour trustees, through the respondent, Archibald M'Callum, procurator-fiscal of Court, prosecuted Duncan Nicol before the magistrates of the burgh of Greenock (who had police jurisdiction over the limits of the port and harbour under the Greenock Police and Improvement Act, 1865, and the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, sec. 85) for an offence under the 82d section of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847.

The magistrate "found on the evidence adduced that the appellant had weighed the said goods, and contravened the clause in the Act founded on, and ordained him to pay a modified penalty of 63s., and failing payment to be imprisoned for the period of five days."

An appeal was taken, and the following questions of law were stated

No. 13. June 30, 1876. Nicol v. M'Callum.

for the opinion of the Court of Justiciary:—"(1) Whether the inferior Judge, as one of the magistrates of Greenock, had jurisdiction, and could competently try and decide upon the foresaid complaint, in respect that he is one of the trustees of the port and harbours of Greenock? (2) Whether, the said trustees not having appointed or licensed meters in virtue of the powers conferred on them by the 81st clause of the said Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866, the appellant was guilty of an offence within the meaning of the first-mentioned Act? (3) Whether, under the circumstances stated, the inferior Judge was justified in finding that the appellant was the weigher of the said sugar within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866."

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think it necessary to call for a reply on the part of the appellant in this case. On the first question submitted to us we intimated that we did not require argument from the respondent, as we were satisfied that there was no valid objection to the jurisdiction.

On the second question I have no difficulty either. I am very clearly of opinion that if there was a sufficient number of weighers appointed and licensed by the harbour trustees under their statutory powers it forms no ground of defence to a complaint for not employing one of these licensed weighers that licensed meters have not also been appointed by the trustees for measuring a totally different class of cargoes.

The real question is the third, "Whether, under the circumstances stated, the inferior Judge was justified in finding that the appellant was the weigher of the said sugar within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866?" Now, the facts of the case seem to be as follows:—A portion of a cargo of sugar was consigned to Robert Fraser and Company, and when it was being discharged from the ship they sent one of their clerks to superintend the weighing of the sugar on beams and scales which belonged to them, but were within the precincts of the Greenock port and harbours. For so acting the clerk was prosecuted at the instance of the harbour commissioners for an offence within the meaning of the 82d clause of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which is incorporated in the Greenock Port and Harbours Act, 1866. He was convicted, and has taken an appeal to this Court under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

The question is, whether the appellant, in so obeying his employers' orders, was guilty of the statutory offence. I am of opinion that there is no good ground for holding that he was. If it could be held that Robert Fraser and Company, by sending their clerk to superintend the weighing of their sugar, were acting illegally, the proper course for the harbour commissioners to take would be to prosecute them and not their clerk—to prosecute the persons employing the unlicensed weigher, and not their clerk acting under their orders. But I cannot hold that a merchant sending down one of his own clerks to weigh his own sugar is guilty of a contravention of the statute.

The meaning of the statutory provisions are undoubtedly, as contended for by the counsel for the respondent, to provide a trustworthy staff of weighers and meters at the ports to which those provisions apply. But to effect this end, all that it is thought necessary to do is to prevent interlopers, in whom the harbour commissioners have no confidence, and in whom they cannnot invite the public to place confidence, from putting themselves forward and engaging in the work. The commissioners are therefore empowered to appoint and license a sufficient number of weighers and meters, and the public are prohibited from employing any other than the licensed weighers and meters so appointed, and any would-be interlopers are excluded, firstly, by subjecting themselves in a penalty if they accept employment as meters or weighers within the limits of the port and harbours, and, secondly, by subjecting any person who employs them in a like penalty.

No. 13.

June 30, 1876.
Nicol v. M'Callum.

But a merchant who sends his own clerk to weigh his own cargo for his own satisfaction is not within these statutory provisions at all, and they were not intended to prohibit his doing so. The provisions of this statute may be instructively compared with the provisions of the Hackney Carriage Acts, or the regulations regarding street porters. None but licensed hackney carriages or licensed porters are allowed to ply for hire in any street, railway station, &c., but that does not prevent a person using his own carriage or carrying his own luggage, or instructing his servant or clerk to meet him and carry it for him.

These are the views which I take of these statutory provisions anent licensed weighers. As the respondent's counsel very properly said, it is for the public convenience that a staff of thoroughly trustworthy weighers should be kept up. But that is done by preventing unlicensed persons hiring themselves out in the capacity of weighers, not by preventing the owner of goods from weighing them himself, or by the hands of his clerk, which is just the same thing. If he employs any one for the purpose, it must be a licensed weigher. It is not incumbent on him to have his goods weighed at all, neither is there anything to prevent him weighing them himself.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. The facts set forth in the case do not appear to me to involve a contravention of the statute. All that the appellant did was to employ his clerk to weigh his goods upon his own scales after they were landed from the ship. This was a thing done for his own satisfaction; and by the result, others, unless of consent, could not be affected. When weighing or measuring is necessary, that freight or shore dues, or other charges on the cargo, may be ascertained, the provisions of the statute presumably will be followed. The merchant cannot elude, and much less can he prevent resort to their operation, when this is desired by others concerned. And all that the 82d section prohibits is, as I think, the employment in such a case of unlicensed meters or weighers when a sufficient number of licensed meters or weighers have been appointed.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Answer the first question in the case in the affirmative; with reference to the second question, find that if the trustees had appointed a sufficient number of weighers it would not be a defence against a charge of weighing in contravention of the Act that the trustees had not also appointed meters; and answer the third question in the negative: Reverse the determination of the magistrate: Find the appellant entitled to expenses," &c.

MASON & SMITH, S.S.C.—WILLIAM ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 14.

June 30, 1876.

Arthur v. Peebles.

THOMAS ARTHUR, Suspender.—M'Kechnie.
JOHN KIDD PEEBLES, Respondent.—Balfour.

Indictment—Relevancy—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1.—The Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1, makes it an offence to "commit any trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land, without leave of the proprietor, in search or pursuit of game," &c.

Held that a general conviction proceeding upon a complaint which charged the panel with having in the daytime committed a trespass, "by entering or being without leave of the proprietor in and near to a field on the farm of K" in pursuit of game could not be sustained.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Young. Ld. Craighill. Justiciary Clerk.

THIS was a suspension of a sentence pronounced in the Justice of Peace Court of Lanarkshire at Airdrie against the suspender, Thomas Arthur, on a complaint at the instance of the respondent, John Kidd Peebles, procurator-fiscal, charging him, and also another panel, Abraham Burton, with having been guilty of an offence, under the 1st section of the Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68), "in so far as, upon Monday, the 15th day of May 1876 years, the said Thomas Arthur and Abraham Burton, defenders, did both and each or one or other of them, in the daytime, within the meaning of the foresaid statute, section 1st, commit a trespass by entering or being without leave of the proprietor in and near to a field on the farm of Kirkstyle, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark, the property of the Rev. Sholto Douglas Campbell Douglas of Rosehall, in the said parish and county, and occupied by James Buchanan, a farmer, residing at said farm of Kirkstyle, in search or pursuit of game, or of deer, roe, woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, or conies, and did kill a hare on said field."

The suspender was tried on the complaint, and in respect of the evidence adduced was convicted "of the offence charged," and was adjudged to forfeit a sum of penalty and expenses, and in default of payment to be imprisoned for a period of six weeks.

The main ground of suspension relied on was that while the complaint in part was not relevant, in respect that it libelled as an offence under the statute the commission of a trespass by entering or being without leave of the proprietor "near to" as well as "in" a field on the farm of Kirkstyle, &c.,—the former of which did not amount to an offence under the statute, while the latter did,—yet the conviction was general.*

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The conviction complained of was obtained under the 1st section of the 2d and 3d Will. IV., c. 68, which enacts that "if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land without leave of the proprietor in search or pursuit of game," &c., he shall incur a penalty not exceeding two pounds. Plain it is that to render a complaint relevant what is set forth as having been done must be a thing prohibited. The more closely the words of the statute are followed the safer will be the libelling; but assuming that the ipsissima verba are not indispensable the substituted words must be full and no more than full equivalents. If these

* In explanation of the form of the complaint it was stated that the facts of the case, as disclosed on the evidence, were that the suspender and the other panel, Abraham Burton, had been found in pursuit of game, by sending in a lurcher into the field libelled to kill hares, and a retriever to fetch them out when killed, while they themselves did not enter the field but remained on the road which skirted it.

No. 14.

June 30, 1876.
Arthur v. Peebles.

either understate or overstate the elements of the offence there is the danger, if not the certainty, of miscarriage.

The question which on this occasion has to be decided is, whether what is alleged in the complaint is the thing contravention of which constitutes the statutory offence. The allegation is that the suspender did, on the date specified, "in the daytime, within the meaning of the foresaid statute, section 1st, commit a trespass, by entering or being without leave of the proprietor in and near to a field on the farm of Kirkstyle" in search or pursuit of game. This libelling appears to me to be unwarranted by the words of the statute, and consequently is, in my opinion, erroneous and irrelevant. In the first place, it is ambiguous. What is the meaning of "in and near to a field"? The suspender could not be in two places at one and the same time, and therefore we are forced to inquire whether the meaning of the charge against him is that without leave of the proprietor he was in the field, which is the thing prohibited, or that he was only "near to" the field, which is the thing not prohibited. The complaint does not furnish an answer; and upon this ground alone it must, as I think, be held irrelevant. But that is not all; for, in the second place, the allegation is misleading. To say the least, it suggests that being near to a field without leave of the proprietor is a contravention of the statute; and upon this view proof may have been adduced, and the conviction complained of may have been pronounced. The error committed in framing the charge is without excuse, for there is nothing in the words of the statute by which its commission can be explained. But this consideration is comparatively immaterial. It is enough for our judgment that error there has been, and that by this error the suspender may have been prejudiced, or more plainly, improperly convicted. For these reasons the conviction complained of must, as I think, be quashed.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I may say that it is not without reluctance that I concur in your Lordships' judgment. My inclination, certainly, was to hold the words "and near to" as superfluous, and to read the words "in and near to" as really meaning simply "in," for I do not think that it was intended to libel two separate offences.

My mind is, however, reconciled to your Lordships' view by the consideration that the being near to any land without leave of the proprietor in pursuit of game is certainly not an offence under the statute, and that the mind of the Court may possibly have been misled by the form in which the complaint is stated, and have been satisfied with evidence that the panel was merely "near to" without being "in" the field in question, without leave of the proprietor, in pursuit of game.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Pass the bill; suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter; ordain the complainer to be instantly set at liberty; and decern: Find the respondent liable in expenses," &c.

R. A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—C. S. TAYLOR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 15.

June 30, 1876.
Kay v. Kelso Local Authority.

JOHN KAY Junior, Suspender.—Balfour—Moncreiff.
THE KELSO LOCAL AUTHORITY, Respondents.—Strachan.

Process—Suspension—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 62, secs. 3 and 9.—A having been convicted in the Sheriff Court on a summary complaint, applied to the Sheriff, under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, sec. 3, to state and sign a case for appeal. After the case was prepared by the Sheriff-clerk in terms of the statute, but before it was adjusted and signed by the Sheriff, A lodged a minute withdrawing his application for a case. He afterwards brought a suspension of the Sheriff's judgment.

Held that he had not appealed in the sense of that and the 9th section of the Act, and that the suspension was not excluded.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary Clerk.

A COMPLAINT was laid before the Sheriff of Roxburgh, at the instance of the Local Authority of Kelso, against Mr George Home Munro Binning Home, proprietor of Softlaw, and his tenant, John Kay junior, for a contravention of the 16th section (sub-section F) of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867.

The Sheriff convicted Mr Home and his tenant, the present suspender, inflicted a modified penalty, and pronounced an order upon them ad factum præstandum.

The date of the Sheriff's final interlocutor in the case was 26th February 1876. On 29th February both Mr Home, and the suspender John Kay junior, applied to the Sheriff, under the 3d section of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act,* to state and sign a case for appeal.

On the same day a case was prepared by the Sheriff-clerk and handed to the parties; but before it was adjusted and laid before the Sheriff for signature the suspender, John Kay junior, on 4th March, lodged a minute

---

* The statute, 38 and 39 Vict., c. 62, sec. 3, enacts—"On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination in point of law, appeal thereagainst, notwithstanding any provision contained in the Act under which such cause shall have been brought excluding appeals against or review in any manner of way of any determination, judgment, or conviction, or complaint under such Act, by himself or his agent applying in writing within three days after such determination to the inferior Judge to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of a superior Court as hereinafter provided; and on any such application being made the following provisions shall have effect:—

"1. The appellant shall not be entitled to have a case stated and delivered to him, unless within the said three days he shall

"(1) Lodge in the hands of the clerk of Court a bond with sufficient cautioner for answering and abiding by the judgment of the superior Court in the appeal, &c.;

"(2) Pay the clerk of Court his fees for preparing the case, &c.

"2. The clerk of Court shall, within four days after caution or consignation and payment being found or made as aforesaid, prepare the case, and submit the same in draft to the parties or their agents.

"3. Should the parties or their agents fail to agree as to the terms of the case, the inferior Judge shall settle the same.

. . . . . .

"5. The appellant shall, within three days after receiving the case, give notice of appeal in writing, together with a copy of the case, to the respondent, and shall, within the same time, transmit the case by post to, or cause it to be lodged with, one of the clerks of the superior Court, together with a certificate under the hand of himself or of his law-agent of intimation as herein required having been made to the respondent."

withdrawing his application for a case for appeal. His name was accordingly struck out of the draft case which had been prepared. Mr Home prosecuted the appeal in his own name, and on 17th March 1876 succeeded in getting the Sheriff's determination reversed, so far as he was concerned, by the High Court of Justiciary. No. 15. June 30, 1876. Kay v. Kelso Local Authority.

John Kay junior afterwards brought this suspension of the Sheriff's judgment.

It was objected by the respondents that the suspension was incompetent, inter alia, on the ground that the suspender having taken an appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, sec. 3, was barred by sec. 9 of that Act from afterwards bringing a suspension.*

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—A strict interpretation must always be given to a provision which like this cuts off a common law remedy. There was here certainly an attempt at appeal, but it never came to maturity. Before the appeal can be said to have been taken it fell by the withdrawal of the application to the inferior Judge to state a case.

It was pleaded that, on a party's applying to the inferior Judge to state and sign a case under section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, the party has appealed in the sense of the 9th section of that Act, and must be taken to have abandoned all other method of review. I am not, however, prepared to give such a strict interpretation to the statute. My impression is that, unless the procedure provided in the statute for an appeal on a case stated is followed forth to a point which places the case in the hands of a competent Court of review, the common law remedy is not cut off.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT accordingly repelled the objection.

DAVID HUNTER, S.S.C.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

PETER M'INTYRE, Appellant.—Mair—Campbell Smith.
THOMAS LINTON, Respondent.—M'Laren—W. A. Brown.

No. 16. July 21, 1876. M'Intyre v. Linton.

Public-house—Certificate—9 Geo. IV. c. 58, secs. 19 and 21.—A tenant of a hotel obtained in February 1876 a transfer of the certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors granted to his predecessor for the year from 15th May 1875 to 15th May 1876, and at a licensing Court held on 11th April 1876 the magistrates granted him a new certificate from 15th May 1876 to 15th May 1877. Upon 4th May 1876 he was convicted of having on Sunday, 23d April, sold exciseable liquors to persons not being lodgers or travellers, and his certificate was adjudged to be void and null from the date of the conviction. Held that the forfeiture was only applicable to the transferred certificate under which the hotel-keeper was then trading, and did not affect the new certificate which was only to come into force upon 15th May 1876, and that therefore a conviction against him for selling exciseable liquor in July 1876 without a certificate was bad.

Expenses.—Observations (per Lord Deas) on awarding and modifying expenses in appeals to the Court of Justiciary.

* Section 9 provides that "any person who shall appeal under the provisions of this Act from any determination of an inferior Judge, from which he is by law entitled to appeal, in any other manner of way, to any superior or other Court, shall be taken to have abandoned such title to appeal in any such other manner of way as aforesaid."

No. 16.

July 21, 1876. M'Intyre v. Linton.

HIGH COURT. Lord Deas. Lord Young. Lord Mure. Justiciary Clerk.

PETER M'INTYRE, tenant of the Queen's Hotel, Greenside Street, Edinburgh, was charged before the Police Court of Edinburgh, at the instance of Thomas Linton, superintendent of police and procurator-fiscal of Court, with having on 1st July 1876 sold exciseable liquor within the said hotel without having first obtained a certificate in terms of the Public Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862.

The defence was that the accused had a subsisting certificate at the date of the sale complained of.

The facts were as follows:—In February 1876 a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors in the Queen's Hotel, granted in favour of the former tenant for the year from 15th May 1875 to 15th May 1876, was transferred by the magistrates to M'Intyre. At the Licensing Court held at Edinburgh on 11th April 1876, upon an application by M'Intyre for a renewal of the certificate transferred to him as above mentioned, he obtained a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors in the said hotel in Greenside Street, Edinburgh, for the year from 15th May 1876 to 15th May 1877. On 24th April 1876 a complaint was presented by the procurator-fiscal to the Police Court, Edinburgh, charging M'Intyre with a breach of his certificate by keeping open his hotel at Greenside Street on Sunday, 23d April 1876, and selling exciseable liquors to several persons, not being lodgers or travellers;* and on 4th May 1876 the Judge officiating in the Police Court convicted him of the offence charged, being a first offence, and besides imposing a fine adjudged his certificate to be void and null from the date of the judgment.†

In virtue of his renewed certificate granted on 11th April 1876, M'Intyre obtained on 16th May an Inland Revenue license, and thereafter recommenced to sell exciseable liquors.

The officiating Judge (Sheriff-substitute Hamilton), on 6th July, found the accused guilty of the offence charged, and ordained him to pay a penalty of £7, and, failing payment, to be imprisoned for six weeks.

M'Intyre appealed to the Court of Justiciary under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, and a case was stated by the officiating Judge, the question of law being—"Whether, in the circumstances set forth, the Judge officiating in the Police Court of Edinburgh, on the 6th day of July 1876, was in error in holding that the appellant had not a subsisting certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors?"

Argued for the appellant;—The forfeiture of the appellant's certificate contained in the judgment of 4th May could only refer to the certificate then in force, and which had been contravened, i.e., the certificate which expired on 15th May 1876, and could not apply to the certificate for the year beginning with 15th May 1876, which the appellant had obtained the right to receive, but which, on 4th May 1876, was not in existence, and did not come into existence till the 15th of that month. The appellant therefore had a valid certificate in force on 1st July 1876, and the police Judge was in error in holding the contrary.

Argued for the respondent;—What was forfeited by the judgment of 4th May was the whole right of the appellant under the licensing statutes to sell exciseable liquors, at least within his Greenside premises. The appellant's argument involved the assumption that on 4th May he had two such rights, whereas the right which he possessed was one

* The words of the complaint were:—"That Peter M'Intyre . . who holds a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors at No. 3 Greenside Street, Edinburgh, has been guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, in so far as," &c.

† The words of the judgment were:—"And further adjudges his certificate to be void and null from this date."

No. 16.

July 21, 1876.
M'Intyre v. Linton.

and indivisible, viz., a right to sell exciseable liquors within his premises at Greenside until Whitsunday 1877. 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, sec. 19, declared that a transferred certificate should only be in force until the date of the next annual Licensing Court. The words of the forfeiture could not therefore be satisfied by applying them exclusively to a certificate which had expired before the date either of the contravention or of the conviction.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an appeal against a conviction in the Police Court of Edinburgh on the 6th July, and we have to consider the appeal upon a case stated by the police Judge under the recent statute.

The validity of the conviction depends on whether on 1st July last, the date of the alleged offence, the appellant had a subsisting certificate to sell spirits within the hotel occupied by him in Greenside Street. If he had, the conviction, which proceeded on the footing that he had not, is of course bad. The question whether he had a certificate in force on 1st July depends on the effect of a conviction and sentence against him on 4th May preceding. That conviction appears to have been for selling exciseable liquor on a Sunday to persons not bona fide travellers. Part of the sentence was forfeiture of the appellant's certificate under sec. 21 of the Act of 1828. He had then a certificate current until 15th May following, i.e., for eleven days, for although the cerificate he had was a transferred certificate, notwithstanding the language of sec. 19 of the Act of 1828, I am of opinion that the transferred certificate subsisted in force until 15th May. It might be forfeited; but if nothing came in the way it remained in force until 15th May, at which date for the first time a renewed certificate could come into operation. The statute contains a provision by which, in addition to any other penalty, the certificate granted to the offender may be forfeited. The convicting magistrate saw fit to forfeit the certificate the conditions of which had been offended against. The question is, whether the judgment of forfeiture is satisfied by applying it only to the certificate then in force and the conditions of which had been offended against. That is important, for on 11th April the magistrates had granted a certificate to the appellant to come into force on 15th May. The appellant was not in possession of the corpus of the certificate, because it was only to come into existence on 15th May, but of the right to get such a certificate. It is contended by the respondent that the forfeiture affected this right which the appellant obtained on 11th April to obtain a certificate to come into force on 15th May. Unless this view is sound, the conviction of 6th July cannot be supported. I am of opinion that the judgment of forfeiture applied solely to the certificate in operation at its date. Every such judgment must be construed with some limitation in regard to place. It is applicable only to the place in which the offence was committed. If the party had another certificate in respect of other premises, situated in another part of the town, the forfeiture for an offence committed in Greenside would have no application to that other certificate. But I am of opinion that there is a limitation of the effect of forfeiture, not only in place but in time. In the course of the argument for the respondent the analogy of a lease was suggested. I think the analogy a dangerous one. It might very well be urged that if a lease contained a clause of forfeiture in the event of certain specified violations of the lease, the forfeiture could only be of the existing lease, and would not extend to a new lease to come into operation upon the termination of the existing lease, although it contained similar provisions.

The case is really very simple. The appellant had a certificate in July last.

No. 16. July 21, 1876. M'Intyre v. Linton.

He is convicted of selling exciseable liquor without a certificate. He asks why? and is told that his certificate was forfeited by the conviction of 4th May. Now, upon 4th May, he could do nothing under or against that certificate, because it only came into force on 15th May. I am of opinion, therefore, that upon law and plain sense that certificate was not forfeited, and ought to have been received as an answer to the charge.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD DEAS.—As your Lordships are of one opinion, the presiding Judge has no vote, but I shall express in a few words the grounds on which I have arrived at the same result.

Upon 6th July the Sheriff-substitute convicted the appellant of having, on the 1st of that month, trafficked in exciseable liquors without a certificate. That conviction is not a conviction of breach of certificate, but for trafficking in exciseable liquors without having a certificate at all. The question whether the appellant had a certificate applicable to that period depends on whether a previous conviction and sentence by the police Judge upon 4th May forfeited not only the certificate then in force but also the certificate applicable to the period from 15th May 1876 to 15th May 1877. The Sheriff-substitute held that the right of the appellant to sell exciseable liquors was forfeited not merely with reference to the period up to 15th May 1876, but with reference to the new period up to 15th May 1877. A good deal might be said upon the policy of these statutes in favour of the view that it was the right to sell exciseable liquor which was forfeited, and not merely the current certificate. But I am of opinion that this is too severe a view of the effect of the statutes in what is really a criminal prosecution, and that the words of the sentence of 4th May apply only to the certificate then in operation, and not to the certificate which the appellant had been found entitled to get, but had not yet got. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute was in error in pronouncing the judgment under appeal.

Upon the question of expenses,—

LORD DEAS.—There is no absolute rule about awarding expenses in this Court, or as to modifying them when they are awarded. It is, however, usual to modify the expenses and save the expense of taxation. The amount of expenses does not depend on the nature of the error into which we may think the inferior Judge has fallen, and it must not be supposed that we go on the footing that there is anything palpably wrong in the Sheriff-substitute's judgment. It was a view which might reasonably be taken, although we differ from it. But in some cases it may be right to have two counsel, while in others one is sufficient. This is a case which it was right to have carefully argued on both sides, and it has been so. We shall, in the circumstances, allow ten guineas of expenses.

THIS judgment was pronounced:—"Answer the question in this case in the affirmative: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge: Find the appellant entitled to expenses, which modify to ten guineas."

M'CASKIE & BROWN, S.S.C.—RICHARDSON & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

1875–76.

WINTER SESSION.

ANDREW GIRVAN, Appellant.—Macdonald.
JOHN CAMPBELL, Objector and Respondent.—M'Laren.

No. 1.

Nov. 1, 1875.
Girvan v. Campbell.

County Franchise—Valuation-Roll—17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, sec. 34.—Ailsa Craig was let for £30 a-year to two joint tenants, with a cottage thereon which was worth £7, 10s. a-year, together with the right to kill wild fowls, wild goats, and rabbits, under certain restrictions as to quantity and seasons. There was reserved to the landlord full right, without any qualification and without compensation, "to shoot, kill, and carry away fowls, goats, and rabbits" from the Craig. Ailsa Craig was totally incapable of agricultural occupation. It was entered in the valuation-roll as land, value £30 a-year, and the tenants were each entered as voters on the assessor's list as "joint tenant, land, Ailsa Rock." Held (diss. Lord Ardmillan) that the valuation-roll was conclusive; and objections,—that the accessory right not being heritable, its value must be deducted; and that the landlord's reserved right was such as to give him control over the value, and therefore over the qualification to vote, repelled.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

ANDREW GIRVAN was entered in the assessor's roll for South Ayrshire as Andrew Girvan, fisherman, Maidens, joint tenant, land, Ailsa Rock.

It was objected by John Campbell, Maybole, a voter for South Ayrshire, that Andrew Girvan was not entitled to be entered as a voter on the roll, in respect that the right or rights held or possessed by him were not "land," nor in the nature of heritable right, at least not to such an extent as to confer upon him, as joint tenant, a sufficient qualification.

Andrew Girvan produced in support of his right to be a voter on the roll the missives of set of Ailsa Craig for a term of years between the Marquis of Ailsa as proprietor, and himself and his brother William Girvan as joint tenants, dated 20th and 23d October 1873.

There was a cottage on Ailsa Craig of the value of £7, 10s. a-year formerly used for sea-bathing quarters, but which was to be possessed by the lessees exclusively as tenants; and the tenants accepted of this cottage as in a state of complete repair, and bound themselves to keep it and leave it in a like state. When the missives were entered into Ailsa Craig was stocked with goats, rabbits, and wild fowl. It was not adapted for the grazing of sheep and cattle. Andrew and William Girvan never had stock of any kind of their own on Ailsa Craig. The goats upon it were the property of the Marquis of Ailsa. By the terms of the missives "the tenants are to have power to kill fowls, goats, and rabbits on the Craig, but so as not to reduce the existing stocks thereof, and no fowls, goats, or rabbits are to be killed excepting during the proper seasons for doing so, and they are not to allow other parties to do so. They are also to have the privilege of fishing in the sea around the Craig. They may also prepare and sell blocks for curling stones, but in doing so they are never to employ more than one man in addition to themselves."

No. 1.

Nov. 1, 1875. Girvan v. Campbell.

It was for the exercise of these rights, along with the possession of the cottage, that the rent stipulated in the lease, viz., £30, was payable. This sum of £30 was entered in the valuation-roll as the annual value of Ailsa Craig. The rights of the said tenants were burdened in the missives with the following reservation, viz., full power to Lord Ailsa "and his friends to land upon the Craig, and to shoot, kill, and carry away fowls, goats, and rabbits thereon; and the tenants are to have no claim for compensation, on any ground whatever, for the animals so killed and carried away."

There was no evidence adduced of the separate values of the rights to kill fowls, goats, or rabbits, or of the privilege of fishing, or taking blocks of stone for making curling stones.

The Sheriff (N. C. Campbell) sustained the objection.

Andrew Girvan appealed, and argued;—The valuation-roll was conclusive on the question of value.* It was not competent to lead evidence to controvert it. Even if it was competent it was for the objector to lead such evidence. And as it was not alleged that this lease was not bona fide, all that he could possibly succeed in proving was that these tenants had agreed to give a higher rent than the subject was worth. That was not a ground upon which the claim could be rejected.

Argued for the respondent;—The question here was how far the rent of £30 was paid as the value or for the possession of the heritable subject, and how far as the value of the moveable rights and privileges that went along with it. It was true that the valuation-roll was conclusive of the value of "lands and heritages," but if it could be shewn that the subject of the lease was not all heritable, it was competent to separate it into its component parts, and if it was shewn that a substantial part was not heritable then it fell on the tenant to prove that there remained enough to confer the franchise. Here the Sheriff had rightly held that the accessory right of shooting wild fowls, goats, &c., was not heritable, though of substantial value, and that there was sufficient before him to shew that what remained was not of value to confer the franchise upon two joint tenants.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I never saw a case like this before. The objector may perhaps have so stated his case as to put himself out of Court. But that this is a claim to the franchise of the most extraordinary character ever heard of I cannot doubt.

---

* 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 34.—"In all questions and proceedings under any Act of Parliament relating to the franchise, or to the representation of the people in Parliament, it shall be sufficient to refer to an entry in the valuation-roll in force for the time, or last in force under this Act in any county or burgh, and such entry shall be received and taken in all such questions and proceedings as conclusive proof that the gross yearly rent or value of the lands or heritages specified therein is at the date of such reference, and has been from the commencement of the year to which such valuation-roll applies, of the amount therein set forth."

No. 1.

Nov. 1, 1875.
Girvan v. Campbell.

The subject in respect of which the claim is made is a wild and rugged rock in the open sea. There can be no cultivation and no grazing; and of course the so called tenants have and can have no stock, the rock supporting no living creature except a few wild goats, a few rabbits, and a multitude of wild sea-fowl. There is a small house of the value of £7, 10s. a-year upon the rock, but no other dwelling. This subject was in the autumn of 1873, for the first time, let at this rent of £30 a-year, and the two joint tenants now come forward and claim to be placed on the roll of voters as tenants and occupants.

The question is, do these men occupy as tenants in the sense of the Act? It is not enough that they pay rent. That may be easily arranged. Nor is it enough that the subject let to them is in a certain sense heritable. The subject must be one capable of tenancy, susceptible of occupancy by tenants. Here it is incapable of being cultivated, incapable of being grazed, incapable of being possessed in any of the ordinary modes of possession. This rock is nominally let, but really, except the house, which alone cannot sustain the two claims, the thing let in lease is really the privilege of killing some goats and the wild sea-fowl and wild rabbits, admittedly ferœ naturæ, that are found upon the rock. The privilege of killing game does not sustain the franchise, though in certain circumstances it may enhance the value of another substantial subject of lease. But these wild sea-fowl are not game. Then the right—such as it is—to kill these sea-birds is given professedly to the tenants and then reserved to the landlord. While the tenants are to have "power to kill," the landlord reserves "full power to kill." The tenants are to have the privilege of killing under restriction and limitation, and only during certain seasons, and so as not to reduce the existing stock, while the landlord is to have the full and unrestricted power of killing without the tenants having any claim to compensation. Thus there is the form without the substance of a tenancy, since more is reserved than is communicated. I do not enter into the question whether or not the landlord is ever likely to exercise his reserved power to its extreme extent. He may, or may not, according as the tenant pleases or displeases him. But he has taken power to do so. He has introduced into the lease this reserved power of depleting and destroying at his pleasure the only subjects which give it value. By this, he has reserved to himself the power of controlling the franchise, of preserving or destroying it at will. Now, to make a tenant thus dependent upon the mere will or caprice of his landlord for the continuance of the franchise, is, in my opinion, fatal to a free franchise, and must make a lease of this nature altogether a bad qualification. To hold otherwise would, in my opinion, be contrary to the principles of representation and to the constitutional theory of the franchise.

But apart from this, the privilege of killing the wild sea-birds, which are not game and are not property, cannot sustain this claim.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I shall confine myself to the facts as stated in the case submitted to the Court, for by these facts alone are we entitled to determine the rights of parties.

I commence with this, that the subject founded on as a qualification stands in the valuation-roll as worth £30 a-year, and that the claimants as tenants pay that rent for it. Two votes depend upon this qualification, and the value is sufficient to sustain them both. I find, further, in the Valuation Act of 1854, section 34, that "in all questions and proceedings under any Act of Parliament relating to the franchise, or to the representation of the people in Parliament, it shall be sufficient to refer to an entry in the valuation-roll in force for the time, or last in force under this Act in any county or burgh, and such entry shall be received and taken in all such questions and proceedings as conclusive proof that the gross yearly rent or value of the lands or heritages specified therein is at the date of such reference and has been from the commencement of the year to which such valuation-roll applies, of the amount therein set forth." Nothing can be more distinct and conclusive than this as to the value of the subjects. It was quite possible, however, that though £30 a-year was the value of the subjects when the valuation-roll was made up, yet the tenant might have parted with a portion of them by the time the Sheriff came to deal with the assessor's list. If that had been the case a good objection to the qualification might on that ground have arisen; and if the objector succeeded in establishing it, the onus of proving that enough was left to support the claim might be shifted over upon the claimant. But it is not said here that the tenants have parted with any portion of their holding. No such objection has been taken. It is merely objected that the subjects are not of the requisite value, but to this objection the valuation-roll affords a conclusive answer. It has been suggested, however, that the landlord under his reserved power might render the tenants' holding worthless, and therefore that their alleged qualification is exposed to the objection of defeasibility. But (1) no such objection as that of defeasibility is to be found in the case. (2) It is not to be presumed that the landlord would attempt so to destroy the right he had, for a valuable consideration, given to the tenants; and (3) if he made any such attempt I cannot doubt that he could be interdicted from so acting in fraudem of the lease. But it is not said that the landlord has, hitherto at least, done anything to prejudice the tenants' right, and what we have to consider is, what the tenants were in possession of during the qualifying year. Independently of all that, it must, I think, be assumed that, when £30 a-year of rent was agreed to be given for the subject, the tenants had taken into account the landlord's reserved right, and made allowance for it.

No. 1.

Nov. 1, 1875. Girvan v. Campbell.

In no view, therefore, can I sustain the objection of insufficient value, or the objection of defeasibility either, supposing it had been raised in the case, which I do not think it has. The result is that, in my opinion, the Sheriff has fallen into error, and that his judgment must be reversed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I also think that this appeal ought to be sustained.

The appellant is one of two joint tenants; but the subject of the tack is said by the respondent to be peculiar,—because it is a steep rock, is surrounded by the sea, and possesses neither agricultural capacities, nor even pasture grounds on which a few cattle or sheep could be supported. Be it so. There must nevertheless be some attractions—something on account of which Ailsa Craig is considered worth the taking upon tack—worth that which the tenants have become bound to pay, and the mere peculiarity of the place is unimportant in the question whether one of the joint tenants, by reason of the tenancy, possesses the necessary qualification for a vote.

There seem to me to be two points, and only two, which could or might be taken in objecting here to the sufficiency of the qualification. The first is, that the subject of the lease is not heritage within the sense of the enfranchising statutes; and the other is that, so far as heritable, it is not of the requisite value. On the former of these points little if anything requires to be said. In the first place, the Sheriff assumes that there is heritage let to the tenants; and his reason for rejecting the appellant's claim is, that the rent or yearly value of what is really heritable is insufficient. In the second place, even if the Sheriff had not held that Ailsa Craig was land or heritage within the meaning of the Acts, I should have experienced no difficulty in coming to the opposite, which I think the true conclusion.

No. 1.

Nov. 1, 1875.
Girvan v. Campbell.

The value of this heritable subject is therefore all that has to be considered. Now, why is the usual test, the written lease, or what in such a case as the present is practically the same thing, the valuation-roll, not to be taken as conclusive upon this point? The reality of the lease is not disputed; and the stipulated rent is the value entered in the valuation-roll. Both landlord and tenant are assessed upon that rent.

The reasons urged for making this case an exception, are (1) That the rent is paid not for Ailsa Craig, which is heritable, but for Ailsa Craig and for the privilege of killing goats, rabbits, and birds upon the rock. This privilege is not heritable, as the respondent contends and the Sheriff appears to assume. But seemingly it has been forgotten that though the privilege of sporting when unconnected with a subject in its own nature heritable is not a qualification, whatever the rent or return which it yields, yet if it be joined to lands or heritages properly so called, the value of both is the test of the qualification. It is urged (2) that the privilege of sporting given by this lease is illusory, and must be thrown out of account, because full power is reserved to the landlord, and to friends of the landlord having his authority, to kill all, the right to kill which has in form of words been conferred on the tenants. Two answers occur to me, either of which is conclusive. The one is, that the landlord could not, without a violation of the lease, destroy the subject which he had let; and the other, that on the opposite assumption this result must have been contemplated by the tenant, who for what remained agreed to pay and is bound to pay the stipulated rent, which consequently must, on this view of the matter, be taken to be the value of Ailsa Craig.

The lease appears to me to be plain, and also for the period of its duration to confer certainty of tenure. Nothing which is let is at the caprice of the landlord, and therefore all apprehension relative to the independence of the voter, should the claim of the appellant be sustained, may be dismissed.

On the whole, I come, without difficulty, to the conclusion that the appeal must be sustained, and the appellant be placed upon the roll.

THE COURT reversed the judgment of the Sheriff.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2.

Nov. 1, 1875.
Learmont v. Young.

JOHN LEARMONT, Appellant.—Macdonald.
THOMAS YOUNG, Objector and Respondent.—A. J. Young.

County Franchise—Successive Ownership—Reform Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 13.—Held that the successive ownership of different premises, and merely civil possession during the requisite period, did not afford a qualification for a vote in a county.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

JOHN LEARMONT, C.E., Edinburgh, was entered on the assessor's list as proprietor of dwelling-house, garden, &c., Girdwood Street, Peebles, and, in succession, of dwelling-house, stable, and coach-house, Tweed Green, Peebles.

No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1875.
Learmont v. Young.

Learmont had been proprietor of the subjects in Girdwood Street, Peebles, and in receipt of the rents thereof for several years preceding the 15th June 1875, when he sold them. The rent was £29 per annum, and the feu-duty £3, 15s. 2d. He became proprietor of the subjects in Tweed Green, Peebles, at Whitsunday 1875, and was entitled to the rents of the same, which amounted to £11 per annum, free of any deduction, from that term. He had not been in the actual personal occupation of either of the subjects during any part of the twelve calendar months next previous to 31st July 1875.

Thomas Young objected to Learmont's name being continued on the roll, on the ground that the ownership and mere civil possession of different subjects in succession during the statutory period could not, whatever their value, give a qualification to be enrolled under either the Reform Act of 1832 or the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, and that section 13 of the latter Act, recognising successive occupancy, was only applicable where the occupancy was personal.

The Sheriff (G. Napier) sustained the objection.

Learmont appealed, and argued;—There was no principle and no conceivable reason why successive occupancy should confer the franchise and successive ownership should not. There could be no doubt that it was the intention of the Legislature that they should be equally sufficient to give a qualification. The word "occupied" in section 13 of the Act of 1868* must be interpreted with reference to the previous clause of the statute. Where personal occupancy was necessary it must be interpreted as "occupied personally," and where personal occupancy was not necessary then as "occupied civilly." Now, there was a provision in the statute whereby an owner occupying civilly the same premises during six months acquired the franchise, and it would be inconsistent with the terms of the section to hold that the occupation of different premises must be, not civil, but natural. True, by an oversight the Legislature had extended the time during which the owner must own or possess civilly different premises to twelve months instead of six; but that was no reason for depriving him of the benefit of the section altogether, unless he were in the actual personal possession as well as ownership.

Argued for the objector;—The position both of owner and occupier prior to the Act of 1868 must be considered. Under the old law neither successive ownership nor successive occupancy was recognised as giving a qualification.[1] The Legislature had now specially enacted that successive occupancy should give a good qualification,[2] and had said nothing about successive ownership. In doing so the intention was to exclude successive ownership without occupancy.

Lord Ormidale.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is right. I must say, however, that it is with regret I have come to this conclusion, because the result is to restrict and not enlarge the right of franchise, while, at the same time, there is reason for thinking, as was argued by the appellant, that the Legislature did not intend any such restriction, but, on the contrary, intended to make successive ownership as much a qualification as successive occupancy. I should, therefore, if I could, have been inclined to support the claim; but, carefully attending to the terms of the 13th clause of the Act of 1868, I am unable to arrive at a conclusion in accordance with my inclination without materially altering the clause, by introducing into it a variety of words. That I do not feel myself at liberty to do.

* 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 13.—"Different premises occupied in immediate succession by any person as owner or tenant during the twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July in any year shall have the same effect in qualifiying such person to vote for a burgh or county respectively as a continued occupancy of the same premises in the manner herein provided," &c.

[1] Young v. Lindsay, Dec. 2, 1865, 4 Macph. 125, 38 Scot. Jur. 76.

[2] 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 13, quoted supra.

No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1875.
Learmont v. Young.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the Sheriff's judgment.

JOHN GILLESPIE, W.S.—W. ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

ALEXANDER HANNAH, Objector and Appellant.—R. V. Campbell.
THOMAS DODDS, Respondent.—M'Laren.

No. 3.
Nov. 1, 1875.
Hannah v. Dodds.

Burgh Franchise—Reform Act, 1868, secs. 3 and 13.—Held that occupancy, as tenant, of one house in a burgh, combined with occupancy, in immediate succession, as owner, of another house in the same burgh, gave a qualification for the burgh franchise when the combined occupancy extended over the requisite period.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

THOMAS DODDS was entered in the roll of voters as "inhabitant occupier as owner of dwelling-house, Main Street," Whithorn.

Dodds had been for several years previous to the term of Whitsunday 1875 tenant of a dwelling-house in Main Street, Whithorn, and during those years was enrolled as "inhabitant occupier as tenant of dwelling-house, Main Street," Whithorn. At Whitsunday 1875 he became owner of a different house, also in Main Street, Whithorn, which he occupied from that date as owner.

Alexander Hannah objected to Dodds being continued on the roll of voters, on the ground that it was not competent to combine occupancy as tenant with occupancy in immediate succession as owner to give a qualification in burghs.

The Sheriff (M. Napier) repelled the objection.

The objector appealed, and argued;—The use of the words "different" must be contrasted with the use of the word "same" in the 13th section of the Reform Act of 1868.* Continued occupancy of the same premises as tenant gave a qualification, and so successive occupancy of different premises as tenant was to give a qualification. Similarly, continued occupancy of the same premises as owner gave a qualification, and so successive occupancy of different premises as owner was to give a qualification. But occupancy of different premises as tenant and as owner successively could not give a vote, because it was not provided that occupancy of the same premises as tenant and owner successively should give a vote. This had already been held with regard to the county franchise.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The bases of the county and burgh franchise were essentially different. What it was not competent to combine in the one case it was competent to combine in the other. The case of Scott Moncrieff v. Dalgleish had, therefore, no bearing on the present.

---

* 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 13.—"Different premises occupied in immediate succession by any person as owner or tenant during the twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July in any year shall have the same effect in qualifying such person to vote for a burgh or county respectively as a continued occupancy of the same premises in the manner herein provided."

[1] Scott Moncrieff v. Dalgleish, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 315, 41 Scot. Jur. 186.

No. 3.
Nov, 1, 1875.
Hannah v. Dodds.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The basis of the qualification of a burgh voter, as defined in section 3 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, is occupancy.* Whether that occupancy be as owner or tenant matters not.

Now, in counties there are two bases of the qualification of a voter. The one is ownership without any necessity for occupancy. The other is tenancy accompanied by personal occupancy. Moreover, the ownership need only have continued for six months. The tenancy and its accompanying occupancy must have continued for twelve months prior to the 31st July in each year.

It is plain, therefore, that the statute could not have contemplated the combination of ownership with occupancy as tenant in succession, or of occupancy as tenant with ownership in succession, to give a qualification for a vote in a county. The case of Scott Moncrieff v. Dalgleish occurred in the county of Selkirk, and I see no reason to doubt that it was rightly decided, though briefly reported.

But the case of the burgh qualification must be distinguished from that of the county qualification. Occupancy, and occupancy alone, being the basis of the burgh qualification, I see no incompatibility in combining occupancy as tenant with occupancy as owner. Had the respondent, at Whitsunday 1875, purchased the house of which he was then tenant, instead of another, and continued to occupy it as owner instead of tenant, I think there can be no doubt that he would have continued qualified to vote as occupier just as he was before. It would be inequitable and irrational to hold that he destroyed his qualification by buying his house. If that be the case, the next step in the reasoning is easy. Instead of purchasing the house he was occupying as tenant, he purchases another, and there he continues his occupancy uninterrupted. He is an inhabitant occupier in the burgh for the requisite twelve months, and that is enough to satisfy the statute. But occupancy is indispensable, and the section in regard to continued occupancy, though of different subjects, relates only to the case of such occupancy.

I am, therefore, for supporting the Sheriff's judgment.

LORD ORMIDALE and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 4.
Nov. 1, 1875.
Mackenzie v. King.

JAMES MACKENZIE, Objector and Appellant.—Lancaster.
WALTER KING, Respondent.—R. V. Campbell.

Franchise—Payment of Poor-rate—Notice by Collector of non-payment—31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, secs. 6 and 18.—A voter's name was struck off the roll for non-payment of poor-rate, in terms of sec. 6 of the Reform Act, 1868. No notice had been given him in the form of schedule C, referred to in sec. 18 of the Act, nor had any "demand-note" been served upon him in terms of that section, except that he had received on 5th February the usual notice of assessment to the effect he had been assessed in a certain sum, and that it was pay-

* 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 3.—"Every man shall . . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter . . . . for a burgh who . . . . is qualified as follows—that is to say,—

"2. Is and has been, for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July, an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house within the burgh: Provided," &c.

No. 4.

Nov. 1, 1875.

Mackenzie v. King.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

able on 16th February. Held that the notice of assessment was sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the 18th section of the statute, and that the name had been rightly struck off the roll.

WALTER KING claimed that his name be retained on the roll of voters for the county of Dumbarton as joint tenant of the farms of Little Duncryne, &c.

Walter King had been a voter on the roll for year 1874-75 as joint tenant along with James King, but the names of both were struck off by the assessor as having become disqualified by failure to pay, on or before 20th June 1875, the poor-rate that had become payable by them and each of them in respect of their farms of Little Duncryne, &c., up to the preceding 15th day of May.

A notice of assessment for the poor on a rental of £68, amounting, at 1½d. per £, to 8s. 6d. in respect of these subjects, was, on 5th February 1875, given by the collector to Walter King, as tenant along with James King, by being left at his usual place of abode. This notice bore "The above is payable to me at my house at Bridgend, Gartocharn, on Tuesday, 16th February 1875."

The poor-rate thus assessed remained unpaid on the 15th day of May 1875, and it was admitted that subsequent to 15th May, and on or before 20th June 1875, no notice was given, in terms of schedule C to the Act 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, annexed, under the 18th section thereof, and that the said poor-rate was still unpaid at 20th June 1875.

It was also admitted that the omission on the part of the collector to give such notice, in terms of the schedule C, was not wilful, or with intent to keep the claimant off the list or register of voters for the said county; and that, apart from the alleged failure to pay poor-rate, King was entitled to have his name retained on the register.

James Mackenzie objected to the claim, on the ground that the claimant had failed to pay poor-rate, as required by the statute.

The Sheriff (Lee) repelled the objection, and admitted the claim.

The objector appealed, and argued;—The question was how far the provision in sec. 18 of the Act of 1868, as to notice being given,* was to be read along with the disqualification for non-payment contained in section 6.† The disqualification was absolute. The provision as to notice was

* 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 18.—"Where any poor-rate due from an occupier of premises, to which a right of voting is for the first time attached by this Act, remains unpaid on the 15th day of May in any year, the collector of poor-rates for the parish in which such premises are situated shall, on or before the 25th day of July in the present, or the 1st day of June in any subsequent year, unless such rate has previously been paid, or has been duly demanded by a demand-note served in like manner as the notice in this section referred to, give or cause to be given, a notice in the form of schedule (C) to this Act to every such occupier. . . . . Any collector of poor-rate who shall wilfully withhold such notice with intent to keep such occupier off the list or register of voters for the burgh or county, as the case may be, shall be deemed guilty of a crime and offence."

† 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 6.—"Every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, &c. who . . . . 2. Is and has been, during the twelve calendar months immediately preceding the last day of July, in the actual personal occupancy as tenant of lands and heritages within the county of the annual value of fourteen pounds or upwards, as appearing on the valuation-roll of such county: Provided that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered who . . . . shall have failed to pay on or before the 1st day of August in the present, or the 20th day of June in any subsequent year, all poor-rate (if any) that have become payable by him in respect of said lands and heritages up to the preceding 15th day of May."

No. 4.
Nov. 1, 1875.
Mackenzie v. King.

not so. It was only where the premises were of the kind "to which a right of voting is for the first time attached by this Act" that notice required to be given. Now, on the face of the valuation-roll these premises would have given a qualification for a vote prior to the Act of 1868, for they were of more than £50 value. It was true that it was only under the Act of 1868 that they could sustain the votes of two or more joint tenants, but the collector of the poor-rate was not bound to make inquiry into how many tenants were claiming votes for each subject from which he collected rates. He was not, therefore, under the 18th section of the Act of 1868, obliged to give any notice. But, even if he was so obliged, he had fulfilled his duty in leaving the notice of 5th February 1875, and there was nothing to counteract the disqualification arising from the 6th section.

Argued for the respondent;—The term "demand-note" used in the 18th section was borrowed from the English poor-law system. As an excuse for not giving the notice in the form of schedule C such a demand-note must be served. But the notice actually given on 5th February 1875 was not in any sense a demand-note. It was a mere notice of assessment in a sum which would become due, and that was a very different thing from a demand for payment of a sum which had become due, and from the notice prescribed in schedule C. Besides, under 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 39, the collector is bound to give to every person a notice of assessment, such as that given on 5th February. Unless, then, the demand-note of the 18th section of the Act of 1868 was something different from the notice of assessment, that section could never have any effect, for every one received a notice of assessment.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—Notice, usual and sufficient, was given on 5th February, that this rate was due on 16th February. Four months and more elapsed between that last day and the 20th June, when the appellant became disqualified for non-payment of the rate. During all this time the rate remained unpaid, and we do not know whether it has been yet paid.

The notice of 5th February 1875 was given in terms of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, sections 39 and 90, and was in the usual form. It gave sufficient intimation that the rate was payable on a specified day, and past-due after that day. The question is, Is the use of the English term "demand-note" to introduce any change into our practice, so as to make a new and separate notice necessary. I cannot think so. The collector might have proceeded to obtain a distress warrant for non-payment, and recover the rate in arrear, without any further notice.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the objection is good.

LORD ORMIDALE and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT reversed the Sheriff's judgment.

J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—T. & R. B. RANKEN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 5.
Oct. 15, 1875.
Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars.

CHRISTINA HUSBAND OR TURBYNE AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—J. P. B. Robertson.

KIRK-SESSION OF LEUCHARS, Defenders.—Guthrie Smith—Henderson.

Trust—Charity—Relevancy.—A testator left £500 to the kirk-session of a parish, the interest of which he directed to be applied to the relief of such poor persons, natives of the parish, as the kirk-session should consider to be proper objects of such aid, but who had never received relief from the poor-funds,

No. 5.
Oct. 15, 1875.
Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars.
1ST DIVISION.
Lord Young.
B.

"declaring that the minister and elders constituting the kirk-session" "shall be perpetual patrons of the said sum, and shall have the sole power of naming the said individuals." Held that the kirk-session was entitled to depute the duty of selecting the objects of the charity to the minister.

THE late Alexander Kettle Young, who died on the 30th of August 1841, by his disposition and settlement bequeathed a sum of £500 sterling to the kirk-session of the parish of Leuchars. The following is the clause of the disposition making the bequest, and giving directions as to its application:—"To the kirk-session of the parish of Leuchars, county of Fife, the sum of five hundred pounds, to be lent out on heritable or moveable security, and the interest to be applied towards the relief of such persons, natives of the parish, and particularly of the village of Leuchars, as the said kirk-session shall consider to be proper objects of such aid, but who have never received any relief from the poor-funds, to be paid at such times and in such small sums as shall be considered to be most useful to the said poor persons; declaring that the minister and elders constituting the kirk-session of the parish of Leuchars for the time being shall be perpetual patrons of the said sum, and shall have the sole power of naming the said individuals." The sum of £500, under deduction of legacy-duty and expenses, was paid over to the kirk-session of the parish of Leuchars in 1842.

Mrs Turbyne and others raised the present action against the kirk-session of the parish of Leuchars. They stated that they were natives of the parish of Leuchars, in very poor circumstances, that they had never received relief from the poor-funds, and that in consequence of the illegal actings of the defenders, or some of them, they had been debarred from sharing in the relief intended to be afforded by the testator to persons in their position.

(Cond. 2.) "For many years back, or at all events, the pursuers believe, since the induction of the present minister of the parish, which took place on or about 22d July 1866, no proper application has been made of the interest arising on said £500, as directed by Mr Young's settlement. In particular, they believe and aver that during the whole, or at all events a large portion of the period from July 1866 to the present date no nomination has been in use to be made by the said kirk-session of such persons as they considered entitled to receive relief from said charitable bequest, nor has the interest accruing from the funds thereof been paid to any such persons so nominated, or even, so far as the pursuers know, has said interest been applied to any charitable purpose whatever, at least it has not been so applied in terms of Mr Young's settlement. During the whole of said period there have been numerous persons, natives of the parish of Leuchars, who have never received relief from the poor-funds, but who, from their poverty, were proper objects of relief from the said charitable bequest." (Cond. 3.) "The pursuers have called on the defenders to exhibit accounts of the application and management of said charitable bequest during the period since 22d July 1866 to the present date, but the defenders refuse, or at least delay to do so. The defenders, further, have never given to the pursuers or any other residenters in the parish of Leuchars, although they have been called on repeatedly so to do, the slightest information regarding the investment of the said fund, the management thereof, or the application of the interest accruing thereon."

The kirk-session explained that the revenue had been distributed by the minister with the sanction of the elders. "When the present minister (Mr Johnstone) came to the parish in 1866 he followed the practice of his predecessor with regard to the management of this fund, which was simply to distribute it in consultation with his elders, or at least with their knowledge and sanction, among such necessitous and deserving persons of the class mentioned in the will as were likely to benefit from a little timely help, but who were naturally disinclined to accept public or parochial charity. To persons of this description, whose cases had come to his notice in the course of his visiting through the parish, or had attracted the attention of the elders, or were otherwise brought to his knowledge, assistance was given in the form of clothes, meal, coals, and sometimes small sums of money, for longer or shorter periods. It was not the practice before the defender, Mr Johnstone's time, and has not since been deemed necessary, to call special meetings of the kirk-session for the purpose of making express nominations to the fund; indeed, as the cases were often of considerable urgency, it would have been impracticable to do so without seriously interfering with the good which was done by means of the charity. No receipts were taken for the sums spent in the above manner, and it has never been suggested that lists should be prepared and published of the persons who received relief from the fund. No purpose would have been served by the publication of these lists, and many persons would have declined to have received the assistance tendered if such had been the condition on which it must be accepted. The defender, Mr Johnstone, however, preserved lists and notes of his own, from which an account at any time could have been prepared. It is admitted that there have been numerous persons, natives of the parish, who were deserving of relief from the fund had it been larger; but the sum being limited, the defenders were obliged to make a selection of the cases, and they have done so faithfully and to the best of their ability, and it is believed judiciously and with good results."

No. 5.

Oct. 15, 1875.
Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars.

The conclusions of the summons were (1) for declarator that the kirk-session were bound at their usual meetings, or at meetings called for the purpose, to nominate certain persons as objects of the charity; (2) "that the defenders, the kirk-session foresaid, have not during the last nine years, or a great part of that period, been administering the said charitable bequest in accordance with the will, intention, and purposes of the said Alexander Kettle Young; and (3) the defenders should be ordained to invest the said sum of £500 on good heritable or moveable security, and from time to time henceforward to nominate at their usual meetings, or at meetings called for the purpose, such persons, natives of the parish of Leuchars, and particularly of the village of Leuchars, as they shall consider to be proper objects of aid from said charitable bequest, but who have never received any relief from the poor-funds, to be recipients of aid from the said charitable bequest, and each year henceforward to distribute the interest accruing from year to year on said £500 among said persons nominated by them, and that at such times and in such small sums as should be considered most useful to said persons; and to administer said charitable bequest regularly in all time coming, and to make and preserve yearly accounts of their said administration." There were further conclusions for the appointing of a judicial factor, and for accounting.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In terms of the said disposition and settlement of the said Alexander Kettle Young the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the first and third conclusions of the summons. (2) The administration and management by the defenders of the charitable bequest mentioned in the condescendence having been at variance with the wish and intention of the said Alexander Kettle Young said management and administration were and are illegal, and ultra vires of the defenders, and the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the second conclusion of the summons.

No. 5.

Oct. 15, 1875.
Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuers are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defenders are entitled by the terms of the bequest to distribute the said charity among poor persons of the class mentioned at such times and in such small sums as shall be considered most useful, without any express nomination to the fund at meetings of session.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses, and remits," &c.*

The pursuers reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was ultra vires of the kirk-session to devolve their duty of selecting and naming the persons who were to be recipients of the testator's charity upon the minister. What the testator had intended in selecting the minister and kirk-session as the dispensers of his bounty was that each case to be relieved should be carefully considered by a responsible body of men, and the persons entitled to participate in the bequest were justified in demanding that this protection against favouritism or improper use of the fund should be exercised. The minister and kirk-session having in this manner, and also in failing to keep an account of monies disbursed, neglected their duty, the action was a relevant one, and its conclusions should be sustained.

Argued for the defenders;—The object of the testator was to prevent those poor persons who, though not actually paupers, were in pressing need of relief, from coming upon the parish, and so losing their self-respect. Such being the case, the testator's intention would be utterly defeated if public inquiry were to be made into the merits of each case, the recipients of a fund so distributed being in no better case than the paupers who were relieved by the parish. It was at once the most proper and simple mode of distributing this fund for the kirk-session to remit to the minister, whose opportunities of knowing the circumstances of the poor in his parish were much greater than theirs, to act as the dispenser of this fund, subject to such suggestions and assistance as they might offer. The Court were always slow to interfere with the discre-

---

* "NOTE.—The pursuers state no case to warrant the interference of the Court. Having regard to the character and amount of the charity in question, I think the kirk-session acted reasonably and within their power when they left the distribution to the discretion of the minister. Having confidence, no doubt well founded, in his integrity and judgment, to fulfil the intention of the charitable giver, I think they could not have taken a wiser course. The minister no doubt gave such an account of his proceedings from time to time as satisfied the session, and any more formal accounting would, with reference to such a fund and the purpose for which it was given, have been out of place. Accounts open to public inspection are certainly not required, and an accounting in this Court, at the instance of the pursuers or others like them, would put the little fund in a fair way of being extinguished altogether, by a rapid distribution of it in a manner not contemplated by the charitable donor. There is, in truth, nothing for it but to trust the kirk-session, as the giver did, implicitly; and unless the members shall concur in deliberate misapplication, which is not reasonably to be apprehended, there is no real danger. The practical local checks against any serious abuse are quite sufficient, and I can give no countenance to a resort to this Court with such a case as the pursuers present. I see no reason to doubt that the defenders have been acting properly according to the purpose and intention of the charity."

No. 5.
Oct. 15, 1875.
Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars.

tion of such a body as were here selected by the testator to administer his bequest.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt what is the object of this charity. It is the relief of poor persons not on the roll of the parochial board, and who have never been on the poor's-roll. Out of that class the kirk-session are to relieve those whom they consider proper objects of the charity. There is no doubt that the kirk-session are to select out of that class the persons who are to receive the charity. The only question is whether the kirk-session can devolve on the minister the duty of selection, and are entitled to trust to his selection. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that they may do so.

It is not desirable that the kirk-session should go formally to work, and make a minute on every occasion of their granting a sum of money. Nor is it desirable that every member of the kirk-session should concur in every shilling or half-crown which is given to a poor person. It is quite competent to depute the duty. If this had been a larger parish, and the fund had been larger, it would have been competent to devolve the duty of distributing the charity on a committee of the kirk-session. It seems to me that the minister is just a committee. His knowledge of the poor makes him the most suitable person to distribute the funds, and it would be very much to be regretted if any interference should be made. This is a small fund, which is to be divided in small portions, and if any formal proceedings, such as are contemplated by the pursuers, were necessary, I think it is very doubtful whether any kirk-session would be willing to undertake the duty at all.

The charity is devoted to a very useful and important object—to keep poor persons from coming upon the poor's-roll. It is a charity in aid of the church-door collections, which, to a certain extent, are devoted to the same purpose, and I should be sorry if we were to come to a result which would interfere with the present arrangement. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—This is a very useful kind of charity, and creditable to the discrimination of the testator. There is nothing more important than to keep persons who are in danger of sinking into poverty from being placed on the poor's-roll. A certain feeling of degradation naturally results from the receipt of parochial relief which is not favourable to subsequent independent exertion and industry. That is an evil which inevitably accompanies the otherwise beneficial operation of a poor-law, and which does not result in the same degree from charity privately administered. If this fund were distributed in the way the pursuers propose the beneficial results would be to a great extent defeated. If the kirk-session had always to meet and discuss the claims for relief and record them in their minutes the publicity would go far to defeat the object of the testator. We are not told what the testator's position in life was, but I have no doubt he understood all these considerations when he made the bequest.

The minister is generally a person of respectability and of religious principles. He has opportunities of ascertaining the character of the recipients. If the testator has empowered the kirk-session to distribute the charity it is surely competent for them to depute the duty to the minister so far as they have confidence in him, and to rely on what he verbally reports to them. If they have [1] Liddle v. Kirk-session of Bathgate, July 11, 1854, 16 D. 1075, 26 Scot. Jur. 584; Petrie v. Meek, March 4, 1859, 21 D. 614, 31 Scot. Jur. 334.

No. 5.

Oct. 15, 1875.
Turbyne v. Kirk-Session of Leuchars.

at any time the slightest idea that he is doing wrong they have power to inquire and to interfere.

I have no doubt that the Lord Ordinary is right, and I concur in the observations which he makes in his note. The pursuers have stated nothing relevant, and in place of sustaining the defences generally I think it would be better to sustain the defenders' first plea in law and dismiss the action.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur. I read the word "naming" used in this deed as meaning selecting, the object being plainly to give the privilege of selection. As the kirk-session are to administer this bequest, and I wish it were larger, then, I think, they could not do so more wisely than by handing it over to the minister, who is moderator of the session, and who knows more of the habits and the means of the deserving poor of the parish who are not paupers than any one else. If the minister distributes the fund at the request of the kirk-session, who accept his distribution as satisfactory, that is the same as if they had done it themselves.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor: Find that the averments of the pursuers are not relevant to support the conclusions of the summons, or any of them: Therefore sustain the first plea in law for the defenders: Dismiss the action, and decern: Find the pursuers liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

LINDSAY, PATERSON, & Co., W.S.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 6.

JAMES FORREST, Pursuer.—Brand—Rhind.
ALEXANDER DUNLOP, Defender—Mitchell.

Oct. 15, 1875.
Forrest v. Dunlop.

Process—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 26—Decree by default—Res judicata.—A decree of absolvitor upon the pursuer's failure to deliver printed proofs of the record in terms of sec. 26 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, is a decree in foro, and, so long as it subsists, will exclude a new action upon the same grounds.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.

ON 30th November 1874 Forrest raised an action of damages against Dunlop for slander, which was called before Lord Young, Ordinary. The defender entered appearance and lodged defences; and on 8th January Lord Young, in respect of the failure of the pursuer to deliver two printer's proofs of the record, in terms of the Court of Session Act, 1868,* and no appearance being then made for the pursuer, assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action, and found the defender entitled to expenses.

The pursuer did not reclaim, but before the reclaiming days had expired raised the present action before Lord Curriehill, Ordinary, precisely in terms of the former action.

The defender, founding on the decree of absolvitor in the former action, which had been extracted and a charge for the taxed amount of expenses given thereon, pleaded res judicata.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains

* Sec. 26 provides that if the pursuer shall fail within eight days from the lodging of the defences (where no revisal has been allowed), to deliver to the defender's agent, two printer's proofs of the pleadings which are to form the record, "the defender may enrol the cause, and move for decree of absolvitor by default, which decree the Lord Ordinary shall grant, unless the pursuer shew good cause to the contrary."

No. 6.

Oct. 15, 1875.
Forrest v. Dunlop.

the defender's plea of res judicata, assoilzies the defender from the action, and finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—There could be no res judicata unless the Court applied its mind to the case.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question is too clear for doubt. A decree in absence is not a nonentity. It will receive effect as long as it stands, though it may be brought under review by reduction or suspension. But a decree by default is a decree in foro. It may be taken out of the way by reclaiming note, and in the event of the reclaiming days being allowed to expire through inadvertence, a remedy is provided by the 16th section of the Act 48 Geo. III. c. 151.† It is also open to the party to bring a reduction of the decree on the ground that it was obtained through inadvertence, in which case the Court, although it will require a strong statement of facts to support such an application, has the power to award substantial justice. But that is not the question here. It is whether, after decree of absolvitor has been pronounced and extracted, it can be ignored and a new action brought as a matter of course. I am clearly of opinion that it cannot, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMIDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—" In respect of the subsisting decree in the former action at the instance of the pursuer against the defender refuse the reclaiming note and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, find the pursuer liable in additional expenses to the defender," &c.

ABRAHAM NIVISON, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

---

* " NOTE. . . . . .—I am of opinion that this plea (of res judicata) is well founded. I think that the pursuer must be held as confessed in the former action, and that he cannot now insist in the claim of damages from which the defender was assoilzied in that action. The pursuer not only did not appear to shew cause why that decree of absolvitor should not be pronounced, but he did not avail himself of the remedy, which was open to him, of applying to the Inner-House by a reclaiming note to be reponed. To allow the pursuer now to insist in a new action, in the same terms as the former action, would not only be to ignore the provisions of the Judicature Act, by which a pursuer may abandon an action, reserving right to bring a new action, but would be a violation of the policy and of the letter of the Court of Session Act, 1868. A decree by default is a decree in foro, and the party against whom such a decree is pronounced can be reponed only by adopting the well-known and authorised procedure of an application to the Inner-House by a reclaiming note within twenty-one days, or possibly before extract. I know of no case in which a decree by default has ever been allowed to be set aside by the institution of a new action. The defender must therefore be assoilzied, with expenses."

[1] Jenkins v. Robertson, April 5, 1867, 5 Macph. H. L. 27, 39 Scot. Jur. 384, L. R., 1 Sc. Ap. 117. The following cases were also referred to:—Sheriff v. Brodie, May 24, 1836, 14 S. 825, 8 Scot. Jur. 365; Mackenzie v. Smith, June 26, 1861, 23 D. 1201, 33 Scot. Jur. 605.

† " Provided always, and be it enacted, that if the reclaiming or representing days against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary shall, from mistake or inadvertency, have expired, it shall be competent, with the leave of the Lord Ordinary, to submit the said interlocutor, by petition, to the review of the Division to which the said Lord Ordinary belongs; but declaring always that in the event of such petition being presented the petitioner shall be subjected in the payment of the expenses previously incurred in the process by the other party."

JOSEPH ROBERTSON, Petitioner.—Mackintosh. No. 7.

Joint Stock Company—Liquidator—Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89 (Companies Act, 1862), sec. 138.—Held that the liquidator of a Scotch joint stock company, appointed under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, who had gone to reside in England in the course of the liquidation, was entitled to obtain decree under secs. 121 and 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, against contributories who had failed to make payment of calls.

Oct. 20, 1875. Robertson.

JOSEPH ROBERTSON, the resident manager of the Northern Counties Fire Office at Inverness, was appointed liquidator for winding up the company voluntarily under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, and 30 and 31 Vict. c. 131). In the course of the liquidation he went to reside at Newcastle, and while there presented the present petition under secs. 121 and 138 of the Companies Act of 1862 against a list of shareholders who had failed to make payment of calls.

1st DIVISION. B.

The petition was not opposed, but the Court expressed some doubt whether the liquidator, having gone to reside in England, they ought to give decree.

Counsel was heard for the petitioner.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think there is any doubt about this. The petitioner is liquidator of the Northern Counties Fire Office, which is a Scotch company. For some time after he was appointed liquidator he continued to be resident in Inverness, where the domicile of the company was. He is now living in Newcastle, in England. It is a question whether we are entitled to grant this decree in the same way as if the liquidator was still resident in Scotland. But, on reflection, I do not think there is any objection. If this had been an English company, with an Englishman as liquidator, we should not have hesitated in giving decree against Scotch contributories. The contributories mentioned in this list will have the same power of stating objections to payment of calls as in any other case. They can state their objections in a suspension.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decern against the several contributories named in the list certified by the petitioner and annexed to the petition, being No. 10 of process, for payment to the petitioner at the office of the National Bank of Scotland, Inverness, of the sums therein certified to be due by each of the said contributories respectively, with interest on the said sums from 1st September 1874, the date certified in the said list when the same became due, at the rate of five per centum per annum until payment, and ordain the said contributories respectively to make the said payment within six days of the service of this decree, and grant warrant for immediate extract hereof."

GIBSON-GRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

[1] Lumsden, Dec. 14, 1858, 21 D. 110, 31 Scot. Jur. 73; Lord Macdonald v. His Next of Kin, June 11, 1864, 2 Macph. 1194, 36 Scot. Jur. 600.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Wilson v.
Mackie.

WILLIAM WILSON, Pursuer and Respondent.—Scott.
ARCHIBALD MACKIE Junr., Defender and Appellant.—Thoms—Trayner.
ARCHIBALD MACKIE Senr., Defender.

Arrestment—Malice and want of probable cause.—Opinions (per Lord President, Lord Ardmillan, and Lord Mure), that where arrestments have been used against the private funds of an executor upon the dependence of an action against him as executor for payment of an executry debt, the executor is entitled to damages without proving malice or want of probable cause, in respect that the arrestments are entirely without warrant.

1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

THIS was an action at the instance of William Wilson, baker, Glasgow, against "the firm of Archibald Mackie," provision merchant, Glasgow, and Archibald Mackie and Archibald Mackie junior, as partners and as individuals, for £150 of damages caused to the pursuer by "the wrongous, illegal, and malicious use of arrestments by the defenders, or one or other of them." Appearance was entered for the individual defenders, but Archibald Mackie senior subsequently allowed decree by default to go out against him.

The arrestments had been used on the dependence of an action at the instance of the firm of "Archibald Mackie" against William Wilson, "executor decerned and confirmed to the late John Wilson," for payment of a debt due by the executry estate.

The schedule of arrestment complained of bore,—"I, Alexander Macintyre, Sheriff officer, by virtue of a libelled summons from the Sheriff Court books of Lanarkshire, containing warrant to arrest, dated at Glasgow, the 4th day of December 1872 years, raised at the instance of Archibald Mackie, provision merchant, 82 Main Street, Anderston, Glasgow, pursuer, against William Wilson, baker, Thistle Street, Glasgow, executor decerned and confirmed to the late John Wilson, baker in Glasgow—In Her Majesty's name, &c., lawfully fence and arrest in the hands of you, William Hay, miller, Glasgow, the sum of £300 sterling, more or less, due and addebted by you to the said William Wilson; together also with all goods and gear, debts, sums of money, or any other effects whatever, lying in your hands, custody, and keeping, pertaining or in any manner of way belonging to the said William Wilson, or to any person or persons for his use and behoof, all to remain under sure fence and arrestment at the instance of the said pursuer aye and until payment be made or security be found," &c.

The pursuer averred that the arrestments had been directed against the personal funds of the pursuer, and had been used maliciously for the purpose of injuring his credit. It appeared from a proof that it was Archibald Mackie senior who gave instructions to the officer to execute the arrestment, and it also appeared that he had made use of threatening language against the pursuer. No malice was proved against Archibald Mackie junior.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), after a proof, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the individual defender, Archibald Mackie junior, maliciously and wrongously caused the arrestments libelled to be used against the funds of the pursuer: Finds him liable in damages therefor jointly and severally with the other individual defender, Archibald Mackie, against whom decree by default has already passed, for the whole sum sued for: Assesses the said damages at £25: Finds the defender Archibald Mackie junior liable in expenses: Allows an account," &c.*

* "NOTE.—In the conjoined actions between the same parties the Sheriff-substitute has found that a partnership exists between the Mackies to the effect at least of making them responsible to the present pursuer in respect of his claim

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1875. Wilson v. Mackie.

The Sheriff, on appeal, adhered, except as to the amount of damages, which he reduced to £10.*

The defender Archibald Mackie junior appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—The schedules of arrestment were to be construed as affecting the executry funds alone, and if so, it was necessary for the pursuer to prove malice on the part of the appellant personally. Even if it had been proved that he was in partnership with his father, one partner was not responsible for the malice of another.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—Malice was not necessary. The former action gave no ground for the use of diligence against the pursuer's personal funds, and therefore there was no ground whatever for the arrestment.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is at the instance of William Wilson for damages for the wrongous use of arrestments by the defenders upon the dependence of a previous action at their instance against the present pursuer in his capacity of executor of the deceased John Wilson. Arrestments may be used wrongously in two senses. When the claim in the action on which the arrestments proceed is unfounded, it is still the right of the pursuer to use such arrestments, unless he does it maliciously and without probable cause. But if the arrestment be used without any warrant at all,—if there be no warrant in the summons, nor in the letters of arrestment,—that is wrongous in a different sense; and it is not necessary to aver and prove malice and want of probable cause. Now, this is the nature of the present case. The action was against William Wilson, as executor of John Wilson, and was for an executry debt, and Mr Wilson was not personally liable for the sum sued for beyond the funds of the executry estate. Now, there was a warrant in in that action. But he is not sure that the principles of agency on which he proceeded there are applicable to a claim of damages for a malicious and illegal act, which is not properly within the agency of a partner acting for his firm. Possibly the Sheriff-substitute may take too narrow a view of a firm's liability for the way in which its members use arrestments in the course of their business. But he thinks that, in the present action, which is directed against both the Mackies as individuals as well as partners, and concludes for decree against them jointly and severally, the justice of the case may be arrived at by decrees against them as individuals, leaving the firm out of the question.

---

"There is no direct proof of malice on the part of the younger Mackie. But there is clear proof of malice on the part of the father; and considering that the younger Mackie was the avowed pursuer of the action on the dependence of which the arrestments were used, as well as the proved relations between the parties, and the nature of the arrestments, which were entirely disconform to their warrant, and were therefore recalled by this Court without caution, the Sheriff-substitute thinks that he is bound to impute that legal malice to the son also, now the only defender.

* "NOTE.—The only question submitted to the consideration of the Sheriff on the appeal was the amount of damages, the defenders' agent frankly admitting (what could hardly be disputed) that damages had been incurred.

"As to their amount the Sheriff has considerable difficulty. On the one hand, merely nominal damages are not enough; for it is evident that the locking up of the funds of a man in business must cause him annoyance and trouble, and tends to impair his credit. On the other hand, the original pursuer was unable to specify any damage which he had incurred, or to say that any customers had left him in consequence of the arrestments in question. In these circumstances it is thought that £25 is too large a sum to meet damage of a not very tangible kind, and that £10 is a fairer sum."

[1] Brodie v. Young, Feb. 19, 1851, 13 D. 737, 23 Scot. Jur. 319.

[2] Meikle v. Sneddon, March 5, 1862, 24 D. 720, 34 Scot. Jur. 357.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Wilson v. Mackie.

the summons, which entitled the pursuer (present defender) to arrest funds due to the executry estate, and to Mr Wilson as executor, but which gave him no right to arrest the personal funds of William Wilson. Yet this is what he did. We find that this was an arrestment entirely without warrant. There is thus therefore no necessity to aver malice or want of probable cause. If there had been any I should have had the greatest difficulty in concurring with the Sheriff-substitute. I cannot find any evidence of malice against Mackie junior. But the Sheriff-substitute seems to think that he is liable for the malice of the father. But malice is a personal feeling. I think we should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriffs; find that the arrestments were used wrongously; and I am not inclined to assess the damages at a higher sum than has been found by the Sheriff.

LORD DEAS.—Assuming that damages are to be given the amount awarded is fair and reasonable.

I am not disposed to give an opinion whether or not it was essential to libel malice. The action libels malice, and the pleas in law proceed upon malice. There is no plea to the effect that malice is not necessary, and the question was not argued at the bar. All I say, therefore, is that on this point I reserve my opinion. I rather think the arrestment was intended to cover the executry funds only, and that it was by an inaccuracy of language merely that it was made to comprehend the funds of the pursuer as an individual. Before holding malice to be required in such a case I should desire to examine the authorities, which we have not had an opportunity of doing.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—If in the action of damages it had been necessary to prove malice and want of probable cause I could not accept the doctrine that the malice of the father can attach to the son, so as to make the son liable. There is no such thing as vicarious malice. Malice is a purely personal quality.

But was it necessary to aver malice? I think there is a great distinction between using diligence nimiously, or wrongously, in the sense of injuriously, or where it turns out that no debt is due, and using an arrestment which is ab origine null, being without warrant. The former may afford ground for an action of damages, but malice there requires to be proved. But in the present case there was no warrant to support the arrestment used. The only warrant was to arrest the funds of another persona in law. There was therefore no legal warrant, and in the case of arrestment without warrant malice does not require to be proved. The damages awarded by the Sheriff (£10) are quite sufficiently high.

LORD MURE.—The question whether it is necessary to libel malice and want of probable cause in this action is one attended with difficulty. I am of opinion that the circumstances of this case fall under the rule of law as laid down by the Court in the case of Meikle v. Sneddon, 24 D. 720, and that malice and want of probable cause is therefore not necessary.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, dated respectively 10th December 1874 and 11th March 1875: Find that the firm of Archibald Mackie, provision merchant, 82 Main Street, Anderston, Glasgow, and the individual defender (appellant), Archibald Mackie junior, one of the partners thereof, caused the arrestments libelled to be used against the personal funds of the pursuer (respondent), William Wilson, executor of the deceased John Wilson: Find that the said arrestments were so used wrongously and without legal warrant: Find the said firm of Archibald Mackie, and Archibald Mackie junior, one of the partners thereof, liable in damages therefor jointly and severally with the other individual defender, Archibald Mackie, the other partner of said firm, against whom decree by default has already been pronounced in the inferior Courts for the whole sum sued for: Assess the said damages at £10 sterling, and decern therefor, with interest as libelled, against the said firm of Archibald Mackie, and the said Archibald Mackie junior, one of the partners thereof: Find the said firm of Archibald Mackie and the said Archibald Mackie junior liable in expenses both in the inferior Court and this Court," &c.

No. 8.

Oct. 22, 1875. Wilson v. Mackie.

GEORGE BEGG, S.S.C.—LINDSAY MACKERSY, W.S.—Agents.

ANDREW ROBERTSON, Pursuer and Appellant.—Trayner—Brown.
JOHN COCKBURN, Defender and Respondent.—Mackintosh—J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 9.

Oct. 22, 1875. Robertson v. Cockburn.

Lease—Jurisdiction—Sheriff.—An action to compel a person to implement a lease, by entering into possession and paying the rent, may competently proceed in the Sheriff Court, although the Sheriff may have to decide upon the constitution of the lease, in consequence of the defender's denial of its existence.

Process—Summons—Contract—Lease.—A summons concluding generally against a tenant for implement of a contract of lease held insufficient, but allowed to be amended by the insertion of the words "by entering into possession of the premises and paying the rent when due."

Process—Appeal—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Expenses.—In an appeal from a Sheriff Court, remit made to the Sheriff to proceed with the case, with power to decide the question of expenses in the Court of Session when the case should be decided on its merits.

THE present action was raised by Andrew Robertson against John Cockburn in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Mid-Lothian. I.

The conclusions of the summons were as follows, but without the words in italics, which were allowed to be added by the Court of Session:—"Therefore the defender ought to be decerned and ordained forthwith to implement and fulfil the contract or agreement entered into between him and the pursuer on or about the 5th day of October 1874 for a lease of the shop No. 64 Grove Street, Edinburgh, for five years, at the rent of £45 for the first three and £50 for the remaining two years, conform to draft of such lease prepared by the agents of the said pursuer and revised by the said defender, and that by entering into possession of the premises and paying the rent when due, or otherwise, and in the event of the defender failing to implement and fulfil the said contract as above concluded for, the defender ought and should be decerned to pay to the pursuer the sum of £400 as damages sustained by the pursuer, or which he may yet sustain in consequence of the defender's said failure to implement and fulfil the said contract or agreement."

The record was closed upon the summons and the following minute of defence:—"Mr M'Dougall, for defender, denied that any lease between the pursuer and defender was ever entered into for premises in Grove Street, and explained that the defender was in negotiation for a lease of the subjects in Grove Street, but that no agreement was come to nor any lease signed. He further pleaded locus pœnitentiæ, in respect that no written agreement or lease was ever signed, though the alleged lease is for a term of years."

No. 9.

Oct. 22, 1875. Robertson v. Cockburn.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that this action is in substance one to have it found and declared that the defender is bound to accept from the pursuer a lease for five years, at the rent of £45 for the first three and £50 for the remaining two years : Finds that it is ultra vires of this Court to pronounce a judgment to the above effect : Therefore dismisses the action ; finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

The Sheriff (Davidson) adhered.†

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant ;—(1) The first ground on which the Sheriff-substitute had dismissed the action was clearly wrong. A declaratory conclusion was the assertion of a bare right, to be afterwards followed up. This was simply a petitory action ad factum præstandum, with an alternative conclusion for damages. The necessity of declaring a fact in order to reach the decree did not make it a declaratory action. (2) Mere reference to a heritable subject did not make the action incompetent in the Sheriff Court. There was no competition between the pursuer and the defender in regard to the property of the subjects in question. No decision could be quoted to the effect that it was not within the Sheriff's jurisdiction to determine the constitution or validity of a lease. The dicta relied on by the defender were merely obiter. The books on Sheriff Court practice might be appealed to, if not as authorities on the law, at least in proof of the practice. Indeed it was well known that in actions of removing, for instance, Sheriffs constantly entertained questions in regard to the validity of leases. The defender's contention might have some weight if the validity of the lease depended on the title of the granter, though even in such cases it was competent for the Sheriff, in order to explicate his proper jurisdiction, to decide incidentally a question of heritable right, provided there was no proper competition of heritable titles. But in this case the defender did not deny the pursuer's title to the subjects. The

* " NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute has read the authorities to which he has been referred by the pursuer's agent. These bring out pretty clearly that a declaratory conclusion and decree are necessary to give the pursuer the remedy he seeks. This Court is not competent to give that remedy. Moreover, the proposed deed is intended to give a leasehold title to an heritable subject ; and the conclusion for damages is subordinate to the leading conclusion, which, as already said, is in substance and effect a declaratory one.—See Robertson v. Lindsay, Dec. 4, 1873" (ante, vol. i. p. 323).

† " NOTE.—The case of Gordon in 1802 (M. 12,245) to which the respondent has referred, and also another case of recent date, Cox and others v. Kerr, Oct. 25, 1873 (ante, vol. i. p. 60), which followed the case of Gordon, were not, at least apparently, quite the same as this. In both these cases there were disputes as to the terms of the dispositions, which in each case the petitioner asked that the respondent should be ordained to deliver to him. Thus, questions of heritable right were clearly involved in these cases.

" But here—supposing the alleged agreement for a contract of lease were to be proved by the petitioner—the exact terms and conditions of the lease to which the petitioner is entitled would or might be subject of discussion, and equally raise such incompetent questions. The petitioner of course means that if he proved his agreement for a lease the Sheriff should read the written lease to be executed in respect of the agreement, and decide all questions that might arise thereanent. Therefore, though with hesitation, the Sheriff concurs in holding this action incompetent.

" The respondent did not plead incompetency. The Court was, however, ex proprio motu, entitled to consider that ; and it is not thought there should be any modification of expenses, inasmuch as the progress of the case has been at once arrested, and no additional expenses caused by the respondent's act."

No. 9.

Oct. 22, 1875. Robertson v. Cockburn.

question between them, which would equally have arisen had the action been simply for payment of the first half year's rent, was whether the parties had entered into a certain contract, personal in its nature, though in certain cases and to certain effects made real by statute. Cases in regard to feu-rights, which were heritable in their nature, did not support the defender's case.[1]

Argued for the defender;—This was not an action to enforce an admitted lease; it was an action to constitute a lease. The validity of all contracts respecting heritage, where challenged, could be tried in the supreme Court alone.[2] If it was competent for the Sheriff to try the validity of a lease for five years, it would be equally competent for him to try the validity of a lease for ninety-nine years, or longer. Further, if this action were competent in the Sheriff Court, it would be equally competent in the Sheriff Court to sue the landlord for implement of a lease the constitution of which he denied.

In the course of the argument the pursuer proposed, with leave of the Court, to amend the summons by adding the words in italics.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a point of very general importance—how far a Sheriff Court can decide on the constitution and validity of a lease. I am not altogether surprised that as the summons originally stood the Sheriff-substitute could find in it nothing but an action of declarator. Except as regards the alternative conclusion for damages, there is nothing petitory about the summons. A conclusion for implement of a contract is a conclusion for nothing, unless it states in what way the contract is to be implemented. The difficulty, however, has been removed by the addition to the summons of the words "and that by entering into possession of the premises and paying the rent when due."

The question is, whether the Sheriff can competently judge whether the defender is bound to enter into possession and pay the rent, although, to enable him to judge of this, he may have to decide whether the pursuer has proved the existence of a lease. I think that it is clear, beyond doubt, that the Sheriff has jurisdiction to determine whether a tenant is bound to take possession, or to relinquish possession, or to pay the rent, or perform any other obligation of the lease; and he cannot determine such questions without looking at the document of lease, if there is a document. I wish to reserve my opinion on some of the matters suggested in argument. I do not think that the relation of landlord and tenant is at all in the same position as a competition of titles to heritable property. This case does not present anything in the shape of a competition of heritable rights. The pursuer asserts, and the defender denies, that a

---

[1] Hall v. Lady Grant, May 19, 1831, 9 S. 612, 3 Scot. Jur. 433; Murdoch v. Wylie, March 8, 1832, 10 S. 445, 4 Scot. Jur. 377; Corbet v. Douglas and Jarvie, March 5, 1808, Hume, p. 346; Robertson v. Paton, May 23, 1815, Hume, p. 658; M'Glashan's Sheriff Court Practice (4th edit., by Barclay), secs. 74, 76; Dove Wilson's Sheriff Court Practice, pp. 12, 13; (see also Sellar v. Aiton, Jan. 26, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 381.)

[2] E. of Moray v. Pearson, June 14, 1842, 4 D. 1411, 14 Scot. Jur. 493—(see the note appended to the interlocutor of Lord Cuninghame, Ordinary, 4 D. 1413, which was adhered to by the Second Division, pp. 1414-15); Earl of Aberdeen v. Laird, Feb. 7, 1822, 1 S. 294; Robertson v. Lindsay, Dec. 20, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 323—(see opinion of the Lord President, p. 325, and of Lord Deas, p. 328).

No. 9.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Robertson v. Cockburn.

contract of lease has been entered into. I cannot doubt that the Sheriff can competently try such a question.

Lord Neaves.—I am of the same opinion. The original summons was bad, not for want of jurisdiction, but for want of specification. I cannot discover any authority in the law of Scotland for holding that where a pursuer, alleging a right of property in heritable subjects, which is not disputed, seeks to enforce a lease, that is a competition of real rights. A competition necessarily involves two conflicting rights. The rights of landlord and tenant are not properly conflicting. Only one heritable title is alleged by the parties. The defender's case is that he has no claim to any right whatever in the lands, not even to a lease from the obligations in which he seems desirous to escape. The Sheriff's jurisdiction is excluded, if the case discloses a competition of proper heritable titles. But it does not follow that the Sheriff may not examine the validity of a title produced, where no conflicting title is maintained. For instance, in an action of removing, where the pursuer is not the granter of the lease, the Sheriff may competently look at the landlord's disposition or sasine to see whether his title to pursue is prima facie valid.

In this case, then, the objection to the Sheriff's jurisdiction is groundless. The true objection to the summons was its not pointing out in a clear and practical manner what the pursuer sought. If decree had been given in terms of the conclusions of the summons no executorial could have followed. But this objection has been obviated by the amendment.

I give no opinion on the question whether a competition of leasehold rights is competent in the Sheriff Court. To some extent, and upon certain leases, the statute 1449 has conferred the character of real rights, but only in favour of a tenant in possession. A lease is certainly not a real right in the person of a man who has never been in possession and who disclaims the lease. The case is totally different from that of feu-rights, which are real in their nature.

Lord Ormidale.—This case has, from its commencement in the Sheriff Court, been very oddly dealt with. The defender, when he minuted his defence, stated no objection to jurisdiction. Neither did he object that the action, as laid, was irrelevant and insufficient to support its conclusions, although this appears to me to have been a very obvious objection to the summons. To conclude, in general terms, that a defender should implement a lease without specifying how—by paying the stipulated rents and otherwise fulfilling the conditions of the lease—was clearly a defective mode of libelling the action. No one could venture to enforce a decree, if he obtained it, in terms so vague and indefinite. The defect, however, has been supplied by the amendment which has now been made on the summons. And I must express my regret that it had not been so amended at the outset of the litigation in the Sheriff Court. According to the Sheriff Court Act of 1853 it was the duty of the Sheriff-substitute to meet the parties and hear them "in explanation of the grounds of action, and of the nature of the defence to be stated thereto." I am therefore surprised that when this was done, as I presume it was, the summons was not at once amended, as it has now been, and in that way a great deal of time, litigation, and expense saved to the parties.

In regard to the plea of want of jurisdiction taken up and given effect to by the learned Sheriff-substitute, whose interlocutor on the subject was with difficulty adhered to by the Sheriff-principal, not only was it not stated by the defender, but it appears to me to be ill-founded in itself. No. 9.

Oct. 22, 1875. Robertson v. Cockburn.

It is out of the question to say that, because a contract relates to heritable property, the Sheriff has no jurisdiction to consider and sustain an action having reference to it. This was scarcely maintained by the defender, although his argument went very nearly that length. It is enough, however, to remark on the point that actions of a possessory and petitory character, although relating to heritable property, are perfectly competent, and of frequent, if not constant, occurrence in the Sheriff Court. I could not, therefore, have concurred in the views of the learned Sheriffs as stated by them, even if the summons had not been amended. But at any rate, as the case now stands, it is clearly one which cannot be dismissed on the ground of want of jurisdiction on the part of the Sheriff to try its merits. What these may ultimately appear to be cannot be predicted at present. It is quite possible that the pursuer may fail to instruct by competent evidence that there is any such lease as that on which he libels; and for that or other reasons it may turn out that he has no maintainable case.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur. The Sheriff has always jurisdiction to enforce the stipulations of a lease, whether by decerning for payment of rent, or by ordering the execution of improvements, draining or otherwise, contracted for in the lease, or by enforcing any other obligation incumbent on either party. In all such actions there is no doubt whatever of the Sheriff's jurisdiction, and it does not deprive him of jurisdiction that the objection is taken that there is no valid lease. It is a different question whether it may be expedient for the Sheriff to sist process until any general question regarding the lease is settled, either in a reduction, if an ex facie lease is to be set aside, or in a declarator in the supreme Court, if this shall be necessary. But this does not affect the question of jurisdiction. The Sheriff's jurisdiction is untouched, although it may be that he must wait till questions of right be otherwise determined. Viewing this action, as now amended, as simply an action for rent, it is certainly competent in the Sheriff Court, and it is not rendered incompetent by any question raised upon the defences.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall all the interlocutors in the cause: Allow the amendment to be added to the summons: Find that the action as thus amended is competent in the Sheriff Court: Reserve all questions of expenses, and remit the cause to the Sheriff to proceed with the cause, with power to decide the question of expenses in this Court, when the case shall be decided on its merits, and decern."

RICHARDSON & JOHNSTON, W.S.—ALEXR. M'DOUGALL, L.A.—Agents.

JAMES BLAIR, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour.
ROBERT BALFOUR WARDLAW RAMSAY, Defender.—Asher—J. P. B. Robertson.
THE ALLOA COAL COMPANY, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Guthrie Smith.

No. 10.

Oct. 22, 1875.* Blair v. Ramsay, &c.

Minerals—Property—Superior and Vassal—Servitude.—B acquired in feu from A three contiguous parcels of lands. In the titles to the different parcels A reserved respectively:—

(1) "The coals and coal-heughs to be won and disposed upon at our pleasure."

* Debated in July 1875.

No. 10.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Blair v. Ramsay, &c.

(2) "The whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals, with power to search for, work, and carry away the same."

(3) "The coal, with full power to dig for, work, win, and carry away the same."

A was proprietor of the land surrounding B's, and leased the whole coal-field thereunder, including the coals under B's lands, to a coal company who drove a mine, with its entrance in A's lands, cross-cutting coal and other strata in B's lands, to A's lands beyond, and thereby conveyed the minerals wrought under these last-mentioned lands to the surface.

Held that, while A's right in the reserved minerals was one of plenum dominium, his right to bore through strata under B's lands not reserved was of the nature of a servitude or privilege, which could only be used for the purpose of working the reserved minerals and bringing them to the surface; and accordingly that A and his lessees were not entitled to use the mine under B's lands for conveying minerals wrought under A's lands, except in so far as the mine passed through coal wastes under B's lands, or other reserved minerals.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie.

MR BLAIR was the proprietor of a small estate in the county of Clackmannan of which Mr Wardlaw Ramsay was the superior.

Mr Blair's lands consisted of three contiguous parcels acquired by him at different times.

The first parcel, described as the lands of Langour, was feued out in 1825, the superior reserving "the coals and coal-heughs of the said haill lands to be won and disposed upon by me and my foresaids at our pleasure."

The second parcel, which lay between the other two, was feued out in 1827 under a contract of excambion, which contained the following clause:—"Reserving always to the said Robert Wardlaw Ramsay, and his heirs and successors, the whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals within the said three acres of the lands of Westquarter hereby disponed, with power to search for, work, and carry away the same, they always paying to the said James Blair and his foresaids all damages which may be done to the said lands by the said workings, as these damages shall be ascertained by two arbiters to be mutually chosen."

The third parcel was feued out in 1857 under a contract of excambion containing this reservation:—"But excepting always the coal within the said several subjects above disponed to the said James Blair, which coal is hereby expressly reserved to the said Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, with full power to him to dig for, work, win, and carry away the same on paying the surface damages which the ground may thereby sustain, as the same shall be ascertained by two persons to be mutually chosen by the said parties, with power to name an oversman in case of difference."

Mr Blair's lands were situated about the middle of a large estate belonging to Mr Wardlaw Ramsay, the coal-field of which, extending to 830 acres, including 19 acres under Mr Blair's lands, was leased to the Alloa Coal Company.

Under the lease three valuable seams of coal were worked, known as the cherry coal, the splint coal, and the main coal, the splint coal lying about five fathoms below the cherry coal, and the main coal about thirteen fathoms below the splint coal. Other seams existed, but so thin as not to be of marketable value.

Partly to work out the splint coal under Mr Blair's lands, but chiefly for the purpose of working out the coal under Mr Wardlaw Ramsay's lands to the south and east, the Alloa Coal Company found it convenient to drive a mine through Mr Blair's lands. The mine, which was constructed in 1870–1872, left the surface in Mr Ramsay's lands, and ran in a south-easterly direction, first under Mr Ramsay's lands for 158

No. 10.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Blair v. Ramsay, &c.

yards, then under Mr Blair's lands a distance of about 330 yards, at a depth from the surface varying from 16 yards to 34 yards, and entered Mr Ramsay's lands on the other side.

The strata under Mr Blair's lands rose rapidly from north-west to south-east, and the mine cross-cut them, its course lying partly in the cherry coal waste and splint coal waste, and partly in other strata, consisting chiefly of shale and sandstone of no marketable value.

Mr Blair objected to the Alloa Coal Company driving the mine in question through his lands for the purpose of removing minerals under Mr Wardlaw Ramsay's lands, except upon payment of a way-leave. This was refused, and Mr Blair accordingly raised the present action against Mr Wardlaw Ramsay and the Alloa Coal Company.

The conclusions of the summons were (1) for declarator that the defenders had no right "to make or drive any mines or other roads or passages, whether below or above ground, in, through, or over any part" of the pursuer's lands, "for the purpose of obtaining access to coal or other minerals in any lands outside the bounds of the pursuer's said lands belonging, or the coal and other minerals in which belong to the defender, Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, or for carrying along, through, or over such mines, roads, or passages any coal or other minerals from such lands, and in particular that none of the defenders were entitled or had or have right to make or drive a mine now existing in the pursuer's said lands, and having its daylight entrance at or near to the south side of the turnpike road between Alloa and Tillicoultry near to the village of Devonside for any of the purposes foresaid;" (2) for declarator that the defenders had no right to "carry or convey coal or other minerals wrought or won in lands belonging, or the minerals in which belong to, the defender, Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, outside the bounds of the pursuer's foresaid lands, either along the said mine, or along any other mine, road, or passage, either now existing or which may be hereafter made, in, through, or over any part of the pursuer's said lands, whether below or above ground;" and for interdict against the defenders "making or using any mines, roads, or passages, whether below or above ground, in or through the pursuer's foresaid lands, or any part thereof, for the purpose of carrying or conveying any coal or other minerals wrought or won from lands belonging, or the coal or other minerals in which belong to the defender, Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, outside the bounds of the pursuer's said lands; and, in particular, from carrying or conveying any such coals or other minerals along or by the mine now existing in the pursuer's said lands above specified." There were also conclusions for damages, or otherwise for a way-leave to be fixed by the Court.

Defences were lodged for both defenders, in which they maintained that they had a right to use the mine in the way complained of.

The Lord Ordinary, of consent of parties, and before answer, remitted to Mr Alexander Simpson, mining engineer, Glasgow, to report with reference to the mine in question, and the purposes for which it was made and used.

Mr Simpson returned a report, from which the facts above-stated appeared.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares that neither the defender, Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, nor the other defenders, or any of them, has, have, or had any right or title to carry or convey coal or other minerals wrought or won in lands belonging, or the minerals in which belong, to the defender, Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, outside the boundaries of the pursuer's lands, along the mine now driven through the pursuer's lands libelled on, or along any

No. 10.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Blair v.
Ramsay, &c.

other mine, road, or passage which may hereafter be made or driven through or over any other parts of the pursuer's said lands, whether below or above ground, except where said mine passes through the coal wastes in said lands, or through the lands acquired by the pursuer under the contract of excambion, dated 25th August 1827; and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the whole defenders from making or using any mines, roads, or passages, whether below or above ground, in or through the pursuer's foresaid lands, or any part thereof, excepting as aforesaid, for the purpose of carrying or conveying any coal or other minerals wrought or won from lands belonging, or the coal or other minerals in which belong, to the defender, Robert Balfour Wardlaw Ramsay, outside the bounds of the pursuer's said lands; and, in particular, from carrying or conveying any such coals or other minerals along or by the mine now existing in the pursuer's said lands above specified, and decerns: Reserves all questions of expenses, and appoints the cause to be put to the roll with a view to further procedure."*

---

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary does not see his way to give decree in favour of the pursuer in terms of the first declaratory conclusion. It does not appear from Mr Alexander Simpson's report that the mine driven through the pursuer's lands was not made for working the cherry coal in these lands. It is used for working the splint coal, and it may be used for working the main coal situated within the pursuer's lands. The defender, Mr Wardlaw Ramsay, and the other defenders as his tenants in the coal under the pursuer's lands, were, the Lord Ordinary thinks, entitled to drive that mine for the purpose of winning and away carrying the coal in the pursuer's lands, which is the reserved property of Mr Wardlaw Ramsay.

"It was no doubt decided in the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Graham, 28th July 1871, 9 Macph., p. 98, that a superior, as absolute proprietor of the coal and limestone, is entitled to form in them roads for the underground carriage of minerals between mines in other properties. But in the present case Mr Wardlaw Ramsay, the superior, is not absolute proprietor of the strata through which the mine driven through the pursuer's lands runs. That mine is not formed in the coal which is reserved by him. The mine is nearly level, while the coal and other strata rapidly ascend from the entrance of the mine. The strata are therefore cut across by the mine, and the cherry and splint coal seams are alone cut across during its transit through the pursuer's lands.

"The coal in question is reserved under three separate titles, the first being dated in 1825, the second in 1827, and the third in 1857. In the title of 1825 there is a reservation to Mr Wardlaw Ramsay of the coals and coal-heughs. In the contract of excambion of 1827 there were reserved to Mr Wardlaw Ramsay the whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and other minerals, and in the disposition of 1857 the coal was alone reserved.

"Under the term metals and minerals all strata seem to be comprehended, which are now destitute of, or incapable of supporting animal or vegetable life. If this be a correct definition, Mr Wardlaw Ramsay and his coal tenants had right to drive the foresaid mine through the three acres of ground acquired by the contract of excambion of 25th August 1827, with a view to win the coal of other lands beyond those belonging to the pursuer, because the whole strata were his absolute property.

"Under the decision in the Duke of Hamilton's case the superior as owner of the coal was found entitled to use the coal waste for the underground carriage of minerals from other lands where it was not proved, as is the case here, that the whole reserved coal had been worked out and exhausted.

"With the foresaid exceptions, the mine in question, where it traverses the pursuer's property, is cut through strata which undoubtedly belong to him. That mine may be used for the conveyance of coals to the surface, the produce of the three parcels of land belonging to him, but no coal from other lands can be conveyed along those parts of that mine.

No. 10.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Blair v. Ramsay, &c.

The Alloa Coal Company reclaimed.

Argued for the reclaimers;—It was now established by the case of Duke of Hamilton v. Graham that the right of the superior to reserved minerals was not of the nature of a right to remove a loose stone on the surface which right was exhausted with the removal of the stone. The superior's right to reserved minerals was a right of property in the mineral strata, which remained after the minerals were removed, and he could therefore use the space which was occupied by the minerals for any lawful purpose.[1] A right of property in coal could not be construed so strictly as to limit the right to seams which happened to be marketable. There were always coal strata not considered fit for the market, but which were the property of the proprietor of the coal, and which he was entitled to use for any purpose he pleased. In short, he was the proprietor of the whole coal measures. The reservation must be interpreted according to the circumstances in which it was made.[2] When the pursuer's lands were feued off, the minerals under Mr Ramsay's lands had been worked as a continuous coal-field; and it was reasonable to hold that the parties intended that they should continue to be so worked. Otherwise the result would be that, if the proprietor of a large estate feued it out in small parcels, reserving the minerals in each, he could not work the minerals in any one feu except by sinking a pit in that feu. Separatim, so far as the lands acquired in 1827 were concerned, the superior's plenum dominium in everything below the surface was clear.[3]

Argued for the pursuer;—The superior could not claim a right of property in the strata not specially reserved. The question, then, was whether he had any right of the nature of servitude which entitled him to make a mine through strata not reserved, for any purpose except that of removing the reserved minerals. The decision in Duke of Hamilton v. Graham proceeded on the ground that there was no trespass by the Duke on Mr Graham's property. The coal under Mr Graham's lands was the property of the Duke, and he was accordingly found entitled to use the coal wastes for any purpose he pleased. A right of servitude, on the contrary, could only be exercised for the specific purposes for which it was constituted.[4]

At advising,—

LORD ORMIDALE.—This case raises some questions of nicety and importance, and in order to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion regarding them it is necessary to ascertain what is the true nature and effect of the rights reserved in the three several titles under and in virtue of which the pursuer's lands are held by him.

The titles referred to are dated respectively in 1825, 1827, and 1857; and, although the clause of reservation is not expressed in all of them in precisely the

---

"Such being the view which the Lord Ordinary takes of the decision in the case of the Duke of Hamilton, both in the House of Lords and in the Court below (7 Macph. 976), he has pronounced decree under the second declaratory conclusion in favour of the pursuer, subject to the limitations above referred to."

[1] Duke of Hamilton v. Graham, July 28, 1871, 9 Macph. H. L. 98, 43 Scot. Jur. 491, L. R. 2 Scot. App. 166; Proud v. Bates, May 1865, 34 L. J. (N. S.) Ch. 406; Davidson v. Duke of Hamilton, May 15, 1822, 1 S. 411.

[2] Eadon v. Jeffcock, June 11, 1872, L. R. 7 Exch. 379.

[3] Hext v. Gill, July 1872, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 699.

[4] Turner v. Ballandene, March 29, 1834, 7 W. and S. 163; Bowser v. M'Lean, November 1860, 30 L. J. (N. S.) Ch. 273; Dand v. Kingscote, 1840, 6 M. and W. 174.

No. 10.

Oct. 22, 1875.
Blair v. Ramsay, &c.

same words, it does not appear to me that there is any such difference as to affect materially the conclusion that should be come to.

In 1825 the pursuer acquired from a predecessor of the defender, Mr Wardlaw Ramsay, the lands of Langour, but in the titles under and in virtue of which the lands so acquired are now held by the pursuer, there is an express reservation of "the coals and coal-heughs of the said haill lands, to be won and disposed upon by me and my foresaids at our pleasure." It neither was, nor could be, disputed, having regard to the rule of law, as generally stated by Mr Bell in his Principles (sec. 987), and to the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Graham (Law Reports, Scotch Appeals, vol. 2, p. 166), as well as to some of the English cases referred to at the discussion, that the coals and coal-heughs thus reserved continued to belong, as a proprietary right, to the defender, Mr Ramsay's, predecessor, and his heirs and successors, in a sense, as full and unlimited as did the lands of Langour themselves before the conveyance of them by him to the pursuer; and neither was it, nor could it well have been disputed, that along with the reserved coals and coal-heughs there was likewise reserved the right to work and bring them to the surface for the purpose of being disposed of, anything defective or obscure in this respect in the terms of the reservation itself being supplied by implication, inasmuch as an absolute right to the coal, infers, independently of express stipulation, a right to work and make it available.

But, on the other hand, I think that this reserved right to work and carry away the coal was not of the nature of a proprietary right, but rather of the nature of a privilege, servitude, or easement.

And it also appears to me to be clear that this privilege, servitude, or easement must be held to be limited to the coal and other reserved minerals of the lands conveyed, and does not apply to the rest of the coal-field held in lease by the defenders, the Alloa Coal Company, from the proprietor, the other defender, Mr Wardlaw Ramsay. This, I think, is the only interpretation the terms of the reservation admit of; and that it is the true legal interpretation is sufficiently established by the cases of Turner v. Ballandene or M'Whannell, 29th March 1834 (7 Wilson and Shaw's Appeals, p. 163), and Bowser v. M'Lean, 30 Law Journal, Chan. p. 273). The case of Davidson v. the Duke of Hamilton (15th May 1822, 1 Shaw, 411), cited by the defenders as an authority to the contrary, turned upon what was held to be the effect of the special terms of the reservation in that case, and is so remarked upon and distinguished by the Lord Chancellor in Turner v. Ballandene.

In regard to that portion of his lands consisting of three acres of Westquarter acquired by the pursuer in 1827 under the contract of excambion referred to in the second article of the condescendence, the same considerations are, I think, equally applicable, although the terms of the reservation are in some respects different. By that contract there was expressly reserved to the defender, Mr Ramsay's predecessor, his heirs and successors, "the whole coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals within the said three acres of the lands of Westquarter hereby disponed, with power to search for, work, and carry away the same, they always paying the said James Blair and his foresaids all damages which may be done to the said lands by the said workings, as these damages shall be ascertained by two arbiters to be mutually chosen." It is true that the reservation here is more comprehensive than in the deed of 1825, inasmuch as in place of it being limited to "coal and coal-heughs," it refers, in addition, to "stone quarries and all other metals and minerals;" but I do not see how this can affect the judgment, for it must be taken as an ascertained fact in the case that "the strata through which the mine passes, other than the coal, consists chiefly of shale and sandstone, and is of no marketable value." Such is the report of Mr Simpson, the engineer to whom it was remitted by the Lord Ordinary, of consent of all parties, to examine into and report upon all the facts necessary for the determination of the disputed questions; and not only was the remit to Mr Simpson made of consent of all parties, but his report has been received without objection, and assumed by all parties to be correct and conclusive as to the facts embraced by it. The result is that, although the clause of reservation in the deed of 1827 is differently expressed, and more comprehensive than that in the deed of 1825, both may, for the purposes of the judgment, be held, I think, to be to the same effect—viz., a reservation of the coal, and nothing else, it turning out that there is nothing else in the pursuer's lands which can in any reasonable sense be held to fall within the reservation. At the same time, it may be right, as afterwards suggested by me, to frame the judgment so as to meet the possible event of reserved substances other than coal being present in the pursuer's lands. Be this, however, as it may, no distinction at least can be taken between the deed of 1827 and that of 1825 as regards the legal nature and effect of the rights reserved. In the former, while a full right of property in the coals and coal-heughs is reserved, with a right also,—not of the nature of property, but of privilege, servitude, or easement,—of working and bringing the coals to the surface, so in the latter, while a full right of property in the coal, stone quarries, and all other metals and minerals is reserved, there is added the right not of property, but of privilege, servitude, or easement of working and bringing them to the surface.

In regard to the remaining, or third portion of lands acquired by the pursuer, the same conclusions must be come to, with perhaps even less hesitation than in the two former instances, seeing that here the reservation is limited simply and exclusively to coal, with full power to "dig for, work, win, and carry away the same on paying the surface damages which the ground may thereby sustain."

It only requires further to be noticed that, according to Mr Simpson's report, and especially the plans thereiñ referred to, not only the strata intervening between the seams of coal in the pursuer's lands are entirely worthless, but that they occupy a space greatly larger than the seams of coal themselves, the consequence being that it is impossible for the defenders to take up by the mine or level already formed, or by any other mine or level that can be formed in the pursuer's lands, coal or other substances from the grounds outside the boundaries of the pursuer's lands, without passing through ground or strata which in no view can be held to belong to them except for the special purpose only of working and bringing to the surface the coal or other reserved minerals situated within the limits of the pursuer's lands.

Such being the nature and effect of the rights of the defender, Mr Ramsay, reserved in the titles granted to the pursuer of the lands in question, it does not appear to me that the matters to be determined are attended with serious difficulty.

I am therefore of opinion—

(1) That the right to coal-heughs, stone quarries, and other metals and minerals reserved in the titles of the pursuer, is one of property as full and

No. 10.
Oct. 22, 1875.
Blair v. Ramsay, &c.

unlimited as is the right otherwise of the pursuer himself to the lands acquired by him.

(2) That the coal or other wastes created by the removal or exhaustion of the substances, the property of which was reserved to the defender, Mr Ramsay, his heirs and successors, belong in the same way in plenum dominium to them; and,

(3) That in regard to the power of carrying to the surface the reserved coal and others no proprietary right is reserved, but merely a right of the nature of a privilege, servitude, or easement, and that this right is applicable only to the coal and other substances, the full property of which is reserved in the pursuer's titles, and does not extend to the rest of the coal-field.

In this state of matters, and with reference to the opinion I have just expressed, it appears to me that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is well founded, and ought to adhered to, with a slight variation on that part of it which excepts from the interdict the "coal wastes," to the effect of including in the exception, in addition to "coal wastes," wastes that may be created by the removal of any of the other reserved substances. I think it right that this variation should be made on the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor to meet the possible, although, I think, improbable, contingency of it yet turning out that such reserved substances are found to be in the pursuer's lands.

Lord Neaves and Lord Gifford concurred.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur. I doubt whether it would be worth while to vary the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I think we should simply adhere.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the Alloa Coal Company against Lord Mackenzie's interlocutor of 14th April 1875, refuse said note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of, with expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Remit to the Auditor to tax said expenses, and to report: And remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary, with power to decern for the expenses now found due."

Gibson-Craig, Dalziel, & Brodies, W.S.—Maclachlan & Rodger, W.S.—Alex. Morison, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 11.
Oct. 25, 1875.
Minister v. Heritors of Kilmalcolm.

Rev. Alexander Leck, Minister of the Parish of Kilmalcolm, Pursuer.—Balfour.

The Heritors of the Parish of Kilmalcolm, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Asher.

Teinds—Stipend—Augmentation—Value of Feu-Duties.—In an application by a minister for augmentation of stipend, held that the revenue derived from portions of the glebe feued under the Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866, was not to be taken into account in determining whether or not an augmentation should be granted.

Teind Court.
Teind Clerk.

This was an action of augmentation of stipend brought by the minister of the parish of Kilmalcolm. The last augmentation was granted in 1854, and raised the stipend to 17 chalders. The minister asked a farther increase of 5 chalders.

The glebe extended to 11½ acres. In 1867 the minister applied to the Court of Teinds for authority to feu the glebe under the Glebe Lands

No. 11.

Oct. 25, 1875. Minister v. Heritors of Kilmalcolm.

(Scotland) Act, 1866. This application was granted after the statutory procedure. In virtue of the power to feu thus granted two feus were given out extending together to 2¾ acres, and giving a net return to the minister of £45, 6s. 8d., after deduction of interest on preliminary expenses. The remainder of the glebe remained unfeued.

It was objected for the heritors that the amount of feu-duties received from the glebe must be taken into consideration in determining whether an augmentation ought to be granted or not, and that in that view the augmentation asked was excessive.

Argued for the minister;—Prior to the date of the Act of 1866 it was decided that the value of the glebe was only to be taken into account in questions of augmentation where that value was materially in excess of the usual value, but not otherwise. This could only be so where there was something exceptional in the history of the glebe. Such was the fact in the Blair Atholl case,[1] where the parish was composed of four united parishes, and the minister had retained all four glebes, and had, besides, excambed one of them with the principal heritor for a piece of much more valuable ground. Even in that case there was a very strong minority of the Court of opinion that the value of the glebe should not be taken into account. The Glebe Lands Act of 1866 was not intended to relieve the heritors, but to benefit the minister. One thing of which the minister had to satisfy the Court before he could obtain authority to feu was as to "the grounds on which the petitioner submits that benefit will arise to the minister and his successors in office by authority to feu or lease being granted."[2] It could be of no benefit to his successors, if, as soon as the glebe, or any part of it, was feued, it became a ground for refusing an augmentation which was otherwise justly due. This view had been taken in the case of glebes feued under private Acts prior to the general Act of 1866. As, for instance, in the case of the Barony Parish of Glasgow, where, in 1867, an augmentation of 12 chalders was granted, though the minister derived £395 a-year from feus. So also in the case of St Cuthbert's Parish, Edinburgh, where, in 1862, an augmentation of 4 chalders was granted to each minister, though the first minister derived £256 and the second minister £246 a-year from feus.

Argued for the heritors;—The heritors consented to an augmentation of 2 chalders, and, if there were no element of special value in the benefice to be taken into account, would consent to more. But the principle being settled,[3] that wherever the glebe was one of exceptional value, that value was to be taken into consideration in questions of augmentation, there was no reason for excepting this case from the general rule, and laying out of sight the exceptional value of the glebe because it was in part derived from feu-duties. This glebe was not, perhaps, of special extent, but it had the special quality of feuing capacity which neighbouring parishes had not. In the hands of the heritors the glebe would now have been of the same feuing value as it was to the minister, and there were no grounds for saying that they should not get the benefit of that feuing value as they would have of exceptional agricultural value. The policy of the Court was to place ministers in the same neighbourhood as much as possible on a footing of equality. This feuing value of his glebe was just what distinguished the position of the minister in the present case from that of his neighbours, and therefore that value must be taken into account in determining whether he was entitled to an augmentation or not.

[1] Stewart v. Lord Glenlyon, May 20, 1835, 13 S. 787, 7 Scot. Jur. 365.
[2] 29 and 30 Vict. c. 71, sec. 9.
[3] Minister of Old Deer v. Heritors, Nov. 23, 1808, F.C.; Stevenson v. Duke of Buccleuch, Nov. 21, 1827, Shaw's Teind Ca. 137.

No. 11.

Oct. 25, 1875.
Minister v. Heritors of Kilmalcolm.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The present stipend of this charge is seventeen chalders. The minister asks an augmentation of five chalders. The heritors oppose this as an excessive demand, and on one ground in particular, namely, that the glebe is of special value.

If the value of the glebe arose from purely agricultural produce there is not much doubt that supposing that value to be at all markedly in excess of the ordinary agricultural value of glebes in Scotland we should be bound by the Blair Atholl case and a variety of others to take that value into consideration in determining whether or not we should grant an augmentation.

But the peculiarity of this case is, that any excess in the value of the glebe is caused by a portion of it having been feued out in virtue of the Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866. Under that statute, in the year after it was passed, this minister presented a petition to the Court for authority to feu his glebe, and what he had to establish to the satisfaction of the Court—and what I must assume he did establish, as he succeeded in his application—was, inter alia, that there were no reasonable objections arising from considerations on behalf of adjoining heritors, or on behalf of the benefice, and that benefit would accrue not to himself only but to his successors in the benefice.

The glebe consists of 11½ acres, and of these the minister has succeeded in feuing out 2¾ acres, which give him a net return of about £45 a-year. The proposal of the heritors is that we should count this as part of his ordinary stipend, and take it into account in determining whether or not he should be granted an augmentation.

This raises a question of considerable general importance, namely, whether the matter is to be determined by the principle accepted in the Blair Atholl case, or whether it does not rather fall under the principle applied to the cases in which private mortifications have been made for the benefit of the minister of a parish. In such cases of private mortifications it has been the universal practice to leave the amount out of consideration in questions of augmentation of stipend, on the ground that the opposite course would directly defeat the donor's end, and benefit not the benefice and the incumbent for the time being, but the heritors.

The statute under which alone the authority of the Court could be obtained to feu this glebe was undoubtedly a statute passed to benefit the existing minister and his successors in the charge. And it appears to me that if we were to adopt the view advanced for the heritors the practical result would be, not to benefit the minister and his successors, but to benefit the heritors where they have rights to their teinds, and the titular where they have not. In short, the effect would be to give relief to the heritors and titular in proportion as the glebe is feued out. That was certainly not the purpose of the statute. The intention of the statute would, by such a course, be as completely defeated as that of the founder of a mortification would be by our taking the annual produce of his mortification into consideration in a question of augmentation. There is no answer that I can see to this argument for the minister, and I am therefore for not taking into consideration the value of the feus.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, LORD MURE, and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT granted an augmentation of four chalders.

J. B. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—Agents.

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

ANDREW JACK, Pursuer.—Campbell Smith—Rhind.
REV. DR JAMES BEGG AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Jameson.
REV. DR JAMES BEGG AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Jameson.
ANDREW JACK, Defender.—Campbell Smith—Rhind.

Property—Gable—The customary rule according to which the owner of one of several adjoining lots of ground feued or sold for building a continuous street is entitled to erect his gable to the extent of one-half its thickness upon the adjoining lot without consent of the proprietor, and to be reimbursed half the cost of the gable by that proprietor when he comes to use the gable, proceeds on implied contract inferred from a feuing plan or other circumstances, and where there are no facts from which an implied contract can be inferred (as in rural or villa subjects), no such rule exists, and the builder of a tenement must build it entirely upon his own ground.

Property—Mutual Gable.—A proprietor of a piece of ground in the suburbs of Edinburgh, without consent of the conterminous proprietor, and pending unsuccessful negotiations as to the terms on which consent should be given, took down an old mutual garden wall between the subjects, and erected on the site a gable of four stories. Held, in an action of declarator and removal against him at the instance of the conterminous proprietor, that the defender's operations were illegal, but that the Court had the power to impose equitable conditions on which the gable should be allowed to stand, and that in the circumstances the use of the gable by the pursuer, when he came to build on his own ground, without payment, would be a sufficient indemnification for the use which had been taken without agreement of his ground.

Reparation—Interdict.—Held that a person could not claim damages for being prevented by interdict from proceeding with a building which it was ultimately found that he had no right to erect, although the interdict was recalled as not being the proper remedy in the circumstances.

(SEE process of Interdict between the same parties, reported ante, vol. i. p. 366.)

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. I.

The circumstances which led to these actions were as follows:—Dr Begg and others, as trustees for the deacons' court of Newington Free Church, were proprietors of a piece of ground in Causewayside, Edinburgh, available for building. Mr Jack was the proprietor of the immediately adjoining ground to the north. Down to 1873 the properties were separated by a mutual garden wall, about 8 feet high, erected about a century before, when the district was in a rural condition.

In February 1873 Mr Jack began to erect a building of three or four stories on his ground, the south gable of which extended along the line of the old wall, part of which he removed to make way for the gable. Soon after he commenced operations he was warned by the Newington Free Church deacons' court that he was encroaching on their property. They did not, however, insist on his immediately desisting, and about two months was spent by the parties in trying to arrange terms on which the deacons' court might give their consent to Mr Jack's operations. Meanwhile Mr Jack proceeded with the erection of the gable. The negotiations failed, and on 10th May 1873, when the gable was nearly finished, Dr Begg and others, as trustees for the deacons' court, presented a petition to the Sheriff to ordain Jack to restore the wall to its former height, and for interim interdict against proceeding with the building. The Sheriff-substitute granted interim interdict as craved, and on 26th November 1873, after a proof, he ordained Jack to take down the gable, and reduce the same to the height of the original wall. Jack appealed to the Court of Session, who, on 10th January 1874, recalled the interdict,

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

and dismissed the petition, on the ground that the application for interdict was too late.[1] The building, which had been stopped since the interim interdict granted on 10th May 1873, was then resumed.

On 15th April 1874 Jack raised an action of damages against the trustees for the deacons' court, concluding for £360, the loss sustained by him, as he alleged, in consequence of the defenders having "wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause," obtained and kept up the interdict against him.

In defence the trustees pleaded (1) that the action was not relevant.

On 2d June 1874 they raised an action against Jack, concluding—(First), for declarator that the pursuers were proprietors of all and whole the subjects situated in Causewayside, Edinburgh, &c., as described in their titles; (second), for declarator "that the wall which formerly separated the subjects above described from the property lying immediately to the north thereof, presently belonging to the defender, was mutual property, and that the defender had no right to deal with the same as his exclusive property, and that he was not entitled to remove the same, or to make other erections on the site thereof, without the consent of the pursuers;" (third), to have the defender decerned and ordained "to restore the said wall, so far as the same has been removed by him, to its original height and condition;" or otherwise, (fourth), "to remove the gable wall built by him on the site of the said old wall, so far as it is of greater height than said old wall, and to the south of what was the centre line of the said old wall;" or (fifth), "in the event of the defender not being decerned and ordained to restore said wall to its original condition, in terms of one or other of the two immediately preceding conclusions hereof, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £500 in name of damages."

In the action at the instance of the church trustees against Mr Jack the Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, and subsequently pronounced the following interlocutors:—

"18th December 1874.—Finds (1) that the pursuers are proved by their titles to be proprietors of the subjects in Causewayside described in the first conclusion of the summons, and therefore decerns and declares in terms of that conclusion: Finds (2) that the wall which formerly separated said subjects from the property lying immediately to the north thereof, presently belonging to the defender, was mutual property, and being such, that the defender was not entitled to deal with the same as his exclusive property, and in particular, to remove the said wall, or to make other erections on the site thereof, without the express or implied consent of the pursuers, and to this extent and effect decerns and declares in terms of the second conclusion of the summons: Quoad ultra finds, as matters of fact—1. that in February 1873 the defender began to clear out the foundations of the tenement which has since been erected by him, and the south gable of which stretches across the site of the boundary wall referred to in the second conclusions of the summons; 2, that the intention of the defender, when he began his operations, was to erect the said gable upon ground which was his own property, including therein the northern half of the site of the said wall; 3, that after operations were begun the defender became desirous to change his plan, so as to include in the site of the foundation of the said gable the whole site of the said wall; and accordingly he, on 24th February 1873, addressed to the pursuers the letter which is No. 54 of process, wherein, on condition that he was 'allowed to occupy the piece of ground whereon is built the present boundary wall, and that he was relieved of all responsibility of [1] Begg, &c. v. Jack, January 10, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 366.

No. 12.
Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

protecting, shoring up, and repairing any damage to the schoolhouse there, which may be required on account of operations,' he offered 'to build a mutual wall four stories high, with all necessary vents and wall presses, according to plan which will be submitted, and to make no charge for same to said deacons' court;' 4, that the offer thus made was not accepted by the pursuers as given, the pursuers requiring that in addition to the things conceded by the defender, he, as expressed in the letter of their agent, Mr John Auld, W.S., dated 26th February 1873, No. 13 of process, should 'take on himself all responsibility of protecting or shoring the schoolhouse or other buildings, and repairing all damage that may be done by his operations, and paying the whole expense of writings, &c., necessary to carry the arrangement out, and make it effectual;' 5, that this counter proposal was not accepted by the defender, but a part of the said wall, though shored up by the defender, having on 2d March 1873 fallen down partly in consequence of natural decay, and partly in consequence of the attempt to underfoot the northern half of said wall on which the defender had for some days previously been engaged, the defender removed the remains of the said wall the whole length of his intended gable, and upon the site of that portion thereof, extending in breadth to twenty inches or thereby, and on other ground seven inches broad, forming part of his property contiguous to the wall, he proceeded to erect, and erected, the said gable as it now stands; 6, that from the time when the defender began to build upon the pursuers' half of the site of the said wall, and in particular from the time when the gable had been raised higher than what had been the height of the said wall, the pursuers warned the defender that he was encroaching upon their property, and that if he so persevered without coming to terms with them measures would be taken for the vindication of their rights; 7, that the terms upon which the pursuers' consent to the erection of the said gable would be given never were arranged between the parties, the pursuers on the one hand insisting for more than had been offered by the defender in said letter of 24th February 1873, No. 54 of process, and the defender, on the other hand, not only refusing to concede these terms, but withdrawing the offer originally made that the gable when erected should become mutual property, without contribution by the pursuers on account of the cost; 8, that notwithstanding the variance of views by which an agreement was prevented, both the pursuers and the defender desired and expected that in the end an agreement would be concluded, the defender carrying forward the erection of said gable, and the pursuers refraining from the adoption of measures by which its erection should be stopped in consequence of the feeling so entertained till the gable was all but completed; and, 9, that ultimately, and on or about the 10th of May 1873, the defender was interdicted on a warrant granted by the Sheriff of Midlothian, at the instance of the pursuers, from proceeding further with the erection of said gable; but this interdict, on an appeal, was recalled, in the Court of Session, on or about the 10th of January 1874, and immediately thereafter operations were resumed, and the wall was completed, as it now stands, without further operation: Finds in point of law, the facts of the case being as above set forth (1) that the pursuers are not entitled to insist that the said gable shall be taken down, if reasonably indemnified for the use that has been taken of their ground; (2) that the defender is bound to make reasonable indemnification to the pursuers for the ground belonging to them, upon which in part his said gable has been erected; and (3) that the defender having originally offered to build the said gable as a mutual gable without charging any portion of the cost against the pursuers, the adoption of this as the condition on which the

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

said gable is to be left as erected will not be unfair to him, and will be full satisfaction or indemnification to the pursuers for the use which has been taken without agreement with them of a portion of their ground for its erection, and appoints the cause to be enrolled that parties may be heard as to the application of these last findings to the remaining conclusions of the summons, reserving meantime all questions of expenses."*

* "NOTE.—The first and second conclusions of this action had ceased, before the proof was closed, to be matters of controversy. The other conclusions, however, were keenly contested; and the Lord Ordinary has adopted, and has expressed in his findings, results which were presented neither by the pursuers nor by the defender. On the one hand, the pursuers, in their argument upon the proof, sought that decree in terms of the first and second conclusions of the summons should at once be pronounced, and that the action quoad ultra should be left undisposed of for the present, that it might by-and-by be conjoined with an action of damage for interdict alleged to have been wrongously obtained by the pursuers when the erection of the gable referred to was all but completed. This course the Lord Ordinary has not adopted, because in his opinion the conclusions of the present action ought to be exhausted, if that can reasonably be accomplished, without reference to these proceedings in another suit. On the other hand, the defender urged that though his conduct in using the pursuers' ground in the erection of his gable was not strictly legal, the gable must be allowed to stand, and become his property, should the value of the ground belonging to the pursuers, on which in part it has been erected, be paid to the pursuers, this value, according to the estimate of one of the pursuers' witnesses, who is the only witness by whom evidence on the subject is given, being only £15. This view of the course to be followed the Lord Ordiuary has also set aside. If anything is plain in this case, it seems to be that the defender, by using the ground belonging to the pursuers in the way he did, cannot make it his own, or compel the pursuers to sell it to him. They are entitled to retain what is theirs, and the only question of practical importance which has to be decided is, what, in the circumstances, are the terms on which the property should remain with them, and the gable which was erected by the defender partly upon that property be permitted to remain? The Lord Ordinary says this, because, if the facts are as have been found, the pursuers, as he thinks, are precluded from insisting that the gable shall be taken down, and a facsimile of the old boundary wall erected, provided that all which they can reasonably ask for the use which has been taken of the ground shall be rendered. The pursuers saw the gable in the course of erection, and though they gave warnings, yet these appear to have been given rather for the purpose of bringing the defender to their terms than to prevent its erection. They, in truth, were not anxious that the gable should not be built; and, accordingly, it was only when the building was all but finished that the interdict which has given occasion to the counter action was sought.

"The terms to which the pursuers are entitled, and which may be imposed on the defender, have been to the Lord Ordinary the cause of some anxiety; but he in the end has come to think, in the first place, that the result at which he has arrived has legal warrant in the facts of the case; and that, in the second place, what has been given as amends is full indemnification to the pursuers, and not unreasonable satisfaction to be rendered by the defender. As to the first of these points, if the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that though this ground is the property of the pursuers, and was built on without agreement with them, they in the circumstances are not entitled to insist that the gable shall be removed, it follows almost as a necessary consequence that it must be in the power of the Court to fix the terms on which it shall be permitted to stand. Regarding the second point, a few words of explanation are all that are required. The value of the gable has not been proved; but it is perfectly certain that the acquisition without payment of a mutual right in that gable is worth all the inconvenience, and the loss and damage of every kind, which the pursuers have suffered or can suffer through its erection. The only doubt which

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

"24th March 1875.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators as to the application of the findings set forth in the interlocutor of 18th December 1874, to the third, fourth, and fifth conclusions of the summons, being the conclusions which are still undisposed of, and having considered the debate and whole process,—Primo, In respect of the findings relative to matters of fact contained in the said interlocutor, and in particular of the sixth, seventh, and eighth of these findings, refuses the pursuers' motion, for decree in terms either of the third conclusion or alternatively of the fourth conclusion of the summons, and assoilzies the defender from both of these conclusions, and decerns: Secundo, On the pursuers' motion, decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £15 sterling, as damages to the pursuers in the premises, in terms of the fifth conclusions of the summons: Tertio, Finds no expenses due to or by either the pursuers or the defender, and decerns."*

In the action at the instance of Mr Jack against the church trustees, the former proposed the following issue:—"Whether the defenders, by means of an interdict wrongfully obtained on or about 10th May 1873, prevented the pursuer from proceeding with the building of the gable of a house on ground situated in or near the east side of Causewayside, Edinburgh, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

The Lord Ordinary on 24th March 1875, pronounced the following the Lord Ordinary felt is whether the indemnification given is not a greater burden than should be imposed on the defender. But when it is considered that the defender originally offered what has now been found due, and that he, by persevering in the course upon which he entered, despite repeated warnings from the pursuers, has obtained all the advantages which he could have secured if the offer he made at the outset had been accepted, or had not been withdrawn, most will be disposed to conclude that the terms are not unreasonable, being such as are naturally suggested as well as recommended by the real facts of the case, as these have been established in the proof."

---

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary hoped, from what was said at the bar on more than one occasion, that there would have been an agreement by which further litigation in this as well as in the action of damages at the instance of the present defender against the present pursuers would have been prevented. But though there have been some concessions made upon both sides, several of the points and claims in dispute remain subjects of contention, and in consequence it has become necessary that an ultimate judgment should be given by the Lord Ordinary in both suits.

"The first and second conclusions of the summons in the present action having been disposed of by the interlocutor of 18th December 1874, the third, fourth, and fifth conclusions were those alone which at the recent debate were open for consideration before the Lord Ordinary. The pursuers moved for decree in terms either of the third conclusion, or alternatively of the fourth conclusion; and also for decree for the sum decerned for in the foregoing interlocutor, in terms of the fifth conclusion. The Lord Ordinary thinks that his findings in the interlocutor of 18th December precluded him from granting the first part of this motion, but there was no obstacle to the granting of the second part, especially as this was consented to by the defender, and accordingly damages to the extent of £15 have been awarded to the pursuers. This sum, it may be explained, represents the injury done to conterminous buildings on the pursuers' ground by operations connected with the erection of the gable wall in dispute, carried out by the defender in such a way as to render the defender liable in reparation.

"Expenses have been found due to neither party, because, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, success and failure have as nearly as possible been equally divided."

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

interlocutor:—"Finds that there is no issuable matter on record: Therefore sustains the first of the defender's pleas in law" (irrelevancy), "dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

Mr Jack reclaimed against the interlocutors in both actions.

The two actions were debated and advised together in the Inner-House.

Argued for Mr Jack (in the action of declarator);—By a well established custom a proprietor in a town was entitled to erect his gable to the extent of one half upon the property of his neighbour, that neighbour getting the benefit of the gable when he came to build, upon paying half the cost of erection. The first builder was not bound to give notice to his neighbour or to obtain his consent. Nor did the existence of an old mutual wall affect the question. Either proprietor was entitled to heighten the mutual wall without the other's consent, otherwise the result would be that the first builder in a line of street would settle for all time coming the utmost height to which the houses could be built.[1] (2) Even if the defender had not an abstract legal right to erect the gable as he had done, it was erected with the knowledge and acquiescence of the pursuers, and their present demands were unreasonable.

(In the action of damages)—The recall of the interdict by the Court was sufficient to found an action of damages for wrongful interdict.[2] In such an action it was not necessary for the pursuer to aver or prove malice.[3] If the Court were of opinion that malice must enter the issue a general averment of malice in the record was sufficient.[4]

Argued for the Rev. Dr Begg and others (who were not called upon to reply upon the question of Mr Jack's legal right to erect the gable);—Mr Jack was claiming damages for being prevented from doing what was now found to be an illegal act. Even apart from this, in cases relating to real property, an action would not lie against a party who had obtained an interdict causa cognita which was ultimately found to be groundless, unless it was averred that he had obtained the interdict by misrepresenta-

* "NOTE.—In the present action, damages are sued for as reparation for loss said to have been sustained by the pursuer through the granting of an interdict by the Sheriff of Mid-Lothian on the application of the defenders. The pursuer contends that he is bound neither to aver nor to prove malice; while the defenders, on the other hand, maintain, in the first place, that if an issue shall be granted, malice must be inserted; and, in the second place, that even were the pursuer willing to take an issue so expressed, no issue could be adjusted, inasmuch as malice has not been relevantly averred on the record. The Lord Ordinary has adopted, and, by the preceding interlocutor, has given effect to this last view of the case.

"It is quite true that the defenders, in applying for and in keeping up the interdict complained of, are alleged on record (Cond. Art. 4) to have acted 'wrongously, maliciously, and without probable cause.' But the Lord Ordinary thinks that the bare use of such epithets is not enough. There must also, in his opinion, be something which affords at least a colourable reason for their application. Here, however, what is required has not been afforded, the averments of the pursuer presenting nothing which can be regarded even as a pretext for characterising either the obtaining or the maintaining of the interdict granted by the Sheriff as a malicious proceeding. The plea of irrelevancy, therefore, has been sustained, and the action, as a consequence, dismissed."

[1] Lamont v. Cumming, June 11, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 784; see also Sanderson v. Geddes, July 17, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1198.

[2] Miller v. Hunter, March 23, 1865, 3 Macph. 740, 37 Scot. Jur. 381.

[3] Abel's Exrs. v. Edmonds, July 10, 1863, 1 Macph. 1061, 35 Scot. Jur. 627; Snare v. Duff, Dec. 10, 1850, 13 D. 286, 23 Scot. Jur. 119; Gilmour v. Anderson and Gilchrist, June 20, 1857, 29 Scot. Jur. 411.

[4] Baillie v. Hume and Adamson, Dec. 8, 1853, 16 D. 161, 26 Scot. Jur. 73.

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

tion of facts.[1] Cases like Miller v. Hunter, which arose upon contracts, had no application. In that case the landlord had, by an interdict, prevented the tenant from taking the use of the ground which he had contracted to give him by the lease, and therefore he was found liable in damages. The distinction between the two classes of cases was clearly pointed out in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis).

At advising,—

LORD GIFFORD.—In these two cases, the one an action of declarator at the instance of the Rev. Dr Begg and others against Mr Jack, and the other an action of damages for wrongous interdicting at the instance of Mr Jack, I concur in the results at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived; and in the action of declarator, in substance, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in the grounds upon which he has proceeded. The circumstances of the cases are very special, and it appears to me that the mode in which the Lord Ordinary has disposed of them is not only reasonable and equitable, but in entire accordance with the strict rules of law.

Although last in date, the leading action is the action of declarator, for it directly raises the questions between the parties as to their respective legal rights the determination of which is essential before any question of wrongous interdicting can be entered upon, and, in truth, the decision of the questions raised in the declarator will virtually decide the questions of law raised in the action of damages. For example, if it were held that the defender Jack even yet is bound to take down his gable, he could never be held entitled to damages for having been interdicted for a time in building it.

It is clear from the titles, and is no longer disputed by the defender Jack, that the old wall between his property and that of the pursuers, and upon the site of which the defender has now erected the gable of his tenement, was a mutual or party wall between him and the pursuers, and could only be dealt with as such. The defender admitted that the pursuers were entitled to decree in terms of their first declaratory conclusion and in terms of the first branch of their second declaratory conclusion.

But the defender maintained, and this contention lies at the foundation of the whole case, that he was entitled at his own hand, without the warrant and authority of any Court, and without the consent and against the remonstrances of the pursuers, to convert the mutual division wall which formed a mutual fence between the lands of the parties into a mutual gable four stories high, that is, that he was entitled by himself and against the will of the pursuers to build the gable of his new tenement to the extent of one-half upon the property of his neighbour.

Now, I am unable to assent to the proposition thus broadly and generally laid down. It is quite true that where adjoining lots of ground are feued or sold for the purpose of building a continuous street, the owner of any one of the lots in building his tenement constructs its gables one half upon the adjoining lots so as to be mutual gables, and then when these gables are taken advantage of or used by the neighbouring proprietors, they become bound to pay to the first builder half the value of the mutual gables so used by them. It is also true that very often, or in general, the builder of the first tenement builds the mutual gable partly upon his neighbour's ground without the express consent of that neighbour, or as it is expressed by the Lord President in Lamont v. Cumming, 11th June 1875,[1] "behind the back of the adjoining proprietor," who takes for granted that the mutual gable will be all right, and the want of express consent will not preclude the builder of the mutual gable from claiming half its value from his neighbour who comes to use it. But all this proceeds upon a tacit or implied contract inferred either from a feuing plan according to which the line of street is to be built, or from the special circumstances of each case. Where there is no room for such implied contract and implied consent the rule does not hold, and the builder of a tenement must build it, gable and all, entirely upon his own ground, unless he gets the consent of his neighbour.

[1] Moir v. Hunter, Nov. 16, 1832, 11 S. 32, 5 Scot. Jur. 103; Mudie v. Miln, June 12, 1828, 6 S. 967; Reid v. Bruce, July 11, 1855, 17 D. 1100, 27 Scot. Jur. 556.

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875. Jack v. Begg, &c. Begg, &c. v. Jack.

It was hardly contended that in proper rural subjects where the lands of the parties are divided by mutual fences, whether walls or hedges, the proprietor of one of the subjects can at any point he pleases, and without his neighbour's consent, remove the mutual fence or wall, and insist upon erecting a gable one half upon his neighbour's property. I think he has no such right, and that he cannot, without mutual consent, convert a mere garden or field division wall into a mutual gable. For example, in villa feuing, where each villa stands entirely in its own grounds, and the lots are divided by mere mutual garden walls, I do not think that the proprietor of one villa lot is entitled, without his neighbour's consent, to remove the garden division wall and erect a gable one half upon his neighbour's ground, and that at any spot he pleases, without any regard to the plans or wishes of his neighbour. This would be carrying the rights of mutual proprietors farther than has ever been done. In like manner, where even in a street a church has been built entirely within its own ground, I do not think that adjoining proprietors, apart from contract, express or implied, can insist upon building the gables of their houses one half upon ground belonging to the church, although the church and its proprietors can never take any benefit from such gables as mutual gables. Such a right may arise from contract, or even from implication, but it certainly does not exist at common law.

Now, in the present case, and looking to the titles of the parties, and to the whole circumstances as appearing from the proof, I am of opinion that the defender, Mr Jack, was not entitled, without the consent of the pursuers, and against their remonstrances, to build his gable one half upon the property of the pursuers. The mere existence of a mutual division wall gave no such right, and the express stipulation in the title seems inconsistent therewith. The title describes the walls, including the walls in question, to be "party walls between the deceased John Henderson of Leaston, his avenue and garden of his other house, and to be in all time thereafter upheld, beeted, and repaired, on his representatives, and his, the said William Miller, and his foresaids, their joint charges and expenses." This seems to be an obligation to maintain the wall as a mutual avenue or garden-wall, and to exclude the right of either proprietor changing it into a gable wall, as the present defender has claimed right to do. There is nothing in the position or character of the respective properties from which the right to erect a mutual gable on the site of this wall can be inferred.

In the next place, I think it is clear that the pursuers never consented, either expressly or by implication, to the gable in question being erected partly upon [1] Ante, vol. ii., p. 787.

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

their ground. On the contrary, I think that the correspondence and evidence shews that the pursuers all along objected and warned the defender that he was proceeding at his own risk, while at the same time they were negotiating terms of agreement or arrangement. No agreement, however, was ever come to, the parties having differed as to the responsibility for any damage which might be occasioned to the schoolroom. It was on the failure of these negotiations for arrangement that the pursuers on 10th May 1873 obtained interdict against the defender, stopping him from proceeding farther with the erection of the gable, but this interdict was not obtained until the gable was very nearly completed. It is plain, however, that the pursuers, although they delayed their application for judicial interdict till towards the end, never consented to the erection, but extrajudicially objected, and reserved all their rights.

The question of interdict was brought by appeal to this Court, when the First Division, on 10th January 1874, recalled the interdict and dismissed the pursuers' petition. But they did so, not upon a consideration of the rights of the parties, or upon the ground that the defender had a right to erect his gable one half upon the pursuers' ground—this question was never entered upon at all—but solely upon the ground that the interdict was too late. They held that in the circumstances interdict was "an inappropriate remedy." The Court were of opinion that a summary petition for interdict ought to be presented timeously, and before the erection complained of is finished; and if this is not done, from whatever cause, the parties must vindicate their right in another form, and not in a summary application of a mere possessory nature. But the Court gave no decision of any kind upon the present defender's right to erect the gable in question, or upon the farther question what are the interests of parties in the gable when erected. These questions are now raised, and competently raised, by the present action of declarator.

If I am right in the opinion I have expressed, that the defender Jack had no right to build the gable in question so as to encroach upon the property of the pursuers, and if the defender erected it at his own risk, and notwithstanding the opposition and warning of the pursuers, the logical result is that the Court might order it to be taken down and set back, and there are cases when this course, severe although it be, may be necessary to do justice between the parties; but in all such cases there is an equitable power vested in the Court in virtue of which, when the exact restoration of things to their former condition is either impossible or would be attended with unreasonable loss and expense, quite disproportionate to the advantage which it would give to the successful party, the Court can award an equivalent,—in other words, they can say upon what equitable conditions the building shall be allowed to remain where it is, although it has been placed there without legal right. This equitable power has often been exercised by the Court when slight encroachments have been made by a builder upon his neighbour's property, it being unreasonable in such cases to insist on the demolition of the whole building. An example of this occurred in the case cited in argument, Sanderson v. Geddes, 1 Rettie, 1198, but there are many other and stronger instances.

Now, in the present case, I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers "are not entitled to insist that the gable shall be taken down if reasonably indemnified for the use that has been taken of their ground," and this brings me to the question,—What, in the whole circumstances, will be reasonable indemnification? What are the equitable conditions on which the defender's

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

gable should be allowed to stand as it is, although he has unwarrantably encroached on the pursuers' ground?

Now, here I am of opinion that the finding of the Lord Ordinary is reasonable and proper in the circumstances. He finds that if the pursuers ever come to use the mutual gable in question they shall be entitled to do so without making any payment to the defender. The value of the half of the mutual gable I understand to be from £60 to £80.

I reach this result on several grounds. First, it was the defender's own original proposal. He offered to give the pursuers the use of the gable gratis if they would waive all questions as to the ground on which it was built, and although this proposal was not accepted by the pursuers, who asked an additional guarantee, and the negotiations for an agreement went on—still as the gable was allowed to go up, and is now to stand, I think it is quite fair to keep the defender to what he himself originally offered. The additional guarantee asked by the pursuers, and which alone prevented the agreement from being completed, turned out to be of no practical moment. Second, I think the condition is fair and reasonable in itself, and such as, apart altogether from the defender's own proposal, might have rightly and equitably been suggested and imposed by the Court. But, third, the same result is reached in another way, and on a legal ground. When a man builds upon the property of his neighbour, especially when he does so not by mistake, but with his eyes open, and in the face of warning, the rule applies inædificatum solo cedit—the building becomes the property of the owner of the land. No doubt, in general this owner is bound to make compensation to the builder in quantum lucratus, but this is a mere equitable rule applicable to a bona fide builder, and always subject to the control of the Court. Such compensation may be denied altogether to one who in mala fide, or in spite of warning, attempts to appropriate his neighbour's ground. In the present case, the gable to the extent of nearly a half has been built on the pursuers' land. It has been so built knowingly, and against remonstrance. It confers no present benefit on the pursuers. They are not now lucrati in any sense, and looking to the whole history of the proceedings I think it no more than equitable to declare that the pursuers, if they ever require to do so, may use the mutual gable, which stands half on their own land, without compensation. I think we can do this under the present summons and under the conclusion for removal and damages. Even without a conclusion for damages I think we could impose the condition now proposed, because it is the equitable condition in respect of which we abstain from ordering the gable to be set back.

This exhausts the leading case, and I have only to add that I think the Lord Ordinary has exercised a sound discretion in finding no expenses due to either party in this action.

The action of damages at the instance of Mr Jack must be considered and disposed of on its own grounds, although its merits to a large extent depend on the decision of the questions in the action of declarator. Here also, I think, the conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary has come is well founded, although I do not agree in the grounds upon which he has proceeded.

In the view which I take of the case it is not necessary to consider the form of issue, or to enter on any of the questions discussed at the bar as to whether in actions of damages for wrongous interdicting the pursuer is bound to prove malice or want of probable cause. All these questions seem to me to be super-

No. 12.
Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

seded, for I am of opinion that when the real nature and substance of this action is looked to there is no relevant or legal ground for damage at all. I may say, in passing, however, that if in cases of contract or implied contract, and in cases of property, a party is deprived of his legal rights by a wrongous interdict, he will in general be entitled to damages without proving either malice or want of probable cause.

In the present case damages are demanded because the pursuer in this action, Mr Jack, was prevented by the interdict from proceeding with the erection of the gable from 10th May 1873 to 10th January 1874. He maintains that the interdict was wrongful, and he says that this is proved by its having been recalled by this Court, and as the stoppage of the work caused him loss he claims compensation from the defenders.

Now, if the Court in recalling the interdict had decided that in point of law the pursuer Jack was entitled to build the gable as he was doing, one half or nearly one half, on the defenders' ground, and if in respect of this legal right they had recalled the interdict as wrongful, I do not doubt that this would have been conclusive between the parties, and that the pursuer would have been entitled to an issue of damages. But this is not at all the nature of the case. The Court did not find that Jack had right to erect the gable to the extent of one half, or to any extent, on the defenders' ground, and that was not the reason why the interdict was recalled. On the contrary, if your Lordships concur with the Lord Ordinary and affirm his judgment in the other action, as I think we should now do, then the Court is now to hold that Mr Jack had no right to build the gable as he did, and although the defenders were too late in their application for interdict, and were ultimately found not entitled to summary interdict, yet they were right in the main substance of their contention, and the pursuer's proceedings were wrongful throughout. The interdict was only recalled on a point of form. It was not the proper remedy,—it was inapplicable to the circumstances of the case. But in the declarator, which was the proper form and the proper remedy, Mr Jack has entirely failed, and been found in the wrong from the beginning. Mr Jack cannot possibly claim damages for being interdicted from doing that which it is now found he had no right to do at all, even although on a mere point of form or on a rule of process the interdict was recalled. To give him damages in such a case would be to reward him for wrongdoing, for he was the wrongdoer all the time although the other party made a mistake in their selection of a remedy. Suppose that the Court had ordered the gable to be removed, as it might have done, as an illegal erection, the pursuer could never have got damages because the defenders made an abortive attempt for a time to prevent its going up. The case is not really different, although the Court, instead of ordering the gable down, have imposed equitable conditions on which they have allowed it to stand.

Now, on this short ground, and not on the different, and I think somewhat narrow ground taken by the Lord Ordinary (in whose view as to the necessity of giving details as to malice, and explaining in what it consisted, I cannot concur), I think the action should be dismissed, and in this case I think the defenders are entitled to their expenses.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—While I do not feel myself called upon to differ from what I understand to be the opinion of the rest of the Court, I think it right to say

No. 12.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

that I have felt considerable difficulty as to a part of the proposed judgment. The pursuers of the action of declarator conclude for pecuniary damages, and pecuniary damages alone. Proof is allowed, and in the evidence £15 is brought out as the amount of damages for injury to the rest of the pursuers' property, and although there is not much evidence on the point, £15 seems also to be the amount of damages sustained by the pursuers by the encroachment on their property and on the division wall. Whether the pursuers are entitled, in place of pecuniary reparation for the encroachment on their property and mutual division-wall, which is the only mode of reparation they ask, and in regard to which alone the defender was called upon to address himself, to have it found that they are to have the benefit of the gable erected by the defender without contributing anything towards its expense, is not a question on which the pursuers ask for judgment in the record, or in regard to which there is any evidence whatever. This being so, I have some doubt whether it is competent for the Court to ignore the mode of redress which the pursuers have exclusively libelled, and to give them a different sort of remedy, viz., a finding to the effect that when they come to use the gable they will be entitled to do so without any payment whatever. And I rather think the Lord Ordinary must have felt the same difficulty as that now noticed by me, for he has not in his final and only operative judgment repeated the finding as to the use of the gable. But the equity of the case, as explained by Lord Gifford, is obviously so clearly with the pursuers, that I do not feel called on to differ from the rest of the Court in the judgment which they think to be right and competent in the circumstances. The defender Jack was clearly wrong in destroying the old division wall, and building a gable on the site without the consent of the pursuers, and without judicial authority. Apparently he thought he had a right to do so, but that he had not is made very clear by the unanimous decision of the Court in Dow and Gordon v. Harvey.[1]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I entirely concur in the whole of Lord Gifford's opinion. The difficulty suggested by Lord Ormidale does not much impress me. Our finding that the pursuers of the action of declarator will be entitled to the use of the gable when they come to build, without payment, is not a mere arbitrary or equitable assessment of damages. We find, in the first place, that the pursuers are not entitled to insist on the gable being taken down, that being too harsh a remedy. On the other hand, the right to repayment by the conterminous proprietor of half the cost of the gable can only arise, as Lord Gifford has explained, when the gable has been erected by implied contract. We find that the defender (Mr Jack) is not entitled to such repayment, and at the same time we find that the use of the gable by the pursuers when they come to build is sufficient indemnification for the use which the defender has taken of their ground.

Jameson, for pursuers, asked for an operative finding in terms of the third finding in law of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 18th December 1874.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think you may safely leave the matter upon the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, both of which will stand.

---

[1] Nov. 9, 1869, 8 Macph. 118, 42 Scot. Jur. 60.

No. 12.

IN the action at the instance of Mr Jack, the Court adhered, finding the defenders (Dr Begg and others) entitled to additional expenses.

IN the action at the instance of Dr Begg and others, the Court adhered, finding no expenses due.

Oct. 26, 1875.
Jack v. Begg, &c.
Begg, &c. v. Jack.

J. B. W. LEE, S.S.C.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 13.

HELEN THOMSON OR MABON, Pursuer and Petitioner.—Campbell Smith.
ROBERT CAIRNS, Defender and Respondent.—Rhind.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Mabon v. Cairns.

Process—Proof—Sheriff—Act of Sederunt 10th July 1839, sec. 83.—After a proof in an action of filiation had been closed, and judgment given for the defender by a Sheriff-substitute, the pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, and also lodged in process a petition for the examination of the pursuer's sister, which examination was allowed by the Sheriff. Held that the additional witness ought not, in the circumstances, to have been examined.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Roxburgh, &c.
M.

AN action of filiation and aliment was raised in the Sheriff Court of Jedburgh by Helen Thomson or Mabon against Robert Cairns.

In a proof before the Sheriff-substitute (Russell), the pursuer, Helen Mabon, deponed that the defender had had connection with her on three different occasions. On two of these occasions she deponed that her son, aged eleven, had seen them together, and that on a third occasion her sister was present in the field where the act was committed. The son was called as a witness, and deponed to having seen his mother and the defender together in somewhat suspicious circumstances on two occasions, but the sister was not called as a witness, and no explanation of her absence was given. After the case had been taken to avizandum, the pursuer presented a petition praying for the examination of her sister as an additional witness. The Sheriff-substitute (Russell) pronounced an interlocutor finding that the pursuer had failed to prove her case.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Pattison), who pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows the pursuer to adduce the witness Elizabeth Welsh, mentioned in the said petition, as a witness for the pursuer in reference to the matter also therein mentioned; and remits to the Sheriff-substitute to name an early diet for taking this evidence, and appoints the same, when taken, along with the process, to be transmitted to the Sheriff." *

The evidence of the additional witness having been taken the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it instructed by the proof that the defender is the father of the pursuer's illegitimate child mentioned in the libel: Finds that he is therefore liable in the inlying expenses and aliment sued for: Therefore decerns against him in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds him liable to the pursuer in the expenses of process: Allows an account thereof," &c.

---

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff has, but with much hesitation, pronounced the above interlocutor. The tendency of all Courts is not to exclude evidence unless a very stringent rule of Court forbids its admission. As the petition No. 5 was presented before the judgment on the proof was pronounced, it does not fall literally within the clause of the Act of Sederunt referred to by the defender. At the same time the Sheriff is sensible of the danger of anything which has a tendency to encourage carelessness or inattention in the leading of a proof. But as the request in this instance is only for the examination of one witness, limited to certain matters of fact, and as there seems to have been some miscarriage whereby she was not adduced at the proper time, occasioned by the state of the pursuer's health, he thinks that it is safer for the ends of justice to admit the evidence."

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Mabon v. Cairns.

The defender appealed, and argued that the Sheriff should not have allowed the additional witness to be examined ;[1] and that the pursuer had failed to prove her case.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the proof was completed on 1st February, and on the 18th of the same month the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor finding that it was not proved that the defender was the father of the child libelled. As the case then stood it was not altogether free from difficulty. I do not sympathise with the view stated by the Sheriff-substitute in his note—"There is something singularly painful in the thought that a son of such tender years should be brought as a witness to his mother's shame." I cannot see that because the witness is the illegitimate child of his mother that his evidence should be rejected. Nor do I think that the evidence of a child of that age is less reliable than of a person of more mature years. His being brought to speak to his mother's shame does not affect the question. Although the case was therefore a narrow one on the evidence I am disposed to agree with the Sheriff-substitute. Against his judgment an appeal was taken to the Sheriff, when the case assumed a different aspect. There was a petition presented to the Sheriff for the examination of an additional witness, and the Sheriff entertained it favourably.

The circumstances under which that witness was examined were very peculiar. The witness was a sister of the pursuer, and was called upon to speak to one of the occasions on which the parties were said to have had intercourse together. She was an important witness, and it was impossible that the pursuer or her agent should not have been aware, before the proof, that her evidence was material. They must also have known what she was able to prove, and yet they did not examine her, and closed their proof without her evidence. The admission of such a witness appears to me a very serious proceeding. It may be doubtful whether it falls under the Act of Sederunt of 1839, which requires very weighty reasons for such a course.

On the other hand, if the question does not fall under the Act of Sederunt, then this course must have been taken by the Sheriff in the course of his ordinary discretion. When the pursuer, being examined as a witness for herself, speaks of a person as being present on one of the occasions on which it is alleged intercourse took place, and that person is not called, the impression is irresistible that the person was not disposed to undertake to confirm the pursuer, more especially when the person referred to is so near a relative of the pursuer. But when at an after part of the proceedings the pursuer proposes to examine her sister after all, that does not remove the presumption that at the time she ought to have been called she was not willing to support the pursuer's statement on oath, but only raises an additional presumption that in the interval she has by some means or other been at last prevailed on to do so. Such evidence, I think, is altogether worthless, and I therefore lay it aside, and take up the case as it stood before the Sheriff-substitute. I am for reversing the Sheriff's interlocutor, and returning to that of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion with your Lordship. I think the [1] A. S. 10th July 1838, sec. 83 ; Drain v. Scott, Nov. 25, 1864, 3 Macph. 114, 37 Scot. Jur. 64.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Mabon v. Cairns.

Sheriff-substitute was right as the case stood before him. The pursuer's mother evidently gave honest testimony, but she did not confirm the pursuer's story. The only witness who could be said to confirm the pursuer was her son, who was ten years of age. Now, I agree with the observation of your Lordship, that a boy of ten years of age may be a very good witness, and that there is nothing in the remark that he was brought to speak to his mother's shame. But we must consider that his tender years gave the pursuer a facility of suggesting to him circumstances which she thought favourable, and which renders his testimony less satisfactory than that of an older person would have been. It is that which leads me to think his corroboration insufficient.

I also agree with your Lordship that the Sheriff ought not to have allowed the additional witness to be examined. I do not say that there was anything in the Act of Sederunt to make it incompetent. But, in the circumstances, there were strong grounds for holding that the truth could not be expected from her. If she was an important and reliable witness at all she was the most important witness for the pursuer in the case, and this could not but be known both to the pursuer and her agent. It was plain enough, therefore, that whatever she might say, her evidence could not be relied on.

For the same reason I think, supposing her evidence to be admissible, it is entitled to no weight. The case is thus less rather than more favourable for the pursuer than it was when before the Sheriff-substitute, who, I think, rightly disposed of it as it then stood.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—In this action of filiation the Sheriff-substitute has decided for the defender, and assoilzied. The Sheriff-principal has decided for the pursuer, and decerned for aliment. The question was, however, not presented to the Sheriff-principal under the same circumstances and on the same proof as to the Sheriff-substitute, since an additional witness, Elizabeth Welsh, half-sister of the pursuer, was examined after the Sheriff-substitute had pronounced his decision.

I have, not without some difficulty, arrived at the conclusion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, on the proof before him, was well founded. I have hesitated a little on this point, because the pursuer's evidence is distinct, if true, and is not absolutely without corroboration. But I do not feel justified in differing from the opinion which has now been given by your Lordship; and the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute, who saw and examined the witnesses, is also important, and entitled to some weight. The boy, James Laidlaw, was only eleven years of age when examined, and must have been little more than ten at the time of the occasion to which he speaks. He is the son of the pursuer, and his testimony—not given on oath, and not bearing directly on the question involved—seems scarcely sufficient to afford the necessary corroboration to the pursuer, a single witness of worse than doubtful character.

But it is said that the evidence of Elizabeth Welsh, taken on the 19th of April—the Sheriff-substitute's judgment having been on the 18th of February—1875, affords additional and sufficient confirmation of the pursuer. I am of opinion that under the circumstances, and having regard to the previous examination of witnesses, the judgment of the Sheriff-principal of 8th April 1875, allowing the pursuer to adduce the witness Elizabeth Welsh, was not well founded. I think it was wrong, under the circumstances, to admit that additional witness. It is not correct to speak of it as merely a question of competency. To some extent it is a question of judicial discretion. I do not say that the Sheriff could not have competently allowed the witness to be examined, if, in the circumstances, justice required her examination. But it was not so. No "weighty reason," such as was required by the Act of Sederunt, explaining why the witness had not been previously adduced, was stated to the Sheriff, or has now been stated to this Court. Both the pursuer and the defender were examined as witnesses for the pursuer, and both of them then mentioned the fact that the pursuer's sister was present at the carting in of the rakings in the field. The fact of the witness' presence was therefore known, and certainly any evidence she could give as to what occurred when she was present in that field must have been known to be more or less important. If it was important, she should have been adduced. No excuse was made for not calling her. Mrs Welsh, mother of the pursuer and of the witness, was examined, and no circumstance explaining the witness' absence, or accounting for the failure to adduce her, was stated. The pursuer's procurator must have known the nature of this witness' testimony But he did not think fit to examine her, and he closed his proof without adducing her, and some time afterwards he proposes to adduce this sister of the pursuer, who had not been examined before the Sheriff-substitute.

No. 13.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Mabon v. Cairns.

Without expressing my opinion on the credibility of this witness' testimony, if the adducing her as a witness had been sustained, I have no alternative but to leave her testimony out of consideration.

So viewing the case, I think that we should adhere to the decree of absolvitor pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 8th April 1875: Refuse the prayer of the petition for the pursuer, No. 5 of process, and appoint the evidence of the witness, Elizabeth Welsh, to be withdrawn from process: Further, recall the Sheriff's interlocutor of 15th May 1875: Find it not proved that the defender (appellant) is the father of the child mentioned in the summons: Therefore assoilzie the defender" &c.

M'CAUL & ARMSTRONG, S.S.C.—THOMAS LAWSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

NATHANIEL JAMES SPENS, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Keir.
JOHN ALEXANDER SPENS AND OTHERS (Monypenny's Trustees).—Lee—Moody Stuart.
MISS J. H. E. SPENS AND ANOTHER, Defenders.—Lee—Moody Stuart.

Trust—Succession—Vesting—Beneficial Fee.—In a trust-settlement the trustees were directed to lay out the residue of the truster's estate (which amounted to £60,000) in the purchase of lands, and when the whole residue, or within £300 thereof, was so invested, to deliver a disposition of the lands to the truster's brother (who predeceased her) in liferent, and his son and the heirs whatsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, certain other persons,—the trustees being declared to be "the sole and exclusive judges of the lands which and the period when these should be purchased, free from the control of any of the heirs who may be interested therein." The trustees having invested all the residue except £20,000 in the purchase of lands, the truster's nephew raised an action against the trustees for declarator that he was entitled to payment of the £20,000 as his absolute property. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand)

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

1st Division.
Lord Shand.

(1) that the pursuer's rights as a beneficiary vested in him a morte testatoris; and (2) that, as the directions to the trustees to purchase lands were framed for the purpose of settling them on the pursuer as an unlimited fiar, and were not such as to confer a right on third parties, the pursuer was entitled to require payment of the £20,000 in cash.

By trust-disposition and settlement dated 11th February 1869 the late Mrs Hannah Spens or Monypenny, widow of the late William Tankerville Monypenny of Pitmilly, disponed her whole means and estate, with certain exceptions, to John Alexander Spens, Lawrence Dalgleish, W.S., Nathaniel James Spens, and to the deceased Nathaniel Spens of Craigsanquhar, in trust. The exceptions from the deed were expressed as follows:—"Excepting and reserving herefrom the whole of those portions of the lands and estate of Ardit and others in the shire of Fife, ... of which a separate disposition and settlement has been executed by me of equal date herewith in favour of the said Nathaniel Spens, my brother, in liferent, and the said Nathaniel James Spens, his son, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, as therein mentioned; as also excepting and reserving herefrom the dwelling-house No. 7 Moray Place, . . . and of which a separate disposition and settlement has also been executed by me of equal date herewith in favour of Misses Jessie Hannah Elizabeth Spens and Mary Margaret Roberta Spens, daughters of the said Nathaniel Spens, equally between them, and the heirs of their bodies, whom failing, as therein mentioned; as also excepting and reserving herefrom that portion of ground forming part of the lands of Trinity, . . . and of which a separate disposition and settlement has also been executed by me of equal date herewith in favour of William Thomas Thornton, Esq. and Miss Anne Halkett Craigie, in liferent, whom failing, the said Nathaniel Spens in liferent, and the said Nathaniel James Spens and his heirs and assignees in fee."

The truster gave power to the trustees to sell the estate, heritable and moveable, to let leases not exceeding nineteen years, to lend the money on security, to assume new trustees, to appoint factors, &c.

The purposes of the trust were (1) payment of the truster's debts; (2) to deliver the furniture of the house in Moray Place to her nieces, the silver plate to her nephew, Nathaniel James Spens; (3) payment of an annuity of £100 to William Thomas Thornton, and an annuity of £500 to Mrs Spens, her sister-in-law; (4 and 5) payment of various legacies. "In the sixth place, in order that the said trustees or trustee may, and I hereby direct them or him, as soon after my death as may be convenient, to make up a state exhibiting the amount of the residue and remainder of the means and estate hereby conveyed, after answering the foregoing purposes of this trust. In the seventh place, in order that the said trustees or trustee may, and I hereby direct them or him, as soon after my death as may be convenient, and as they may think proper, to invest the said whole residue and remainder of my means and estate in the purchase of lands in the county of Fife, and adjacent to or near the estate of Craigsanquhar, belonging to the said Nathaniel Spens, or the said portions of the estate of Ardit, if in their opinion a suitable purchase can be effected in the said locality, or, if not, then in some other part of the said county, or, if not, then in some other county in Scotland; declaring that the said purchase may be made by my trustees of such lands at such prices, and from time to time, as they may consider to be most eligible, according to the state of the trust-funds and the opportunities which may occur of making suitable and convenient purchases, and that they shall be the sole and exclusive judges of the lands which, and the period when, these should be purchased, free from the control of any of the heirs who may be interested therein. In the eighth place, in order that the said trustees or trustee may, and I hereby direct them or him, on the said residue or remainder of my means and estate or sums being wholly or within £300 thereof invested in the purchase of lands as aforesaid, to execute a valid disposition thereof in favour of the said Nathaniel Spens, my brother, in liferent, for his liferent use only, and to the said Nathaniel James Spens, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, the said Miss Jessie Hannah Elizabeth Spens, and the heirs whomsoever of her body, whom failing, the said Miss Mary Margaret Roberta Spens, and the heirs whomsoever of her body, the eldest heir-female excluding heirs-portioners, and succeeding always without division throughout the whole course of succession, whom failing, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever, under the real burden of" the annuities mentioned above. "In the ninth place, in order that the said trustees or trustee may, and I hereby direct them or him, to pay over the annual interest and produce of the said residue and remainder of my means and estate previous to its being invested in the purchase of lands as aforesaid, and the rents of the said lands, after they are so purchased, which shall accrue or become payable between the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen six months after my death, and the date of entry under the said disposition to be granted by them or him as aforesaid, to the heir who would have been entitled to the rents of the lands to be purchased as aforesaid, if they had been so purchased and the disposition thereto been executed; that is, to the said Nathaniel Spens during his life, and after his death to the said Nathaniel James Spens, and the heirs whatsoever of his body, whom failing as aforesaid. In the tenth place, in order that the said trustees or trustee may, and I hereby direct them or him, on the said disposition being executed and titles completed thereon in the person of the immediate disponee, to deliver the same, along with the titles, to him, on his granting an absolute and valid discharge in favour of the said trustees or trustee," &c.

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1875. Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

The truster died in May 1873. Her brother, Nathaniel Spens, had predeceased her. In carrying out the purposes of the trust the trustees had purchased the lands of Cruivie at the price of £28,500, and of Cuplahills at the price of £11,000. In addition to the sums so expended there remained a balance in the hands of the trustees of £20,000. The trustees stated that certain annuities bequeathed in the codicils would fall to be secured by them over the said lands or otherwise before conveying them to the beneficiary, Nathaniel James Spens.

Nathaniel James Spens (who was not married) raised this action concluding for declarator that the trustees were bound to "make payment to the pursuer upon his simple receipt and for his own absolute use of the whole balance in their hands of the residue of the means and estate of the truster not invested in land in terms of the seventh purpose of the said trust-disposition, and that the pursuer is entitled to the said balance as his own absolute property;" and that the trustees should be ordained to make payment to the pursuer of £20,000, or such other sum as might be found to be the amount of the balance, with five per cent interest, from the date of decree.

He called as defenders Mrs Monypenny's trustees, his sisters, and his mother.

Separate defences were lodged for the trustees and for Miss Jessie H. E. Spens and Miss Mary Margaret Roberta Spens.

The pursuer pleaded;—The directions contained in the said trust-disposition and settlement being that the residue of the trust-funds should

No. 14.
Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

moveable, with certain specified exceptions, to trustees, whom she directed, as soon after her death as convenient, to make up a state exhibiting the amount of residue remaining after certain specific purposes had been provided for, in order that the trustees might, and she thereby directed them, as soon after her death as convenient and as they might think proper, to invest that residue in the purchase of lands in the county of Fife, adjacent to the estate of Craigsanquhar, belonging to her brother Nathaniel Spens, the pursuer's father, or to the portions of her own estate of Ardit, which, by a separate deed of the same date with her deed of settlement, she conveyed to her said brother in liferent and to the pursuer and the heirs of his body in fee; and, if a suitable purchase could not be made in such locality, then in some other part of the county of Fife, and failing thereof, in some other part of Scotland; and when the fund was thus exhausted, or within £300 of being so, to execute a disposition thereof in favour of her said brother in liferent for his liferent use only, and his son, the pursuer, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee, whom failing to his sister Jessie Hannah Elizabeth and the heirs whomsoever of her body, whom failing to his sister Mary Margaret Roberta and the heirs whomsoever of her body, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division, whom failing, to the granter's own heirs and assignees whomsoever.

The testatrix died in May 1873. Her brother predeceased her, having died in November 1869. The trustees have paid all the legacies, and secured all the annuities bequeathed by the deed to the satisfaction of the annuitants. The tional institutes as well as substitutes; and if the pursuer should predecease the granting of the conveyance, the estate must be conveyed to a descendant of the pursuer in the event of his leaving lawful issue, and failing such descendants, then to the pursuer's sisters respectively, whom failing, to their respective issue, as the destination provides. For these reasons I am of opinion that the pursuer has not that sole interest in the fee of the residue of the trust-estate, or in the lands purchased or to be purchased with that residue, which alone could give him right to the decree he asks. He has a present limited interest in the annual return from the residue, but his right to the residue itself appears to me to depend on his survivance of the date when the conveyance, in the ordinary execution of the trust, shall come to be executed.

---

"Even if the whole residue had been exhausted in the purchase of lands I am not prepared to say that the pursuer would be entitled to a conveyance to himself and his heirs and assignees in fee-simple. It appears to me that the heirs named after the pursuer in the destination to be inserted in the conveyance have an interest and are entitled to require the trustees to insert a destination in their favour in the deed, leaving it to the pursuer, if he think fit, after the lands have been conveyed in that way, to execute a deed defeating that destination; but it is unnecessary and would be premature to decide that question now.

"The only authority to which the pursuer's counsel referred in support of his claim was the Cluny case, Gordon, 4 Macph. 501. That case appears to me to differ entirely in all essential respects from the present. Even there a considerable minority of the Judges were against granting the decree bringing the trust to an end and declaring that Mr Gordon had right to the residue on his own receipt, but the majority of the Court proceeded on the ground that as there was no direction to insert a destination in the conveyance of the lands to be purchased, which would have given rights to a particular line of heirs or a series of persons named in succession to Mr Gordon, and as it was clear he had the present and sole right of fee in the residue of the trust-estate, he was entitled to dispense with the purchase of lands and receive the residue in money. In this respect, which was vital to the decision, the case of Gordon appears to me to differ entirely, and the difference makes all the difference in the result."

No. 14. The pursuer reclaimed.[1] At advising,—

Oct. 29, 1875. Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

LORD DEAS.—The late Mrs Monypenny, by her trust-deed and settlement, dated 11th February 1869, conveyed her whole means and estate, heritable and the residue of the trust-estate. He pleads that the truster's directions being that the residue of her estate 'should be invested in the purchase of lands, to be conveyed with a simple destination to the pursuer as institute, and the substitutes specified, the pursuer, as absolute fiar of the residue, is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.' If the pursuer be not the absolute fiar he is not entitled to succeed in the action.

---

"I am of opinion that the pursuer is not absolute fiar, and is not in the position of having the sole interest in the residue of the estate. His immediate and present interest and right, in terms of the ninth purpose of the trust-deed, is, so long as he survives, to receive the interest of the residue and the rents of such lands as have been purchased out of the residue, but he has no present right to the annual proceeds of the residue beyond his own life, or to the lands already purchased or to be purchased. His right to these lands, as it appears to me, will arise only in the event of his surviving until the trustees shall have fulfilled the directions of the truster by the purchase of lands exhausting the residue, and by granting a conveyance in terms of the destination in the truster's deed of settlement. If a right of fee in the lands be now vested in the pursuer, it follows that he could now dispose of that right, with the effect of defeating the directions of the truster and the rights of the other parties mentioned in the destination prescribed by the truster. This, I think, having regard to the plain terms of the deed, which provide otherwise, he cannot do. It is not in his power, or in that of any one of the other heirs mentioned in the destination, to accelerate the period when the conveyance of the lands shall be executed, for the trustees are declared to have the sole discretion as to the time when the lands shall be purchased, and, so long at least as they act in bona fide, no one of the persons interested under the destination has any right to interfere with them. A consideration of the various provisions of the trust-deed shews that the truster contemplated that a considerable time might elapse before the trustees could satisfactorily carry out her directions to purchase the lands, for the deed gives the trustees power to grant leases for nineteen years, to invest the residue in heritable security as well as government stock and debentures, a power to resign and assume new trustees, and a provision for an annual audit of accounts. I see no good reason for holding that the pursuer, as the first of the persons in whose favour a conveyance of the lands is to be executed when the trust has been fulfilled by the exhaustion of the residue in the purchase of lands, has right at his own will to accelerate the date of granting the conveyance, or to dispense with it altogether, and demand the residue of the estate in money. There are other persons having an interest who are entitled to say this shall not be done.

"The persons named in the destination after the pursuer, including his own descendants, are expressly favoured by the truster under her trust-deed. It is true that there is no direction to settle the estates by a deed containing the fetters of a strict entail, and consequently, after the pursuer obtains a conveyance, if he should survive the time when it comes to be granted, he will then be in a position by a new deed to evacuate the destination, and to dispose of the lands as he thinks fit. But in the meantime the parties interested under the destination after the pursuer, including his own possible descendants, are condi-

---

[1] Gordon v. Gordon's Trustees, March 2, 1866, 4 Macph. 501, 38 Scot. Jur. 232; Dickson's Tutors v. Scott, Nov. 2, 1853, 16 D. 1, 26 Scot. Jur. 16; Thorburn v. Thorburn's Trustees, Feb. 16, 1836, 14 S. 485, 8 Scot. Jur. 239; Wilkie v. Wilkie, Jan. 27, 1837, 15 S. 430, 9 Scot. Jur. 236; Howat's Trustees v. Howat, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 337; Grieve's Trustees v. Bethune, June 9, 1830, 8 S. 896, 2 Scot. Jur. 449; Pretty v. Newbigging, March 2, 1854, 16 D. 667, 26 Scot. Jur. 338.

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

moveable, with certain specified exceptions, to trustees, whom she directed, as soon after her death as convenient, to make up a state exhibiting the amount of residue remaining after certain specific purposes had been provided for, in order that the trustees might, and she thereby directed them, as soon after her death as convenient and as they might think proper, to invest that residue in the purchase of lands in the county of Fife, adjacent to the estate of Craigsanquhar, belonging to her brother Nathaniel Spens, the pursuer's father, or to the portions of her own estate of Ardit, which, by a separate deed of the same date with her deed of settlement, she conveyed to her said brother in liferent and to the pursuer and the heirs of his body in fee; and, if a suitable purchase could not be made in such locality, then in some other part of the county of Fife, and failing thereof, in some other part of Scotland; and when the fund was thus exhausted, or within £300 of being so, to execute a disposition thereof in favour of her said brother in liferent for his liferent use only, and his son, the pursuer, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee, whom failing to his sister Jessie Hannah Elizabeth and the heirs whomsoever of her body, whom failing to his sister Mary Margaret Roberta and the heirs whomsoever of her body, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division, whom failing, to the granter's own heirs and assignees whomsoever.

The testatrix died in May 1873. Her brother predeceased her, having died in November 1869. The trustees have paid all the legacies, and secured all the annuities bequeathed by the deed to the satisfaction of the annuitants. The tional institutes as well as substitutes; and if the pursuer should predecease the granting of the conveyance, the estate must be conveyed to a descendant of the pursuer in the event of his leaving lawful issue, and failing such descendants, then to the pursuer's sisters respectively, whom failing, to their respective issue, as the destination provides. For these reasons I am of opinion that the pursuer has not that sole interest in the fee of the residue of the trust-estate, or in the lands purchased or to be purchased with that residue, which alone could give him right to the decree he asks. He has a present limited interest in the annual return from the residue, but his right to the residue itself appears to me to depend on his survivance of the date when the conveyance, in the ordinary execution of the trust, shall come to be executed.

---

"Even if the whole residue had been exhausted in the purchase of lands I am not prepared to say that the pursuer would be entitled to a conveyance to himself and his heirs and assignees in fee-simple. It appears to me that the heirs named after the pursuer in the destination to be inserted in the conveyance have an interest and are entitled to require the trustees to insert a destination in their favour in the deed, leaving it to the pursuer, if he think fit, after the lands have been conveyed in that way, to execute a deed defeating that destination; but it is unnecessary and would be premature to decide that question now.

"The only authority to which the pursuer's counsel referred in support of his claim was the Cluny case, Gordon, 4 Macph. 501. That case appears to me to differ entirely in all essential respects from the present. Even there a considerable minority of the Judges were against granting the decree bringing the trust to an end and declaring that Mr Gordon had right to the residue on his own receipt, but the majority of the Court proceeded on the ground that as there was no direction to insert a destination in the conveyance of the lands to be purchased, which would have given rights to a particular line of heirs or a series of persons named in succession to Mr Gordon, and as it was clear he had the present and sole right of fee in the residue of the trust-estate, he was entitled to dispense with the purchase of lands and receive the residue in money. In this respect, which was vital to the decision, the case of Gordon appears to me to differ entirely, and the difference makes all the difference in the result."

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

residue applicable to the purchase of lands has been ascertained by the trustees to amount to about £60,000, of which they have already invested about £40,000 in the purchase of lands in Fife—leaving about £20,000 still uninvested. The pursuer desires to have the application of this sum in his own hands, and for that purpose he has brought the present action, concluding to have the amount at once paid over to him. His object, he says, is to build a house on the estate, which is now quite large enough; but, as the Lord Ordinary observes, if he gets the money he will, of course, be entitled to expend it otherwise if he thinks proper.

The question whether the pursuer is entitled to succeed in this action appears to me substantially to depend on whether the beneficial fee of the bequest has vested in him or not. If the beneficial fee has so vested, he is, I apprehend, the only person beneficially interested in the bequest, and, on the principle of the case of Gordon, 2d March 1866 (4 Macph. 501), he is entitled to claim the money which still remains in the hands of the trustees. On the other hand, if the beneficial fee has not vested in him, the principle of Gordon's case does not apply, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

The question of vesting depends, as it always does, upon the terms of the particular deed, construed in connection with the surrounding circumstances. It is at least as clear in this case as it was in Gordon's case that if a disposition were duly executed by the trustees in the terms directed by the testatrix the pursuer would be unlimited fiar of the lands, and entitled to dispose of them, onerously or gratuitously, at his pleasure.

The subsistence of a trust-fee is not inconsistent with the vesting of a beneficial fee, and the consequent right of a beneficiary to assign or deal with that fee as he thinks proper. Accordingly, in Gordon's case the trust-fee stood in the persons of the undivested trustees, but the beneficial fee was held to have vested in the beneficiary, and to entitle him to payment of the capital fund without going through the formality of, in the first instance, investing it in the terms directed by the testator.

The question in the present case is whether the testatrix intended that the pursuer should have no power to deal with the capital, whether in a marriage-contract or in any other way, till it should be converted into land, and a feudal title to the land established in his person? In other words, whether her object, or one of her objects, in directing the conversion into land was to prevent the beneficial fee from vesting in the meantime in the pursuer?

I am disposed to answer that question in the negative. There is no express declaration by the testatrix that the pursuer was not to be entitled to deal with or dispose of his interest in the capital till some future and indefinite time, of which the trustees should be the sole judges, and by which time they should have invested the whole capital in the purchase of lands, and conveyed them to the pursuer in the terms prescribed. A power to trustees to hasten or postpone the period of vesting at their pleasure is not readily to be reared up by implication. The implication, to say the least of it, would require to be very clear. Here I think it is not so. On the contrary, there are weighty considerations the other way.

The testatrix had no sister or sister's children at the time she executed the deed. The pursuer's father was her only brother, and the pursuer (who was an only son) was her only nephew, and, failing his father, he was her heir-at-law. The father died in November 1869—that is, about nine months after the date of the deed—at the age of sixty-four, while the testatrix survived, without altering her destination of the residue, till May 1873. The pursuer was obviously the person of all others whom the testatrix was desirous to favour. The disposition which she directed to be executed of the lands to be purchased was to be in favour of her brother "in liferent, for his liferent use only, and to the said Nathaniel James Spens and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee." Nobody can doubt that under such a disposition the pursuer would have been unlimited fiar notwithstanding of the substitutions, which I shall advert to immediately. Her whole silver plate and plated articles she directed to be delivered to her brother, "for his liferent use, and to the said Nathaniel James Spens for his absolute use, after the death of his father." She bequeathed to the pursuer a legacy of £5000, payable, along with her other legacies, six months after the first term following her death, and she excepted entirely from the dispositive clause of her trust-deed two subjects, both of which she conveyed, by separate deeds, directly to the pursuer, in terms which undoubtedly made him immediate and unlimited fiar of both of these subjects. The one, which is first mentioned in the trust-deed, consisted of the portions (extending to 339 imperial acres) which belonged to her of the lands of Ardit in Fife, and the other consisted of 285 square yards of valuable building ground at Trinity, on the sea-coast adjoining this city, with the dwelling-house and other buildings thereon.

The clause reserving the lands of Ardit from the operation of the trust bears,—"Of which a separate disposition and settlement has been executed by me, of equal date herewith, in favour of my said brother, Nathaniel Spens, in liferent, and the said Nathaniel James Spens, his son, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, as therein mentioned." And from the deed itself, which is in process, we see that the destination was to the father "for his liferent use only, and to Nathaniel James Spens, his only surviving son, and the heirs of his body in fee," whom failing, to the pursuer's two sisters before-named in their order, and the heirs of their bodies, in verbatim the same terms with the destination directed to be inserted in the disposition to be executed by the trustees of the lands to be purchased by them.

The clause in the trust-deed reserving the subjects at Trinity bears—"Of which a separate disposition and settlement has also been executed by me of equal date herewith, in favour of Wm. Thomas Thornton, Esq., and Miss Anne Halkett Craigie, both residing at Christian Bank, Trinity, in liferent, whom failing, the said Nathaniel Spens in liferent, and the said James Nathaniel Spens and his heirs and assignees in fee." This separate disposition is erroneously described as being of equal date with the trust-deed, which no doubt it had been intended to be, but something apparently had delayed its execution till 6th May 1869—a discrepancy of no materiality here. The narrative in the trust-deed of the dispositive clause of this disposition is quite accurate, as we see from the deed itself.

Nor did the testatrix leave the pursuer's two sisters dependent for their comfortable livelihood on the chance of their succession to the lands to be purchased by the trustees. The testatrix bequeathed to each of them £5000, with the furniture and everything else in her house No. 7 Moray Place, Edinburgh, except the silver plate and plated articles bequeathed to the pursuer; and, moreover, as is likewise set forth in the trust-deed, she conveyed that valuable house itself, by a separate deed, to these ladies "equally betwixt them, and the heirs of their bodies, whom failing, as therein mentioned."

The direct conveyance to the pursuer of the lands of Ardit explains why it was that the testatrix wished the lands which were to be purchased by the trustees to be adjacent or near to Ardit, failing their being got adjacent or near

No. 14.

Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

to Craigsanquhar; and it is an important fact in the present case that preference was to be given, over all other localities, to the vicinity of Craigsanquhar, the pursuer's paternal estate, and to which he succeeded on his father's death some four years before the death of the testatrix; and it is further important that, failing adjacency or vicinity to Craigsanquhar, preference was to be given to the adjacency or vicinity of the estate of Ardit, which the testatrix had made absolutely and unconditionally the pursuer's own.

These very substantial proofs of preference for the pursuer over his sisters are to be coupled with the fact, also important, that six months after the death of the testatrix, the pursuer, failing his father, the liferenter, was to enter, at once, into the continuous enjoyment of the bequest of residue by drawing the whole annual income thereof,—alike that arising from the fund while wholly uninvested in land, and that arising from the land after partial investment, as well as from the uninvested balance.

The Lord Ordinary holds that, notwithstanding all this, there was to be no vesting of the capital of the bequest till all the land was purchased and a disposition thereof executed divesting the trustees. In consistency with this view, his Lordship ought to have held, having reference to the 10th head of the trust-deed, that it was further a necessary preliminary to the vesting that a discharge of the trust should be executed by the pursuer, and feudal titles to the lands completed in his person; for the directions on that subject in the 10th head of the trust-deed are equally explicit with those which relate to the purchase and disposition of the lands.

If it were quite clear that the object, or even one of the objects of the testatrix, in all this, was to favour one or both of the pursuer's sisters in preference to himself, there might be much to be said for the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary. But I think it far from clear that the testatrix had any such object. If she had, it is remarkable that the pursuer and his father were to be two out of the four trustees who were to be vested with the discretionary power of fixing the period of vesting by the purchase and conveyance of lands which might readily have been got, with that view, in some part of Scotland. If one of the other trustees had died, and the father and son had survived, they would have been a majority and quorum of the trustees, and if both the other trustees had predeceased them they would have been the only trustees. It is also remarkable, upon the same supposition, that, in place of directing accumulation after the death of the liferenter, an express direction was given, which was not given in Gordon's case, to pay over the annual proceeds of the bequest to the pursuer, without reference to whether the bequest stood in the form of money or of land.

At the date of the trust-deed the pursuer was a young man of twenty-three years of age. His father, the liferenter, was alive, and might have survived the testatrix for a longer or shorter period of years. Without any desire to give either of the sisters of the pursuer a better chance than was given to him of being able to deal with the fee of the bequest, the testatrix may have thought that a substantial addition to the pursuer's landed estate would be, to him, the most gratifying form which the bequest could assume, and that, in converting it into that form his own want of experience might be usefully supplied by that of his father and the two other trustees whom she conjoined with him in the trust. It is difficult to suppose, at all events, that her object was to interpose obstacles to the pursuer attaining the position in which he could deal with the capital of the bequest, in order to increase the chance of one or other of his sisters of coming into that position. Colonel Gordon obviously meant to exclude all and every one of his disponees, named and unnamed, from ever being in such a position, for he directed the execution of a strict entail. He contemplated a destination which the law of Scotland did not recognise at all, but which, if it had been legally effectual, would have made none of the disponees unlimited fiar; and that created one of the greatest difficulties in the case,—namely, whether the succession was not left open to the testator's heir-at-law. Here, on the contrary, the testatrix directed a destination which is quite recognised in our practice as effectual, but the effect of which is to place the estate entirely at the disposal of the first disponee. The law in such a case as this presumes that the testatrix knew the legal effect of the words which she used, and meant them to have that effect. The testatrix must therefore be presumed to have known that the effect of postponing the vesting of the fee would not be to create an effectually protected course of succession, but simply to exclude for an indefinite period, at the discretion of the trustees, the pursuer from being unlimited fiar, for the benefit of another who must necessarily come into that position, and for whom, it is perfectly clear, that the testatrix had nothing like the same favour. I cannot think that that was her object in directing the conversion of the money into land and the completion of titles in the person of the beneficiary at the expense of the trust-estate. If that was not the object of her direction there is nothing else suggested which could possibly suspend the vesting of the beneficial fee. The only suggestion that can be so made is, at the best, doubtful and inconclusive, while there are many cogent reasons against it. I am therefore of opinion that the beneficial fee has vested in the pursuer; and, if that be so, I am further of opinion that the principle governing the case of Gordon is, a fortiori, applicable here. Colonel Gordon meant nobody to be unlimited fiar. But in making or directing a destination like the present the law holds that the testatrix meant somebody to be unlimited fiar, and if we were to interpose delay and obstacles to increase the chance of another than the pursuer coming into that position we should just be adopting, in more difficult and hostile circumstances, the principle which weighed with the minority in Gordon's case but which was authoritatively overruled by the majority.

No. 14.
Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

If I am right in these views, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be recalled, and decree pronounced in terms of the libel.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur in the observation that this case really turns upon the question of vesting, and on that question my opinion is entirely in accordance with that expressed by Lord Deas.

If there had been no trust I do not think it can be doubted that the conveyance to "Nathaniel Spens, my brother, in liferent for his liferent use only, and to Nathaniel James Spens and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee, whom failing, the said Miss Jessie Hannah Elizabeth Spens and the heirs whomsoever of her body," &c., would have conferred upon Nathaniel James Spens, the pursuer of this action, a right of fee, and that such right of fee would have been now vested in him. There is a trust of which I think the main purpose is to protect the liferent interest of Nathaniel Spens, the brother of the truster, and to secure the administration of the estate so as to benefit Nathaniel Spens in liferent and Nathaniel James Spens in fee. It appears from the trust-deed that the truster had a great regard for Nathaniel James Spens, and this is yet more abundantly proved by other deeds before us, by which she conveyed to him other landed estates. There is nothing to limit or qualify the right of fee conferred upon the pursuer, and there is no indication of the intention of the truster to limit that right. His father's right was a right of liferent only, burdening but not destroying or postponing the right of fee conferred on the pursuer. The existence of a liferent is not unfavourable to the vesting of the fee. The fee vests under burden of the liferent. No entail was directed or contemplated. If a deed were executed conveying the lands purchased by the trust-funds in the exact terms directed, that deed would confer on the pursuer a title to the lands in fee-simple. He could dispose of these lands at once. No one could challenge his act or dispute his power. I need not refer to authorities to support this proposition, that the right is vested in the pursuer. It is abundantly clear—more clear than in similar cases of vesting which have been mentioned.

No. 14. Oct. 29, 1875. Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

But the next question which arises is—Can the pursuer, having a vested right to the lands already purchased and to the trust-fund remaining as yet uninvested, now obtain payment of the balance of the fund, or must he await the prolonged administration of the trust, involving the selecting and the purchasing and the ultimate conveyance of the land? On this point I am of opinion that if the trustees are, as I think they are, bound, without undue delay, to purchase land and convey it to the pursuer so as to confer on him a fee-simple title with full and immediate power of disposal, and if there is no person whose interests, adverse to the pursuer's right, the trustees are bound to protect, then they cannot withhold the trust-funds from the pursuer. On this part of the case the decision in the case of Gordon of Cluny is applicable and important, and I retain the opinion which I expressed in that case. Looking to the older authorities, I think that the decisions in Routledge v. Carruthers,[1] in Rainsford v. Martin,[2] 1852, Pretty v. Newbigging, 1854, all well known authorities, confirm the view which I have now expressed.

I do not doubt that the trustees have acted with prudent caution in refusing payment without judicial determination. But the words of the deed conferring a right of fee, the manifest preference and favour shewn by the truster to the pursuer in this deed and in her other conveyances, the selection of the locality for the purchase of land, and the effect of a conveyance in the words directed by the deed, afford, when taken in combination, clear grounds, to my mind, for holding the pursuer's right to be vested; and if vested, and vested in the manner and to the extent contemplated and directed by the trust-deed, I can perceive no good reason for refusing his demand for transference of the remaining trust-funds.

Lord Mure.—I concur in the result of the opinions which have now been expressed, and I think that the case depends mainly upon the question of vesting. Upon that question I am disposed to hold that the fee of this estate has vested in the pursuer of the action, and that upon the grounds so clearly explained by Lord Deas. But, were the matter still open, I should, notwithstanding the fact of vesting, have had difficulty in holding that the pursuer was entitled to demand immediate payment of the residue. Since the decision in the case of Gordon of Cluny, however, that question is, I apprehend, no longer an open one. For, although it was there assumed, in the opinion of several of the Judges in the majority, that cases might occur in which a direction to purchase land may be so expressed as to oblige the trustees literally to follow out that direction, and where, although the fee had vested, the money appointed so to be expended could not legally be paid over to the beneficiary named in the destination, until the time specified by the truster had arrived, or a condition attached to the bequest had been purified, it was nevertheless held that the directions there given to the trustees were not of that description. And it was decided by a majority of the whole Court, notwithstanding the pretty clear indication of intention on the part of the truster, that the trustees should hold the fund appointed to be invested in land until the investment had been made, that the beneficiary was entitled to demand immediate payment of the residue. After a careful reconsideration of that case I have come to the conclusion that the rules there laid down must be applied in the present case.

[1] May 19, 1812, F. C., Buchanan's Reports, p. 121, and H. L. June 29, 1816, 4 Dow, 392, remitted Dec. 16, 1819, F. C., H. L. June 5, 1820, 2 Bligh, 692.
[2] Feb. 6, 1852, 14 D. 450.

The question here raised is under the eighth purpose of the trust-deed, by which the trustees, upon the residue of the estate being wholly or within £300, invested in the purchase of land, are directed to execute a valid disposition of it in favour of Nathaniel Spens, the truster's brother, "in liferent, for his liferent use only, and of Nathaniel James Spens" (the pursuer) "and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee." Now, I apprehend that, in this provision, when read in connection with the other circumstances of the case, most of the elements will be found which, in the case of Gordon, induced the Court to disregard the indications of intention that the bequest should not there be made available to the beneficiary until the purchase of land had been effected. Under this provision the testator makes a gift of the entire residue to the pursuer, and his primary object seems to have been to favour the pursuer, in preference to the other beneficiaries under the deed. For the gift is not made conditional, in the ordinary sense of that word, but in such unrestricted terms that, upon the estate being conveyed to the pursuer, he could, I conceive, sell or otherwise dispose of it at once. He has now, therefore, as in the case of Gordon, a jus crediti vested in him to demand a conveyance of heritage in the particular terms of that eighth purpose, not in an uncertain event, which might be held to operate as a condition, but at a time which must happen, viz., when the residue is laid out in land. And the circumstance that the trustees may have a discretion as to the time when the conveyance is to be made, and that there are indications of an intention that there is to be no conveyance until the fund is invested in land, cannot, I think, be held to interrupt the vesting. Against this view it was strongly contended, on the part of the defenders, that as there is here a continuing trust, with a provision that the trustees were not to be interfered with, the pursuer cannot at present demand payment of any part of the residue. But these provisions are not stronger than those which occurred in the case of Gordon, in which there were somewhat similar directions, and where, under the trust-deed, the trustees were authorised to denude only after the whole money had been laid out in land. All the clauses, moreover, in the present case, which seem to imply a continuing trust, those, for example, with regard to the management of the estate, may be accounted for by the fact that the truster's brother, who is now dead, was to liferent the property, and at the date of the trust-deed was of an age which might make it necessary to keep up the trust for a considerable period.

In these circumstances the only question remaining for consideration is whether the intention, here indicated by the truster, as to the disposal of the residue in

No. 14.
Oct. 29, 1875.
Spens v. Monypenny's Trustees.

the purchase of land, is so worded as to preclude the pursuer from now demanding payment as concluded for in this action. I am of opinion that it is not. For as I read the opinions in the case of Gordon, and especially that of Lord Barcaple, which was expressly adopted by several of the Judges in the majority, what was there laid down was, that when a conveyance is appointed to be made in such terms as would vest a fee-simple estate in the beneficiary, and leave it open to him to dispose of it at pleasure, he is entitled to demand immediate payment of the fund. And as most of the arguments which have been here so anxiously addressed to us on the part of the defenders against this course were brought fully under the consideration of the Court in the opinions of Lord Neaves and Lord Kinloch in the case of Gordon, I have come to the conclusion that the defences in this case must be repelled, and decree given in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent when the case was argued, and gave no opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, and decern in terms of the libel: Authorise the trustees to pay the expenses of both parties out of the residue of the trust-estate, as these expenses shall be taxed by the Auditor as between agent and client, and remit to the Auditor accordingly."

DALGLEISH & BELL, W.S.—WILSON & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.
Oct. 30, 1875.
Lord Clinton.

LORD CLINTON, as Tutor and Administrator-in-Law for his Son, the Hon. Charles J. R. H. S. F. Trefusis, Petitioner.—Lee.

Nobile Officium—Guardian and Ward—Pupil—Authority to Feu.—Circumstances in which the Court granted authority to a father, as administrator-at-law of his pupil son, to feu part of the son's estate.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

ON 13th March 1875 Lord Clinton, as tutor and administrator-in-law for his eldest son, the Hon. Charles Trefusis, who was aged about twelve years, and was proprietor in fee-simple of the estate of Pitsligo in Aberdeenshire, presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary in which he prayed, inter alia, for authority to himself to grant feus of a portion of ground, not exceeding 20 acres in extent, surrounding the fishing village of Sandhaven, situate on the estate of Pitsligo, as shewn on a feuing plan produced, "and that at such times and in such portions as the petitioner may think fit; to fix, by interlocutor of the Court, the minimum rate or rates of feu-duty at which the said lands may be feued; to approve of the form of a feu-charter, feu-contract, or feu-disposition as the form to be made use of under the present application, from time to time, as successive feus shall be granted; and to authorise the petitioner to grant the said feus in the form so to be approved of, from time to time, as he shall think proper, subject to any conditions or stipulations which your Lordships may deem necessary."

The petition was presented in the following circumstances:—The Hon. Charles Trefusis had succeeded on the death of his mother, Lady Clinton, in 1869, to the estate of Pitsligo, which she had inherited from her father, Sir John Stuart Forbes. Sir John Forbes had, in 1838, caused a feuing-plan of the ground round the harbour and bay of Sandhaven to be prepared, and had built a pier and otherwise improved the harbour. Eleven feus, covering fully two acres of ground, had been given out during Sir John's life in accordance with this feuing-plan. The herring fishing at Sandhaven had recently been very successful, and the accommodation at the harbour had been found to be too limited. The harbour had also fallen into such disrepair that in 1873 Lord Clinton, as tutor and administrator-in-law for his son, had applied to and obtained from Parliament a provisional order authorising the execution of certain works and improvements on it at an expense of £10,000, to be borrowed on the security of the harbour dues. Of this sum, at the date of the petition, upwards of £2000 had been expended. There was a great demand for house accommodation in and about the village, and the fishing was yearly increasing in value and importance. But there was a considerable risk that if building ground could not be obtained the fishing and trade might fall off.

No. 15.
Oct. 30, 1875.
Lord Clinton.

On 19th March 1870 the Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr William Moncreiff, C.A. (the Accountant of Court), to report on the petition, with power to consult Mr Fletcher Norton Menzies, secretary to the Highland Society.

Mr Moncreiff, on 13th July, lodged his report,* along with a report which he had obtained from Mr Menzies.†

---

* " . . . The petitioner craves special powers, authorising him to grant feus at Sandhaven on the unentailed estate of Pitsligo, and he has produced in support of his application—(1) A feuing plan, prepared by Mr James F. Beattie, land surveyor, Aberdeen; (2) A report by Mr James Shives, the local factor on the estate, dated 2d December 1874. The extent of ground proposed to be feued is about 20 acres, and Mr Shives states in his report that, from the success of the herring fishery at Sandhaven, the population has so increased that additional house accommodation has become absolutely necessary in the interest of the harbour and the village, that numerous applications have been made for feus for dwelling-houses, storage, curing stations and premises, &c., and that it is impossible at present to find house accommodation for the crews and others engaged in the fishery.

" The Accountant, in terms of the authority conferred on him by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, consulted Mr Fletcher Menzies with reference to this branch of the tutor's petition; and Mr Menzies having gone to the estate, and made careful inspection and inquiries, has lodged a report, which is herewith produced. . . . .

" The Accountant is of opinion that, if powers to feu be granted, a minimum annual feu-duty of £10 per imperial acre should be the rate on which such feus should be sanctioned.

" It is proper, however, that the Accountant should point out that doubts are entertained whether the Court can grant powers to feu in the circumstances stated in this petition. There are various decisions of the Court which have an opposite bearing. The Accountant has had specially under his attention the following:—Colt, 1801, F. C. 547; Vere v. Dale, 20th February 1804, Mor. 16,389; Thomson, 10th March 1837, 15 S. 807.

" In the last case power to feu was refused, though the application was made on the ground that it would be highly expedient to feu.

" These decisions are to the effect that expediency is not a sufficient ground to warrant the Court in granting feuing powers to a tutor. On the other hand, however, the reporter is aware that feuing powers have been granted by the Court to curators bonis in certain cases. He may refer to the case of Jamieson, curator bonis to W. C. Bontine, 18th June 1868, where authority was granted to a curator to carry out feuing powers which had been granted by the Court to an entailed proprietor, and for that purpose to grant feus of various portions of the estate; and to the case of Jamieson, curator bonis to C. Mackenzie, 9th July 1873, where, in an application by the curator bonis to a fee-simple proprietor for authority to grant feus or long leases, power was given to grant leases for ninety-nine years in favour of certain parties who had applied for such. The printed papers in these applications are herewith produced."

† (After details as to the extent of the tonnage, export of herrings, &c.)—" I went over the ground proposed to be feued, and carefully compared it with the

No. 15.

Oct. 30, 1875.
Lord Clinton.

On 20th July the Lord Ordinary reported the petition and reports to the First Division.*

plan by Messrs Beattie and Son, and considering that the existence of the present village prevents the making of an independent plan, I think it is most carefully and conveniently laid out. I failed to find any objection to its being adopted. There is an abundant supply of excellent spring water.

"There is a good road from the village to Fraserburgh, distant about two miles, and it is evident that there is a very great need of more accommodation to put up those employed in the fishing and curing, as well as of ground for curing yard stations.

"The harbour is already greatly deepened and improved, and the natural facilities for a fishing station are very great. There is a good channel to the harbour, with a range of rocks which shelter the bay inside, and afford safe anchorage for the fishing boats at all times.

"When the whole proposed plan of harbour is finished it will be very complete. I have no doubt there will be a great increase of ships and fishing boats using the harbour when there is more convenience, and the want of accommodation in the village is already felt. There were three ships unloading salt when I was there, and I was told there were often five or six ships in at a time of from 60 to 100 tons.

"I may mention that one curer from Fraserburgh has put up a large curing station already in the hopes of getting a feu, should the Court grant authority; so great was his need of a station that he has run the risk. I also observed that a one-storied house (an old feu) had been unroofed, and two stories added, to give additional sleeping room for the curers.

"I have no doubt that there will be a great demand for the feus if granted, and that it will be a great advantage to the property to give authority to feu.

"I ascertained that the late Sir John Stuart Forbes, Bart., let eleven feus with charters at the rate of 8d. per square yard, or £161, 6s. 8d. per acre of purchase money or grassum, and one farthing the square yard, or £5, 0s. 10d. the acre of feu-duty. Calculating the purchase money at 4 per cent, this would give a total return of £11, 19s. 7d. per acre.

"I see by the petition that the minimum feu-duty proposed is £5, and no mention is made of grassum or purchase money.

"I do not know if there is a preference for the above system of feuing, but if there is not a great prejudice in favour of a grassum, I would advise that it be given up, and the land be feued at a minimum duty of £10 per imperial acre. If a purchase money or grassum is preferred, I would make a minimum feu-duty of £5 per annum, and a minimum purchase money of £125, which at 4 per cent would be equivalent to the other £5.

"In conclusion, I must say that it would be in my opinion a fatal mistake not to allow the proposed feus to be granted. There is no doubt the place will become a very important fishing village, and it is naturally well suited for one.

"The white fishing has been commenced since the railway was opened to Fraserburgh, and is now flourishing, and if there was more accommodation for fishermen there is no doubt it would become an important trade from the village.

"I will only add that, from the natural capabilities of the place and the harbour works completed as proposed to be carried out, I think there is a dire necessity to increase the accommodation of the village, otherwise the crowding of the people together at the curing seasons may induce evil results in the shape of fever, &c."

* "NOTE.—The petitioner, Lord Clinton, as tutor and administrator-in-law for the Honourable J. R. H. Stuart Forbes Trefusis, the proprietor of the estates of Sligo and Fettercairn and others, has presented this petition for authority to accept renunciations of leases, and to grant new leases of certain farms on these different estates, and to expend various sums of money in repairs and improvements on these farms, and to feu certain parts of the estate of Pitsligo. Although

No. 15.

Oct. 30, 1875.
Lord Clinton.

Argued for the petitioner;—It was settled that the Court had a discretionary power to grant leave to feu or burden a pupil's estate.[1] A case the petitioner is not a tutor under the superintendence of the Accountant of Court, or within the operation of the Pupils Protection Act, I considered it expedient to remit the application to Mr William Moncreiff, C.A. (the Accountant of Court), to inquire into the circumstances and to report, empowering him to consult Mr F. N. Menzies, secretary of the Highland Society, as to the amount of the proposed feu-duty and as to the leases, &c.

"After considering Mr Moncreiff's report, special powers were granted to the petitioner, by interlocutor of 16th July 1875, in terms of the prayer of the petition, except that part in which he asks authority to feu, as to which I entertained some doubts.

"The village of Sandhaven is situated on the sea-coast of Aberdeenshire, and forms part of the pupil's unentailed estate of Pitsligo; and the petitioner asks authority to grant feus of 20 acres of land surrounding the village. It appears that herring-fishing is extensively carried on there, but that there is a great scarcity both of harbour and of house accommodation. With a view to enlarge and improve the harbour, the petitioner, in 1873, applied to and obtained from Parliament a provisional order authorising his ward to execute various works which are at present being carried on, and by which it is expected that the harbour will be materially improved and enlarged. It also appears that there is a great demand at present for house accommodation in and about the village; that the whole available ground in and around the village belongs to the pupil, and that accommodation cannot be had on any other ground in the district. Mr Menzies reports that the ground proposed to be feued is conveniently situated and well adapted for the purpose; and that he has no doubt that it will be a great advantage to the property if the feus proposed were to be granted. The present agricultural rental is stated to be £2 per acre, while the minimum rate of feu-duty recommended by Mr Menzies and approved of by Mr Moncreiff is £10 per acre.

"Although it is evident that if the 20 acres in question were to be all feued out at the rate suggested, the return would be increased from about £40 to £200 per annum, it does not appear to me that, so far as regards the interests of the pupil and of the property of Pitsligo, there is any case of necessity for feuing made out by the petitioner. The income of his ward appears to be ample, and it would not be increased by the proposed feuing to such an extent as to make the granting the powers sought a matter of necessity, or even of great expediency, so far as regards the ward himself or the estate. The desire of fishermen and others to become householders in Sandhaven can hardly be said to make it a necessity for the ward and his estate that the proposed feus should be granted.

"On the other hand, if feus are not granted, the result may perhaps be—although I do not see this noticed in any of the reports—that fishermen and skippers may fail to resort to the harbour, and that the harbour dues may thus become inadequate as a return for the funds of the ward which have been expended in enlarging and improving the harbour.

"In the general case, the Court will not give powers to the guardian of a pupil, or other person under disability, to grant feus of his ward's heritage, unless in the case of necessity,—the avoidance of considerable loss to the ward's estate being generally held to amount to necessity. The general rule applicable to such cases is laid down in the case of Maconochie, 3d February 1857, 19 D. 366. As illustrating the class of cases in which such special powers may be granted, reference may be made to the cases noticed by Mr Moncreiff in his report, and to the case of Alexander, 26th June 1857, 19 D. 888. But in the latter case, and in the case of Jamieson (1868), the special powers were granted because the ward had himself, before becoming incapable, commenced feuing on an extensive scale, the interruption of which would have seriously diminished the

[1] Colt v. Colt, July 3, 1801, M. App. voce Tutor, No. 1.

No. 15. Oct. 30, 1875. Lord Clinton.

of necessity, however, required to be made out.[1] Tutors-at-law and nominate had been allowed to borrow money on entailed estates[2] and fee-simple estates,[3] to grant long leases,[4] and even to sell to meet heritable debts.[5] Feus had been granted of land in this village in Sir John Forbes', the pupil's grandfather's, time, and a curator bonis had been allowed to complete feuing commenced by his ward, and even to grant new feus.[6] The Court had certainly always limited itself to cases of necessity, and not of mere expediency;[7] but a clear case of necessity had been made out here.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court will not sanction the alienation of a pupil's heritage by a tutor except in a case of necessity; but there may be a difficulty in deciding what is a case of necessity, and I think the true rule is to be found in the observations made from the bench in the case of Colt, which are as follows:—"The Court may, with propriety, sanction an alienation of a pupil's heritage when the sale is necessary for payment of debts for the minor's aliment, and in case of urgency to avoid loss. But the Court ought not to interfere merely from views of procuring future advantage to the minor."

Now, proceeding on that principle, it is very clear that the Court went wrong in their original decision in the case of Vere, because the only reason for sanctioning the course there taken was to secure some advantage in the way of increasing the returns which were to be obtained from the pupil's estate. But value of his estate. And in the case of Jamieson (1873), where the Court refused to grant general feuing powers, they authorised the curator to grant three long leases of small specified lots of ground, after inquiring into the special circumstances of the case.

---

"On the other hand, as illustrating the class of cases in which authority will be refused, reference may be made to the cases of Thomson and of Vere, referred to by Mr Moncreiff, the last of which resembles the present in many points, and to the cases of Watt, 23d February 1856, 18 D. 652, and M'George, 8th March 1856, 18 D. 792.

"The question raised by the report of Mr Moncreiff is thus attended with difficulty, and as the 'necessity' for alienating a pupil's heritage is less a matter for legal proof than for the discretion of the Court, I have thought it better, instead of disposing of the case by a judgment, to report it for the consideration of the Inner-House. And I should have followed the same course even if I had been clearly of opinion that the special powers sought ought to be granted, because I think that, as the petitioner has no contradictor, these powers, if they are to be granted at all, should not be granted by a single Judge.

"In the event of power to feu being granted, it is right to notice that, although the minimum feu-duty suggested by the petitioner was only £5 per acre, Mr Menzies and Mr Moncreiff are both of opinion that £10 should be the minimum. But it will be seen from the report of Mr Menzies that even that sum is considerably less than the feu-duty paid for the existing feus in the village, eleven of which were granted by the late Sir John Stuart Forbes, a former proprietor, at the rate of £11, 19s. 7d. per acre; and the minimum feu-duty ought therefore not to be less than £12."

[1] Vere v. Dale, Feb. 29, 1804, M. 16,389.

[2] Earl of Buchan, March 7, 1839, 1 D. 637.

[3] Crawford, July 6, 1839, 1 D. 1183.

[4] Kincaid, July 5, 1856, 18 D. 1208, 28 Scot. Jur. 611.

[5] Mackenzie, Jan. 27, 1855, 17 D. 314.

[6] Alexander, June 26, 1857, 19 D. 888.

[7] Maconochie, Feb. 3, 1857, 19 D. 366, 29 Scot. Jur. 171; Fraser on Parent and Child, p. 493, and cases there cited.

No. 15.

Oct. 30, 1875.
Lord Clinton.

in other cases, such as that of Mackenzie, the Court have proceeded on grounds of high expediency.

In the present case the circumstances are very peculiar. It appears that as far back as 1838 the late Sir John Stuart Forbes, the then proprietor of this estate, set about erecting the village of Sandhaven, and had a feuing plan prepared, and articles and conditions of feu drawn up to regulate all the transactions in the way of giving off land at Sandhaven. In Sir John's time these were acted on to the extent of feuing out eleven feus in all, amounting to about two acres. Such was the state of affairs when Sir John died, and he was succeeded by Lady Clinton, his daughter, who did not long survive her father, and was in turn succeeded by her son, this pupil. The application is made by his father as his administrator-in-law, who is thus in the same position as a tutor-at-law or tutor-nominate.

In 1873 a provisional order was obtained from Parliament sanctioning the execution of certain works for the improvement of the harbour of Sandhaven. Powers were granted to borrow £10,000, and a sum of upwards of £2000 has already been expended on these works. The pupil thus has a deep interest in the prosperity of the village of Sandhaven, and the provisional order never would have been granted unless Parliament had been convinced that Sandhaven was an increasing place. But nothing can be done without granting feus. The provisional order thus creates a necessity for our endeavouring, if possible, to allow the petitioner to give off feus. I think, on the whole, that there is here a strong case of necessity, and that we should therefore grant the powers prayed for.

LORD DEAS.—This is a very delicate matter. It is clear enough from the case of Vere that our authority is not an absolute protection to a tutor against subsequent responsibility, so we must be careful not to mislead the tutor.

I am, however, disposed to concur, very much on the grounds given by your Lordship. We have here Parliamentary authority for expenditure on this harbour, which clearly implies the necessity of such procedure as is now proposed to be taken. Without such, the expenditure authorised by statute would be thrown away.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I agree with Lord Deas that this is a very delicate matter. That the Court can grant the prayer of this petition I do not doubt. But such powers are exceptional, and only granted on strong and clear grounds. At the same time, it would be with regret that we should refuse to grant powers where they are not only manifestly desirable and expedient, but where they are substantially necessary. Mere expediency, however high, will not be sufficient; but the peculiarity here is, that the original contemplation of the whole course of procedure in raising up this village of Sandhaven commenced with Sir John Stuart Forbes himself. Obviously he contemplated making and establishing and extending this fishing village, and for that purpose he intended to feu. Therefore, whatever is done now in granting this petition is done in accordance with and in furtherance of the views of the last proprietor. Then, we see that in 1873 a provisional order was obtained from Parliament to carry out the intentions of Sir John, who commenced operations thirty-five years before.

The objects of the petitioner thus are (1) to obtain power to carry out Sir John's intentions, and (2) to be enabled to execute, as contemplated, this provisional order. The case, then, is one of entire accordance with the intentions of Sir John, and with the views indicated in the provisional order; and the procedure for which power is craved is of the highest possible expediency—so high as to come very closely indeed to absolute necessity. I think, putting these in combination, we have enough here to entitle us to give the authority craved.

No. 15.
Oct. 30, 1875.
Lord Clinton.

LORD MURE.—I concur, on the specific ground that this proposal to feu appears to me to be necessary for the proper administration of this estate, and in order that the money which, under the authority of the provisional order granted by Parliament, is being expended on the extension of the estate harbour, may not be thrown away.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords, on report of Lord Curriehill, having heard counsel for the petitioner, and considered the petition, and the reports by the Accountant of Court and Mr Fletcher Menzies, remit to the Junior Lord Ordinary to grant the power and authority to feu as prayed for, but under condition that the minimum feu-duty shall not be less than £12 per acre."

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 16.
Oct. 30, 1875.
Wright v. Wightman.

CHARLES WILLIAM WRIGHT, Petitioner and Respondent.—M'Kechnie.
HELEN WIGHTMAN, Respondent and Appellant.—Rhind.

Lease—Dwelling-House—Hypothec—Obligation to Furnish—Sheriff.—The landlord of a house in a town presented a summary petition to the Sheriff to have the tenant ordained to plenish the house with sufficient furniture to secure the current year's rent, as also arrears of rent, and a sum payable along with the rent for hire of fittings, or to find caution for the same, and, failing the tenant obtempering the order, for a warrant to eject the tenant, and let the house. The tenant objected to the competency of the application, on the ground that it was virtually a declarator of irritancy of the lease not within the provisions of the A. S. 1756, and which the Sheriff had therefore no power to entertain. Held that the petition was competent in the Sheriff Court, but that the landlord was only entitled to be thus secured for the current year's rent.

Observed that the lease in such cases is not brought to an end by the warrant of ejectment.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian, &c.
I.

IN June 1875 Mr C. W. Wright presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, setting forth that he was proprietor of a dwelling-house and pertinents in Greenside Place, Edinburgh, which he had let to Mrs Wightman for three years from Whitsunday 1874 at a yearly rent of £30, payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday, with a further sum of £2 a-year, payable half-yearly along with the rent, for the use of fixtures and fittings situated in the house, and belonging to the petitioner; that at Whitsunday last Mrs Wightman was in arrear of rent; that he accordingly applied for sequestration, which was executed, and that, after deducting the net proceeds of the sale, there remained a balance of £17, 3s. 3d. of arrears still due to him; that Mrs Wightman was still in possession of the house, and at the present time there was not sufficient household effects and plenishing to pay the current rent, exclusive of the arrears due.

The prayer of the petition was "to order this petition to be served on the said Mrs Helen Wightman, and to appoint her to enter appearance and state defences within a certain short space, and thereafter, on resuming consideration of this petition, with or without appearance, to ordain the said respondent to plenish the said dwelling-house with furniture and other effects, so as to afford security sufficient in value equal to the sum of £32 sterling, and of the foresaid balance of £17, 3s. 3d., at the sight and to the satisfaction of a licensed appraiser to be named by your Lordship; and failing her doing so, or finding caution for said rent acted in your Lordship's Court, to grant warrant summarily to eject the respondent, her servants and dependants, goods, gear, furniture, and other effects, furth and from said dwelling-house and pertinents, and convey any furniture or other effects belonging to the respondent to a place of safe custody, there to remain subject to the petitioner's claims for rents, when an application for the sale thereof can be applied for; and further, to grant warrant to the petitioner to let the said dwelling-house and pertinents at such rent as he can procure therefor, to be applied pro tanto of any balance of any rent that may remain over unpaid after a sale of said effects; to grant warrant to open shut and lockfast places, so far as may be necessary for carrying into effect the warrants herein craved, and to find the respondent liable in the expenses of this application, and of all proceedings to follow thereon."

Mrs Wightman lodged a minute of defence, stating a counter claim to the extent of about £15, and a variety of other defences, but not objecting to the competency of the petition.

Upon 6th July 1875 the Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the closed record, ordains the respondent, within ten days from this date, to stock and plenish the premises in question with furniture and effects sufficient to afford security for the current year's rent thereof, amounting to £32 sterling, and for the balance of rent due at Whitsunday last, as set forth in the petition, and to produce a certificate under the hand of any licensed appraiser to that effect; or within said period to find good and sufficient caution acted in the Sheriff Court books for payment of said current year's rent, and also for said balance due at Whitsunday last, and to produce a certificate, under the hand of the Clerk of Court, to that effect, with certification that if she fail to stock and plenish, or find caution as aforesaid, warrant to eject will be granted, all as craved; meantime reserves further consideration of the cause."

Mrs Wightman appealed to the Sheriff (Davidson), who, on the 24th July 1875, adhered to the interlocutor of his Substitute, and renewed the order upon the respondent to plenish or find caution within ten days from that date (24th July).

Upon the 31st August 1875 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect the respondent, Mrs Helen Wightman, has not obtempered the last interlocutor of Court, of date 24th July last, grants warrant to summarily eject the respondent, all as craved, and to open doors if necessary: Finds the repondent liable in expenses of process."

The Sheriff adhered on appeal.

Mrs Wightman appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—The petition to the Sheriff was incompetent. It was virtually a declarator of irritancy of the lease, which the Sheriff had no power to entertain except under A. S. 1756.[1]

For the petitioner the undernoted authorities were cited.[2]

[1] Horn v. M'Lean, January 19, 1830, 8 S. 329, 2 Scot. Jur. 148; see Lord Cowan's opinion in M'Dougall v. Buchanan, Dec. 11, 1867, 6 Macph. 120, 40 Scot Jur. 67; and the Lord President's opinion in Lyon v. Irvine, Feb. 13, 1874, ante, vol. i. 512 (see p. 518).

[2] Adam v. M'Dougall, Feb. 5, 1830, 8 S. 457, 2 Scot. Jur. 213; Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, vol. ii. p. 133.

No. 16. At advising,—

Oct. 30, 1875. Wright v. Wightman.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises an important general question in regard to procedure in the Sheriff Courts. The prayer of the petition is as follows—(reads). The Sheriff ordered the party either to plenish or to find caution, and on her failure to do either he granted warrant to eject her, as craved. The first question is whether the Sheriff had jurisdiction to pronounce this order. It is maintained that the Sheriff had no right to bring a lease to an end, except under the Act of Sederunt of 1756, applicable to agricultural leases. I am quite satisfied that there is no foundation for this contention. We do not think it necessary to order any inquiry as to practice, and I have no doubt. Indeed, it would be impossible to carry out the relations between landlord and tenant in burghs if the Sheriff was not vested with such powers. There is nothing in the petition asking that the lease shall be put an end to, and there is certainly nothing in the warrant of ejectment to put an end to the lease. On the contrary, the authority to relet is in aid of bygone rents. It is not necessary to determine what the appellant's rights would be if she came forward at any time during the currency of the lease and paid up arrears and plenished the house. I am inclined to think she would be entitled to be reinstated in possession.

I think, therefore, the Sheriffs are right in principle, but there must be some change in the interlocutor. The arrears of rent and the £2 for hire of fittings ought not to have been included in the order for caution. They are mere ordinary debts, and must be recovered in the ordinary way. The result is that the appellant ought to have had the option to find security for £30, and I think she should still have that option. I propose that we should remit to the Sheriff to ordain the appellant to plenish the house with sufficient furniture to secure the current rent of £30, or in her option to find caution for that sum, and, if she fails to do so, to pronounce an order of ejectment.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion.

Two grounds were maintained in support of the appeal. In the first place, it was said that the only remedy competent in the Sheriff Court in such circumstances as the present was under the Act of Sederunt 1756, which has not been libelled on. But the Act of Sederunt is not applicable to the circumstances of the present case; and in particular it has no application to urban subjects. It applies exclusively to agricultural subjects. Accordingly, every one of the cases cited in the argument applied to farms. The next point maintained for the appellant, that which appeared to be chiefly relied on, was that the deliverance of the Sheriff complained of amounted to a rescission of the lease, and that a rescission of the lease was competent only in the Supreme Court. It would be very much to be lamented if we were obliged to give effect to such a plea as this in the circumstances of the present case, when the value of the action is so small, and it might have been smaller. But I am quite satisfied that the plea is ill-founded. The landlord in this case does not seek to rescind the lease. His object is rather to enforce it; not, certainly, to cut it down. It is the tenant—the appellant—who brings the lease practically to an end, because she will not do what reason and justice require, viz., plenish the subjects, or, if she prefers it, find caution for the rent. Applications like the present are, I believe, quite well known, and of frequent occurrence in the Sheriff Court. Accordingly, the minute of defence does not contain any objection whatever to the competency of the petition.

No. 16.

Oct. 30, 1875.
Wright v. Wightman.

The petitioner was not, however, entitled to security for the arrears of rent, and his counsel at once gave up that point. The sum also of £2 payable to the landlord as hire for the use of certain articles must be laid aside, the order to plenish or find caution being applicable only to the rent of the heritable subject, and not to the hire of moveables, which is merely a personal debt. I cannot doubt that this matter, as well as that relating to the arrears of rent, would have been set right by the Sheriff if they had been brought under his notice, which they do not appear to have been.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal: Find that the petition in this case is competent before the Sheriff: Recall the judgment complained of, in so far as the appellant is thereby ordained to plenish the premises in question to the extent, or to find caution for, the sum of £17, 3s. 3d., and the sum of £2, for which reserve the petitioner's claim and the appellant's answer thereto, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed in conformity with these findings: Find no expenses due to either party in this Court, and decern."

T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—D. MURRAY, L.A.—Agents.

No. 17.

Nov. 3, 1875.
Farquhar v. Farquhar's Executors.

JAMES FARQUHAR, First Party.—Asher.
MRS DIANA OCTAVIA SCOTT OR FARQUHAR AND OTHERS (Farquhar's Executors), Second Parties.—Fordyce.

Mortis Causa Settlement—Extrinsic Evidence.—In the construction of a will observed,—

1. That it was an important element of interpretation that the words of conveyance employed were not at the date of the will habile to convey heritage in Scotland, though they afterwards became so by a change in the law several years before the testator's death.

2. That instructions to prepare a mortis causa deed are not admissible in construing the deed as evidence of the testator's intention.

3. That deeds and holograph writings made subsequently are admissible as evidence.

2D DIVISION. R.

MR JAMES FARQUHAR, a domiciled Englishman, died on 8th March 1875, possessed of property of large amount in England, both heritable and moveable, and of the estate of Hall Green in Kincardineshire. He left a will in the English form, dated 6th October 1866, with six codicils of different dates between 1869 and 1875, by which he appointed his wife Mrs Farquhar, who survived him, and others, his trustees and executors.

The will contained the following clause:—"Whereas I am possessed of an estate in Scotland called Hall Green, and it is at present mortgaged or charged to the extent of £30,000 or thereabouts. Now, I do declare that it is my intention to free the said estate during my lifetime, but should I fail so to do then I give and bequeath unto my said son James Farquhar such a sum of money as will equal the amount of such mortgage or charge, and the interest thereof, as shall remain due at my decease. And as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects whatsoever, and wheresoever, I direct the same shall be divided into five equal parts; and as to one equal fifth part thereof I give and bequeath the same to my

No. 17.
Nov. 3, 1875.
Farquhar v. Farquhar's Executors.

said son James Farquhar." James was the testator's eldest son by his first marriage. Three of the remaining fifths were given to three other sons by the same marriage, and the other fifth (afterwards increased by codicil to a fourth) to the testator's children by his second marriage.

The whole debt affecting Hall Green was paid by the testator before his death.

Captain James Farquhar, the eldest son, of the first part, and the executors of the second part, presented this special case for the judgment of the Court, on the question whether the first party was entitled as heir-at-law ab intestato of his father to his heritable estate in Scotland, or whether said heritable estate was conveyed by the will and fell to be distributed as part of the residue.

The second parties maintained that the bequest of residue was sufficiently wide to include Hall Green, and that these lands were conveyed in respect of the provisions of sec. 20 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868.[1]

In support of his contention, Captain James Farquhar relied not only upon the terms of the will, but also upon certain facts and writings. The second parties denied that these could competently be taken into view in construing the will, and the facts and writings were set out, under reservation of their objections. They were as follows:—(1) Holograph instructions of the testator upon which his solicitor prepared his will, stating that the residuary clause was to apply only to "residuary personal estate." (2) Verbal statements made to various persons by the testator subsequently to making his will of his intention that Hall Green should go to his eldest son James. (3) Correspondence with his solicitor in Scotland, at the time when he was making the will, and with one of his executors, about making an entail of Hall Green on his heirs-male (which was never done). (4) Letter to his factor in 1873, in which he stated that he hoped Hall Green would go to his eldest son in due course of time.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think it is perfectly clear that when the testator here dealt with the residue of his estate and effects he did not mean this estate of Hall Green to be included, and that is quite sufficient for the decision of this case. I do not mean to say that the words, "I direct that the same shall be divided into five equal parts, and as to one equal fifth part thereof I give and bequeath the same," &c., are not quite habile to carry heritage in Scotland, if that had been included in the gift and bequest; but I am quite clear from the whole context that the words, "rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects" did not include, and were not intended to include it, and that the only construction the words admit of comes to that. In the first place, the immediately preceding clause deals with the estate in Scotland called Hall Green, and putting aside altogether the mode in which it was to be dealt with, I think the natural collocation of the words shews that when it comes to giving and bequeathing the rest of his estate, he means the rest exclusive of what he had already dealt with. But when we come to see what the instructions are in regard to Hall Green it seems to me that they are clearly inconsistent with the idea that the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects included Hall Green. He declares that it is his intention to free the estate during his lifetime, that is, according to the contention of the second parties, to give £30,000 to pay off the debt upon an estate which was to be divided upon his death into five equal parts,

[1] 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101.

[2] Glendonwyn v. Gordon, July 20, 1870, 8 Macph. 1075, 42 Scot. Jur. 630, H. of L. May 19, 1873, 11 Macph. 33, 45 Scot. Jur. 183.

No. 17.
Nov. 8, 1875.
Farquhar v. Farquhar's Executors.

and necessarily converted into money. But not only so; if he does not clear the estate, the result is to be that his eldest son James is to get £30,000—not a fifth part of the value of Hall Green, but £30,000. Therefore, it is perfectly clear that the rest, residue, and remainder of the estate did not include the estate of Hall Green; and therefore I do not think it necessary to go further into these words. In addition to that, although it is quite true that where the intention is plain, these words, although used before the statute came into operation, would be sufficient to sustain a conveyance of heritage, the testator having survived the passing of the Act, yet the fact of the conveyancer writing this deed at a date when the words would not have conveyed Scotch heritage is a most important fact in ascertaining the intention of the party. On the whole matter, therefore, I should be inclined not to go beyond the four corners of this settlement. I think the testator's intention of leaving Hall Green to descend according to law without conveyance is plain enough, and I am prepared to give effect to it.

In regard to the writings, I think there is a distinction. I do not think that writings prior to a settlement have, so far as I know, ever been admitted to construe the words used in the setttement, for very obvious reasons; and I have not given any weight to the instructions that have been founded on. The declarations of the testator after he had executed his deed are of considerably more importance, for he certainly is the man who knew best the meaning of the words he had used; and if the best witness says he meant one thing, it is a strong thing for a Court of law to say another. And, therefore, if I had been asked to give an opinion upon that question, as to the subsequent letters, I should have been inclined to take them into account, and if they are taken into account they are absolutely conclusive, and leave no doubt about the fact at all. I think that in judging of a question of intention it is a strong thing to leave out of view altogether that which may be the best evidence on the subject. But, apart from that, my opinion is that we should answer these questions in favour of the first party, and find that he is entitled as the heir-at-law ab intestato of his father to suceed to the estate of Hall Green.

LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. I think it may be quite clearly gathered from the words of the will itself that the estate of Hall Green was not intended to be conveyed. The testator did not mean to convey the estate of Hall Green to his English trustees, and when he spoke in his will of the "rest, residue, and remainder of my estate," he meant to exclude and did exclude the estate of Hall Green, of which he had immediately before been speaking. It is also of considerable importance that at the date of the will the words used were not such as could carry Scotch heritage.

As to extrinsic evidence, that is, evidence other than the will itself, it may be divided into three classes. 1. Instructions for the preparation of the deed,—I agree with your Lordship that these cannot be admitted in evidence, for the plain reason that they are liable and likely to be altered in the will itself. By revising the draft will, and even by considering and adopting the words of the extended deed, the testator may and does supersede or alter all previous instructions. The same principle is applicable to nearly all previous writings. 2. Subsequent writings, I mean writings of the testator or under the testator's hand subsequent to the date of his will,—I think it has been decided by the case of Glendonwyn that these may be looked at when they are formal deeds. But I am prepared to express my individual opinion that holograph writings of other descriptions may equally with formal deeds be taken into consideration. 3. Conversations of the testator in my opinion are not admissible, for that would be to control the written words of the testator by the uncertain recollection of his verbal expressions.

No. 17.
Nov. 3, 1875.
Farquhar v. Farquhar's Executors.

If the subsequent writings of the testator are to be looked to, as I think they are, these put an end in the present case to all doubt.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords are of opinion and find that the party of the first part is entitled as the heir-at-law ab intestato of his father, James Farquhar, to the whole heritable estate in Scotland which belonged to his said father at his death, and decern."

DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 18.
Nov. 5, 1875.
Noble v. Noble.

ALEXANDER NOBLE, Pursuer.—M'Laren—J. A. Reid.
ANDREW NOBLE AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Adam—Asher.

Writ—Subscription.—Held that it did not invalidate the subscription of the maker of a deed that he was assisted by having his hand held about the wrist, the hand not having been led in the formation of the letters.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

ALEXANDER NOBLE, fisherman, Fraserburgh, by disposition and assignation dated 25th November 1857, conveyed certain heritable subjects belonging to him in Fraserburgh to his second son Andrew. He died in 1861. In 1874 Alexander Noble junior, grandson and heir-at-law of the deceased Alexander Noble, brought an action of reduction of the deed, with conclusions for removing, and count and reckoning, against Andrew Noble, and George, a brother, to whom he had conveyed the subjects, with which a supplementary summons against one George Hay, who had acquired the right of George Noble, was conjoined.

The pursuer averred that at the date of the deed Alexander Noble senior was paralyzed, and wholly unable to write his name, and that his hand was led during the subscription. He pleaded that the disposition by Noble "being not his deed, his hand having been led during the pretended subscription thereof, was null."

On a proof, it appeared that Noble was an old man, and "very shaky." At one time he had been able to sign his name well, but had not done so for many years. John Dunlop, clerk to the solicitor who prepared the deed, deponed,—"He was very shaky at the time. He asked me if I would steady his hand, and I did so. I steadied it by taking him by the wrist. (Q.) Was it above the wrist? (A.) I really cannot particularise at this date exactly where I placed my hand, but it was so as to steady his hand while he made his signature. (Q.) You think, from what you remember, that it was by the wrist? (A.) I should not have the slightest hesitation in saying so; but I would not have taken hold of it otherwise, as I should have been leading his hand." Fraser, another clerk, an instrumentary witness, deponed,—"Dunlop steadied his hand while he wrote his name, so far as I recollect. (Q.) Am I right in understanding you to mean that Dunlop placed his hand upon Noble's? (A.) I think so; he steadied it. (Q.) In order to steady it what did he do? (A.) I believe he placed his hand over Noble's hand. . . . . Do you think that the hand was guided at all? (A.) My impression is that it was, but I could not say distinctly at this distance of time." Mowat, also a clerk, the other instrumentary witness, deponed,—"The granter's hand was not

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1875.
Noble v. Noble.

led or assisted in adhibiting his signature otherwise than that Mr John Dunlop steadied it by holding his arm above the wrist. To the best of my recollection, all that Mr Dunlop did was simply to steady the arm of the granter when adhibiting the signature."

The testator took a long time to sign, some witnesses said ten minutes, others a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes.

It was clearly proved and not disputed that Noble intended to convey his property in terms of the deed to his second son.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in point of fact—(1) That the pursuer is the nearest and lawful heir in general of the deceased Alexander Noble senior, alias 'Joseph;' (2) that the said deceased Alexander Noble senior was, on the 25th day of November 1857, being the date of the disposition and assignation (first) sought to be reduced, unable to sign his name without assistance; (3) that while the said Alexander Noble senior was writing his name at the end of said disposition and assignation John Dunlop, then a clerk in the office of Lewis Chalmers, the law-agent who had prepared said deed, held the said Alexander Noble's hand about the wrist, and supported his said hand, and assisted him to write his name; (4) that the defenders have failed to prove that any consideration was given by the defender Andrew Noble, alias 'Joseph,' for the said diposition and assignation being granted in his favour; and (5) that no consideration was given by the defender George Noble, alias 'Gunner,' or by the defender George Hay, for the disposition and assignation (second) sought to be reduced being granted in favour of the said George Noble: Finds in law that the said dispositions and assignations are null and void or reducible: Therefore, in both the conjoined actions, decerns in terms of the conclusions for reduction, declarator, and removing."*

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . Now, the question is, in that state of matters, was there such assistance given by Dunlop to Alexander Noble in signing this deed as to nullify it? There is no case, so far as I am aware, precisely the same as this, but there are circumstances in two of the reported cases, viz., Moncrieff v. Monypenny, July 15, 1710, M. p. 15,936, affirmed, Robertson, p. 26, and Falconer v. Arbuthnot, January 9, 1751, M. p. 16,817, and Elchies, voce Writ, No. 26, which are very similar to those of the present case. The fullest and best report of the facts of Falconer v. Arbuthnot is contained in the report by Elchies, from which it appears that sundry bonds were granted at different times, some at one month and some at two months before her death by a lady who was blind or paralytic and shaky. The subscription of the old lady being quarrelled, it was proved that in granting any receipts to tenants she was in use so far to take the assistance of her son, who commonly led her hand. As to the bonds quarrelled, some of the witnesses said that he held her by the wrist; others that his hand was upon hers; others that he only held the end of the pen. None of the witnesses heard the bonds read over to her, but she said to them that the papers had been read to her, and therefore she desired them to witness her subscription. But as she was so blind that she could not read any of them herself, and for anything that appeared in the proof bonds of another tenor, or for different sums, might have been read, so that there was no evidence that she knew what was signed, the Court reduced them all. Now, in that case it was not proved distinctly what the amount of interference was, but it was one of three things—either that the wrist was held, or that the hand was held, or that the pen was held. And the mere taking by the wrist seems to have been considered as sufficient assistance to prevent the signature from being held as the true signature of the party. In the case of Moncrieff v. Monypenny it appears from the report in Morr. p. 15,936, that the granter, George Moncrieff, had signed his Christian name 'George' and 'Mon,' the first three letters of 'Moncrieff,' and that he could not from weakness finish the subscription, where-

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1875. Noble v. Noble.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—It was not a sufficient ground to reduce a will that the testator received assistance in subscribing, unless his hand was led in forming the letters. Noble's hand was not led. The cases founded on by the Lord Ordinary did not support his conclusion, because in Moncrieff v. Monypenny it was proved that the hand was led, and in Falconer v. Arbuthnot the ground of judgment was that the maker of the deeds was blind.

---

upon the writer of the deed assisted him. The depositions of the witnesses as to what was the actual amount of assistance given are not set forth in the report, but the judgment seems to have proceeded upon this, that he was assisted by the hand being steadied or supported. In the argument for the pursuer, which was sustained by the Court, the defender's argument, which was repelled, is thus commented on :—'As to the pretence that fixing his arm could not direct his fingers, whose motion only frames the letters, they oppone the witnesses' depositions that he could not have perfected the subscription without that' —i.e., without fixing the arm—'for he began to stagger, and the syllable "Mon" is a downright scribble.' The Lords having advised the depositions and debate, sustained the reasons of reduction, and found them both relevant and proved, and therefore reduced the testament. The interlocutor is given in the report of the appeal case, Robertson's Appeals, p. 26, whereby on 15th November 1710 the Court found 'that the testator did not complete his subscription, but that his hand wavering he was supported by the writer, who assisted him to write the last syllable, and therefore declared said will null and void.' In the appellant's argument, where he is treating of the evidence, he says that the will had been written out according to the directions of Moncrieff; but Watson, who was the writer of the deed, perceiving his hand to waver, took him by the 'shackle bone,' and supported his hand while he wrote the rest of his name. Nevertheless, the Court found that the taking of him by the 'shackle bone,' and supporting him by the hand while he wrote his name, was such assistance as to compel them to declare the deed null and void.

"Now, I think that these judgments, and also the judgments in other cases, which will be found noted in Menzies, p. 105, all proceed upon general grounds of policy, viz., that it is extremely dangerous to allow any interference with a person in the act of signing a deed. It is not necessary to hold that a general support may not be given to the body of the granter; he may be propped up with pillows, or perhaps even supported by the arm of another, so as to enable him to assume an attitude convenient for writing, but any interference with or approach to his hand is an amount of assistance which the law will not tolerate. It is obviously impossible to draw the line nicely between support to the wrist and support to the hand, and if the hand of another approaches, or is in contact with the hand of the party who is supposed to execute the deed, there is room for a very great deal of dangerous manipulation. The duty of the agent of the granter in such a case is to call in the assistance of notaries in terms of the statute. It is said that the granter of the deed in question, Alexander Noble, had given instructions beforehand for the preparation of the deed, and that several people knew that he had intended to make this disposition of his property; but that goes for nothing. In the report of the case of Falconer v. Arbuthnot, in Morrison, 16,817, it is stated that the bonds were reduced, 'notwithstanding the deeds appeared rational, and that some evidence was brought of her previous intention to give some donations to her grandchildren.' And it will also be found that that case proceeded upon this general ground, that the Court would not enter upon the question whether there had been any imposition upon the part of the beneficiaries, and that interference with parties signing deeds cannot be allowed: 'The Lords were in noways moved by the argument brought by the pursuer to prove imposition, but they thought there was the utmost danger in sustaining these deeds in those circumstances, whatever reasons there might be to think there was no imposition in the case; yet the law suspected, and even presumed it.' . . . ."

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1875.
Noble v. Noble.

The pursuer argued that the rule of law was that if the maker of the deed was physically unable to write without assistance the only legal course was to call in notaries. The cases went beyond the doctrine that actual leading was necessary. For example, in Moncrieff v. Monypenny, the interlocutor quoted by the Lord Ordinary shewed that assistance given by only supporting the hand was a sufficient ground of reduction.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come, without much difficulty, to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor cannot stand, and the considerations which have chiefly influenced me in doing so may be briefly stated.

In the first place, it appears to me to be clearly established that there was no improper motive or conduct on the part of any of those who were present at the execution of the deed or on the part of those persons in whose favour it was granted. If there had been room for suspecting fraud or undue influence that would have been a very material element in the case. But it was distinctly admitted at the bar that the deed is in the terms in which the granter desired to make it, and that the granter had not been tampered with by any one.

Another important consideration to be attended to is the distance of time which has elapsed since the granter's death before there was any challenge of the deed. The pursuer lived in the same place, and we must, I think, take it that the deed was seen soon afterwards by the pursuer himself, as well as others interested, or who supposed they might be interested in it. But the pursuer allows fourteen years to pass without challenging it. If, therefore, there is any defect or obscurity in the evidence, or any failure in the memory of the witnesses, he is answerable for it, and must blame himself for the consequences.

Keeping these considerations in view, what was the issue which the pursuer undertook and was bound to establish? It was that the settlement in question was not the deed of the granter, and the Lord Ordinary has found that the witness Dunlop "held his hand about the wrist, and supported his hand and assisted him to write his name," and on this ground the deed has been set aside. Now, I am willing to take Dunlop's own account of the matter, and he must have known better than any one else what took place. He says,—"I really cannot particularise at this date exactly where I placed my hand, but it was so as to steady his hand when he made his signature." Then, when he is asked, "You think from what you remember that it was by the wrist?" he replies, "I should not have the slightest hesitation in saying so; but I would not have taken hold of it otherwise, as I should have been leading his hand." He thus acted at the time on the distinction between leading and steadying the hand of the granter in writing his name. On the authorities there is, I think, room for that distinction. I think you may steady a man's hand provided that you do not lead it in the formation of the letters. Some degree of support and assistance, it is conceded, may legitimately be given. In the well known case of Lord Fife (1 Sh. App. 498), who was blind, another person put down his finger, which he, Lord Fife, felt for and wrote his name at the place where he found it. In this way Lord Fife was assisted in executing the deed, and without some such assistance he, being perfectly blind, could not have subscribed the deed. But that was not held to invalidate the signature. In short, if the assistance stops short of guiding or leading the hand in the formation of the letters, or some of them, it ought not to found a good objection to the execution of a deed. In the present case I do not think on the evidence that the assistance did amount to that.

No. 18.
Nov. 5, 1875.
Noble v. Noble.

Indeed, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to guide or lead a man's hand or fingers in forming the letters of his signature by merely taking hold of his wrist. In the case of Moncrieff v. Monypenny, as I read the report of it, there was leading of the hand, and it was on that ground that the deed was not sustained. In Falconer v. Arbuthnot it seems to have been held that because the party was blind she could not subscribe a deed, but that is no longer sound law according to more recent decisions, and, especially, the case of the Earl of Fife, as decided in the House of Lords. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary has allowed himself to be too much influenced by the cases cited in his note, which had reference to a time when the art of writing was comparatively less known and practised than it is now, and when fraudulent attempts were more frequently made to impetrate deeds from persons who could not write than in more recent times.

For the reasons I have now stated, and after a careful examination of the whole evidence, I am of opinion that no sufficient cause has been established for reducing the deed in question on the very technical ground on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded, and therefore I think his interlocutor ought to be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

Lord Gifford.—I have come to be of the same opinion, after very anxious consideration. I was at first much moved by the reasons assigned by the Lord Ordinary for his judgment, and the authorities quoted in support of it, but on a closer examination of the case and of the authorities I have become satisfied that there is no good objection to the signature of the late Alexander Noble.

On the evidence it seems to me to be proved that the hand of the testator at the time the signature was affixed was not led, but only that it was supported. I think the distinction between these two things is a sound one, and that mere support to the hand or arm, which does not control the formation of the letters of the testator's name, does not affect the validity of the subscription. But, while I take this distinction, I can imagine cases in which the Court would easily reach the conclusion that something more than support had been given, notwithstanding the disavowal of the person who assisted. For example, if there was discrepancy in the spelling or the formation of the letters from the granter's usual style. In all such cases it is a question of evidence, a question of fact, that question being, did the testator form the letters of his own signature, or were the letters formed by another guiding hand? It seems to be conceded that some degree of support or assistance may be given without affecting the validity of a subscription. And it is easy to suppose cases in which the person assisting did not even know the testator's name, or that the signature was so peculiar and characteristic that it could only have been made by the testator himself.

I think, therefore, that the distinction between supporting and leading is sound, and that the result of the evidence in the present case seems to me to be that the assistance given was not of such a character as to prevent Noble from signing effectually. On this point I am disposed to believe the evidence of John Dunlop, by whom the testator's hand is alleged to have been led, and of Magnus Mowat, one of the instrumentary witnesses. Both these witnesses distinctly negative the allegation that the testator's hand was led in the sense that he did not himself form the letters of his signature, and I do not think their evidence is shaken by the very doubtful evidence of James Fraser, the other

No. 18.

Nov. 5, 1875.
Noble v. Noble.

instrumentary witness, who, at the strongest, can only speak to an impression which he has formed, he cannot well say when.

When narrowly looked at none of the cases conflict with this view. Moncrieff v. Monypenny is the strongest. But, notwithstanding some ambiguous expressions in the reports, both in this Court and in the House of Lords, it appears that the last part of the signature was made by guiding the hand.

If the matter were doubtful the considerations referred to by Lord Ormidale would come in. If the evidence is weakened by the time that has elapsed, the pursuer is to blame for it. The objection is purely technical. There is no doubt whatever of the true intention of the disponer. There is no suggestion of fraud, and in the whole circumstances there arises a very strong presumption in favour of the deed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have come to the same conclusion without much hesitation, although not quite on the same grounds as your Lordships. I think there is no doubt upon the evidence that the man's wrist was held by Dunlop for some ten minutes or quarter of an hour. Further, I cannot say that the Lord Ordinary has gone wrong upon the authorities. In Moncrieff v. Monypenny I see no reason to doubt that the fact which was disputed and was proved was the same as has been proved in this case. It does not appear that the hand was led. Holding the wrist was dealt with as the material fact. But I am not prepared to follow the case of Moncrieff. I think it inapplicable to the present state of society. I am far from saying that holding the wrist of the writer is the same thing as only supporting him, because mere support does not contribute to the formation of the signature. The serious question is, whether, when the assistance is such that it can control the writing, that fact is enough to vitiate the subscription. I think it is not if it be made clear that there was no intention to guide the hand, and in this case it is in my opinion proved on the evidence that there was no such intention. Even if Dunlop assisted involuntarily in the formation of the letters, which is extremely probable, I do not think that is enough to vitiate the subscription.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor, and assoilzie the several defenders from the conclusions of the respective summonses against them, and decern: Find the pursuer liable in expenses to all the defenders," &c.

DAVID WILSON, S.S.C.—PEARSON, ROBERTSON, & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

JAMES M'CONNACHIE, Pursuer and Respondent.—Balfour—Jameson.
THE GREAT NORTH OF SCOTLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Asher.

Reparation—Railway—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 31), sec. 7—"Just and Reasonable Condition"—Detention of Perishable Goods.—A railway company gave consignors of fish the option of having their goods carried at a rate lower than the ordinary rate for fish, upon condition of the consignor undertaking by special contract to relieve the company of all liability for delay, except upon proof that the detention "arose from the wilful fault or negligence of the company's servants."

A fish-curer on two different days delivered consignments of fresh fish to the company to be forwarded, according to his practice, under the special contract. In consequence of an intermittent block at a junction arising from a diversion

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875. M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

of traffic caused by a break down on another company's line, which had taken place a few days before the first consignment was despatched, both consignments were detained on their way to market, and damaged. Held that the special contract was just and reasonable within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, and had the effect of throwing upon the pursuer the burden of proving fault on the part of the company; but upon the evidence (dub. Lord Gifford as to the first consignment), that fault had been proved against the company, in respect that while the pressure of traffic at the junction could have been foreseen, and while the block had in fact commenced the night before the first consignment was sent off, they had failed to make sufficient arrangements for securing the despatch of perishable goods, and further that they had neglected to warn the consignor, when they received the goods, that the line had been blocked, and that the goods were in danger of being delayed in transmission.

Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that temporary or accidental detention from unexpected pressure of traffic is a risk incidental to railway traffic, and one of which the customer must to a certain extent take his chance, but that the case is different when the causes of probable detention are known and foreseen, and are not specifically disclosed to the customer when his goods are accepted.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Elgin, &c. I.

JAMES M'CONNACHIE, fish-curer in Lossiemouth, brought this action in the Sheriff Court of Elgin against the Great North of Scotland Railway Company for the damage sustained by him through the defenders' failure timeously to deliver in Glasgow certain quantities of fish.

The following facts were admitted or proved:—

The pursuer had been in the habit of despatching consignments of fish to Glasgow by the defenders' line to Aberdeen and thence by the Caledonian Railway by Perth to Glasgow, and usually the fish despatched from Lossiemouth one morning arrived in Glasgow the morning after.

On 17th September 1873 the Bridge of Dun on the Caledonian line, between Aberdeen and Perth, was carried away by a flood, and the traffic was suspended for about ten days, and in consequence the defenders, who had also a line from Lossiemouth by Craigellachie, along Speyside, to join the Highland line at Boat of Garten, carried their traffic in the interval by that route, the Highland Railway carrying it on to Perth.

On 23d September, six days after the Bridge of Dun had been carried away, the pursuer sent a consignment of fresh fish by the defenders' line, which ought to have arrived in Glasgow next morning, but did not arrive until the 26th. He sent a second consignment on the 24th, which was duly delivered next morning. He sent a third consignment on the 25th which was not delivered till the 27th. The first and third consignments were rendered unsaleable by the delay, and their value was the damage sued for in the present action.

The defenders had two rates of carriage for fish from Lossiemouth to Glasgow, the ordinary rate of 42s. 6d. per ton, and a cheaper rate of 31s. 6d. per ton. If the customer wished his goods to be carried at the cheaper rate he was required to sign a risk note in the following terms:—"To the Great North of Scotland Railway Company.—Deliver as under the undermentioned goods, to be carried at the reduced rate below the company's ordinary rate; in consideration whereof I undertake to relieve the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, and all other companies over whose lines the goods may pass, from all liability in case of loss, damage, or delay, except upon proof that such loss, detention, or injury arose from wilful fault or negligence on the part of the company's servants.

"When, for the convenience of senders, the company book goods to stations on other lines, shipping companies, or other public carriers, they do so at the sole risk of the owners, and subject to the rules and regulations of such companies and carriers; but they do not undertake to forward or deliver goods in time for any particular conveyance or for any particular market. They only undertake to deliver goods within a reasonable time, and they will not entertain claims for compensation for alleged loss occasioned by late delivery. If consignor desires the articles to be conveyed by passenger train, the words 'per passenger train' must be written across the face of this note, and initialed by the party."

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

The pursuer was in the habit of sending his fish at the lower rate, and in regard to both the consignments in question the "risk notes" were duly signed by the pursuer's foreman on his behalf. Both lots were ticketed as "perishable."

In consequence of the break down on the Caledonian line the goods traffic on the defenders' Craigellachie branch, which was a single line, was increased about ten-fold. The result was that the number of waggons which came up to Boat of Garten from Craigellachie gradually became unmanageable. The Highland Railway gave the preference to goods coming by their own line from the north, while the defenders' waggons were shunted into sidings waiting for their turn. In this way it happened that trucks containing perishable goods, and amongst others the pursuer's fish, got to the end of sidings, from whence they could not easily be extricated. Waggons arriving later were sometimes shunted in front of waggons arriving earlier, and thus the latest comers sometimes went on first.

David Shaw, stationmaster at Boat of Garten, deponed,—"All the officials at Boat of Garten are in service both of defenders and of Highland Railway, and the station is a joint station. We sent forward all the defenders' traffic, up to and including Sunday 21st September, and it was on the night of Monday the 22d that we began to get blocked. We did not get the station clear that night. The traffic up Speyside then got heavier. In ordinary circumstances, we sort the trains as they arrive. If we had had engine power I believe we could have sorted the trains and kept the station clear as before, but we had not enough of engine power. With the exception of some Caledonian engines sent north from Perth the Highland Railway did all the engine work south of Boat of Garten. The defenders did none of it. The additional assistance I had during the block consisted of two porters, a number-taker, and a clerk."

James Imlah, guard of the Speyside train by which the pursuer's fish travelled, gave evidence to the like effect. "Interrogated, Could any special waggon have been picked out? Depones, Yes; but it might have taken about three-quarters of an hour, and I do not think there was time for this, there were so many trains running."

The block continued for three or four days, though it appeared that it was partially relieved upon the 24th.

Immediately upon the occurrence of the accident at Bridge of Dun the defenders had sent circulars to their station-agents informing them of the fact, and with directions for the conduct of the traffic. The stationmaster at Lossiemouth deponed,—"As soon as I got it (the circular) I informed the traders, and among them I informed the pursuer. We had a conversation about it. Our talk was about the difference it would make in the traffic, but I don't think we anticipated any stoppage." No intimation was, however, sent to the stationmaster of the block at Boat of Garten, and according to his evidence he did not know of the block till the pursuer complained to him of the fish in question having been delayed. The pursuer received no information before sending off either consignment that there was any stoppage on the line.

The Highland Railway had a station at Elgin, six miles from Lossiemouth. It was proved that goods sent by the Highland Railway from Elgin via Forres were forwarded to the south at this time without detention.

No. 12.

Nov. 4, 1876.
M'Cammon v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia:—3. The alleged delay complained of not being attributable to the defenders or to those for whom they are responsible, but having arisen from circumstances over which they had no control, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied. 4. The pursuer having by the special written contract produced undertaken, in respect of his goods being carried at a reduced rate, to relieve the defenders and all other companies over whose lines the various goods in question might pass from all liability in the event of "delay," except upon proof that such detention arose from wilful fault or negligence on the part of the railway servants, and the alleged delay not having arisen from any such fault or negligence, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied.*

The Sheriff-substitute (D. M'Leod Smith) pronounced an interlocutor of which the principal findings were as follows:—"Finds that the defenders have failed to shew that the causes of delay beyond the usual periods of transit were reasonable or necessary: Finds, separatim, that there was a block or interruption of traffic in operation more or less continuously on the defenders' line at or about the times when they received the pursuer's goods as aforesaid, and that the defenders so received and undertook to carry the same on the usual footing without disclosing to or informing the pursuer that there was any risk of delay to his goods from such block or interruption: Finds in law, in the whole circumstances, that the limitations contained in the notes Nos. 52 and 53 of process of the ordinary legal liabilities of the defenders are not just and reasonable, and that the defenders are liable for the damages sued for as adjusted by the said minute: Therefore repels the defences, decerns against the defenders for the said sums, amounting together to the sum of £78, 0s. 9d. sterling, with interest thereon, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to his expenses," &c.

The Sheriff (B. R. Bell), upon appeal, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds in fact that the pursuer, at the times and places set forth in the summons, delivered to the defenders the fish stated in the summons: Finds that the defenders undertook and engaged to convey the same in due course, and to deliver them in proper time in Glasgow: Finds that they failed to perform this undertaking: Finds that this failure was caused by the defenders voluntarily and knowingly undertaking to carry a quantity of goods greater than it was possible they could carry, or if not so, then by their voluntarily omitting to send forward the pursuer's fish, which were duly ticketed as "perishable," in advance of goods not perishable: Finds that the pursuer thereby suffered loss to the amount of £78, 0s. 9d. sterling: Finds in law that the defenders are liable to the pursuer in the said amount, as also for expenses of process," &c.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellants;—Even at common law the liability of

* Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7.—"Every such company as aforesaid shall be liable for the loss of, or for any injury done to, any horses, cattle, or other animals, or to any other articles, goods, or things, in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto, or in anywise limiting such liability; every such notice, condition, or limitation being hereby declared to be null and void; provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the said companies from making such conditions with respect to receiving, forwarding, or delivering of any of the said animals, articles, goods, or things as shall be adjudged by the Court or Judge before whom any question relating thereto shall be tried, to be just and reasonable."

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

carriers did not embrace a guarantee against delay in transit.[1] At all events the effect of the special contract was to throw the burden upon the customer of proving that the delay was caused by the fault of the company.[2] No tangible fault had been proved in this case. It was not enough to say that something might possibly have been done which would have prevented the detention.

Argued for the pursuer;—Even assuming the special contract to be effectual, fault or negligence had been sufficiently proved. The defenders ought to have provided sufficient engine power at Boat of Garten for marshalling the trains so as to give perishable goods the preference.[3] The cessation of traffic between Perth and Aberdeen would have enabled them to get any number of Caledonian engines. But even if the block at Boat of Garten was unavoidable, they ought to have telegraphed the state of matters to Lossiemouth on the night of the 22d or morning of the 23d, and warned the pursuer of the risk of delay.[4]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a question as to the responsibility of railway companies as carriers under somewhat special and unusual circumstances. The respondent, who is a fish-curer in Lossiemouth, had been in the habit of despatching consignments of fish to the Glasgow market by the line of the appellants via Aberdeen and the Caledonian Railway to Perth and Glasgow. On the 17th September 1873 the Bridge of Dun on the Caledonian line was carried away by a flood, and the traffic on that line was suspended for a period of about ten days, and in consequence the appellants, who had also a branch to Craigellachie to join the Highland line at Boat of Garten, carried their traffic in the interval by that route, the Highland line carrying it on to Perth. On the 23d of September, being six days after the Bridge of Dun had been carried away, the respondent sent a consignment of fish by the appellants' line, which ought to have arrived the next morning in Glasgow. They did not so arrive until the 26th. He sent a second consignment on the 24th which was duly delivered on the 25th. He sent a third consignment on the 25th which was not delivered until the 27th. He now sues for the value of the first and the last consignments, which, it is admitted, were rendered unsaleable by the delay. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff decided in favour of the respondent, and we are now to consider their judgment.

The appellants plead, in the first instance, that they had a special contract with the respondent, which was in the following terms:—"To the Great North of Scotland Railway Company.—Deliver as under the undermentioned goods, to be carried at the reduced rate below the company's ordinary rate; in consideration whereof I undertake to relieve the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, and all other companies over whose lines the goods may pass, from all liability in case of loss, damage, or delay, except upon proof that such loss, detention, or injury arose from wilful fault or negligence on the part of the company's servants.

---

[1] Finlay v. North British Railway Co., July 8, 1870, 8 Macph. 959, 42 Scot. Jur. 552 (see opinion of Lord President); Anderson v. North British Railway Co. (2d branch), Feb. 18, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 443.

[2] Finlay v. North British Railway Co., supra.

[3] Macdonald and Co. v. Highland Railway Co., May 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 614, 45 Scot. Jur. 391.

[4] Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 18, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 623.

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The alleged delay complained of not being attributable to the defenders, or to those for whom they are responsible, but having arisen from circumstances over which they had no control, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied. (4) The pursuer having, by the special written contracts produced, undertaken, in respect of his goods being carried at a reduced rate, to relieve the defenders and all other companies over whose lines the various goods in question might pass from all liability in the event of "delay," except upon proof that such detention arose from wilful fault or negligence on the part of the railway servants, and the alleged delay not having arisen from any such fault or negligence, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied.*

The Sheriff-substitute (D. M'Leod Smith) pronounced an interlocutor of which the principal findings were as follows:—"Finds that the defenders have failed to shew that the causes of delay beyond the usual periods of transit were reasonable or necessary: Finds, separatim, that there was a block or interruption of traffic in operation more or less continuously on the defenders' line at or about the times when they received the pursuer's goods as aforesaid, and that the defenders so received and undertook to carry the same on the usual footing without disclosing to or informing the pursuer that there was any risk of delay to his goods from such block or interruption: Finds in law, in the whole circumstances, that the limitations contained in the notes Nos. 5/2 and 5/3 of process of the ordinary legal liabilities of the defenders are not just and reasonable, and that the defenders are liable for the damages sued for as adjusted by the said minute: Therefore repels the defences, decerns against the defenders for the said sums, amounting together to the sum of £78, 0s. 9d. sterling, with interest thereon, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to his expenses," &c.

The Sheriff (B. R. Bell), upon appeal, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds in fact that the pursuer, at the times and places set forth in the summons, delivered to the defenders the fish stated in the summons: Finds that the defenders undertook and engaged to convey the same in due course, and to deliver them in proper time in Glasgow: Finds that they failed to perform this undertaking: Finds that this failure was caused by the defenders voluntarily and knowingly undertaking to carry a quantity of goods greater than it was possible they could carry, or if not so, then by their voluntarily omitting to send forward the pursuer's fish, which were duly ticketed as "perishable," in advance of goods not perishable: Finds that the pursuer thereby suffered loss to the amount of £78, 0s. 9d. sterling: Finds in law that the defenders are liable to the pursuer in the said amount, as also for expenses of process," &c.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellants;—Even at common law the liability of

* Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7.—"Every such company as aforesaid shall be liable for the loss of, or for any injury done to, any horses, cattle, or other animals, or to any other articles, goods, or things, in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto, or in anywise limiting such liability; every such notice, condition, or limitation being hereby declared to be null and void; provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the said companies from making such conditions with respect to receiving, forwarding, or delivering of any of the said animals, articles, goods, or things as shall be adjudged by the Court or Judge before whom any question relating thereto shall be tried, to be just and reasonable."

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

carriers did not embrace a guarantee against delay in transit.[1] At all events the effect of the special contract was to throw the burden upon the customer of proving that the delay was caused by the fault of the company.[2] No tangible fault had been proved in this case. It was not enough to say that something might possibly have been done which would have prevented the detention.

Argued for the pursuer;—Even assuming the special contract to be effectual, fault or negligence had been sufficiently proved. The defenders ought to have provided sufficient engine power at Boat of Garten for marshalling the trains so as to give perishable goods the preference.[3] The cessation of traffic between Perth and Aberdeen would have enabled them to get any number of Caledonian engines. But even if the block at Boat of Garten was unavoidable, they ought to have telegraphed the state of matters to Lossiemouth on the night of the 22d or morning of the 23d, and warned the pursuer of the risk of delay.[4]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a question as to the responsibility of railway companies as carriers under somewhat special and unusual circumstances. The respondent, who is a fish-curer in Lossiemouth, had been in the habit of despatching consignments of fish to the Glasgow market by the line of the appellants via Aberdeen and the Caledonian Railway to Perth and Glasgow. On the 17th September 1873 the Bridge of Dun on the Caledonian line was carried away by a flood, and the traffic on that line was suspended for a period of about ten days, and in consequence the appellants, who had also a branch to Craigellachie to join the Highland line at Boat of Garten, carried their traffic in the interval by that route, the Highland line carrying it on to Perth. On the 23d of September, being six days after the Bridge of Dun had been carried away, the respondent sent a consignment of fish by the appellants' line, which ought to have arrived the next morning in Glasgow. They did not so arrive until the 26th. He sent a second consignment on the 24th which was duly delivered on the 25th. He sent a third consignment on the 25th which was not delivered until the 27th. He now sues for the value of the first and the last consignments, which, it is admitted, were rendered unsaleable by the delay. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff decided in favour of the respondent, and we are now to consider their judgment.

The appellants plead, in the first instance, that they had a special contract with the respondent, which was in the following terms:—"To the Great North of Scotland Railway Company.—Deliver as under the undermentioned goods, to be carried at the reduced rate below the company's ordinary rate; in consideration whereof I undertake to relieve the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, and all other companies over whose lines the goods may pass, from all liability in case of loss, damage, or delay, except upon proof that such loss, detention, or injury arose from wilful fault or negligence on the part of the company's servants.

---

[1] Finlay v. North British Railway Co., July 8, 1870, 8 Macph. 959, 42 Scot. Jur. 552 (see opinion of Lord President); Anderson v. North British Railway Co. (2d branch), Feb. 18, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 443.

[2] Finlay v. North British Railway Co., supra.

[3] Macdonald and Co. v. Highland Railway Co., May 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 614, 45 Scot. Jur. 391.

[4] Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 18, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 623.

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

"When, for the convenience of senders, the company book goods to stations on other lines, shipping companies, or other public carriers, they do so at the sole risk of the owners, and subject to the rules and regulations of such companies and carriers; but they do not undertake to forward or deliver goods in time for any particular conveyance or for any particular market. They only undertake to deliver goods within a reasonable time, and they will not entertain claims for compensation for alleged loss occasioned by late delivery. If consignor desires the articles to be conveyed by passenger train, the words 'per passenger train' must be written across the face of this note, and initialed by the party."

They maintain that under this contract it is incumbent on the respondent to prove that the delay arose from the fault or negligence of the appellants. To the extent to which this plea was maintained from the bar I entirely accede to it. It was maintained that it placed the burden of proving fault or negligence on the customer. I think it does so, and that, as the goods of the customer were carried at a lower rate in consequence of this stipulation, it was one entirely reasonable.

But then it merely places the burden on the customer, and it is a burden which may easily shift according to the circumstances, and the question which arises in the present case is whether the appellant has not sufficiently sustained this burden and transferred to his opponents the duty of exonerating themselves.

While the contract unquestionably lays the proof of fault or negligence on the respondent, it does not liberate the appellants from their primary duties as carriers. They are still bound to carry the goods of their customers safely, and they are bound to provide sufficient appliances in carriages, engine power, and otherwise, to enable them to do so. In the present instance there was no unexpected or unforeseen cause which intervened. Whatever might have been the case on the 18th, on the 22d they knew, when they undertook to carry the goods of the respondent, that they were to carry them by a new and overcrowded line. They were bound to take such measures as were within their power to secure their safe transit by that line quite as much as they were when they carried by the former line. They were also bound in the case of perishable goods to carry them in preference to goods not perishable. As might have been expected a great and nearly unmanageable amount of traffic arrived day by day at Boat of Garten Station; and the real cause of detention arose, as is very clearly proved, from the Highland Railway giving a preference to goods attached to their own trains, while the goods which came by the appellants' line were shunted into sidings, and from want of sufficient engine power to marshal the trains and separate the trucks containing perishable goods from the others the latest comers went on instead of the earlier. Thus, while the goods sent on the 23d were not delivered till the 26th, those sent on the 24th were delivered on the 25th. It appears farther that a block occurred on the 22d, and another on the 25th at Boat of Garten.

It will thus be observed that this is not a case in which any unforeseen event delayed the delivery of the goods. On the contrary, the event which did occur, namely, the block on the line, was one which the railway were bound to have foreseen, not only because a block had occurred the day before these goods were received, but also because from the nature of the traffic on the line it was a very probable contingency. The appellants were bound either to have taken measures against this occurrence, if such were in their power, or to have warned

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

the respondent that such was not within their power. That they failed in one or other of these obligations seems quite clear from the proof.

In the first place, it is sufficiently proved by the witness Shaw, that the whole delay of these perishable goods would or might probably have been averted if there had been sufficient engine power at Boat of Garten Station to assist in marshalling the trains in the sidings. I think the appellants were as much bound to have engine power for this purpose as they were bound to provide engine power for the ordinary conveyance of goods. It was as much part of their contract to provide it, if it were necessary to secure the due transit and delivery of the commodities; and the respondent by proving that this engine power was not provided, proves fault on the part of the appellants. Even if the latter had proved that they could not obtain sufficient engine power, this would only shew that they had made a contract which they were unable to perform. But they have proved nothing on the subject. On the contrary, I think that it is sufficiently established that they made no such effort as the emergency demanded to overcome the difficulty. But, secondly, if they did endeavour to obtain engine power and failed, they were certainly bound to have given notice to the respondent when they accepted his goods that they could not undertake to deliver them at the usual time because there was the risk of detention at Boat of Garten which they had no means of preventing. In regard to the second consignment, that sent on the 25th, this is too clear for argument. They knew or were bound to have known that the line had been blocked on the 22d, and they were not entitled to accept the respondent's goods for carriage, knowing their perishable nature, without informing him of the risk. As regards the goods sent on the 23d the case is much more narrow, and if it had rested on want of notice alone I should have hesitated. Still the obstruction was one which the company knew, and if they did not inform their stationmaster at Lossiemouth, they were bound to have done so. And apart from the first ground of my opinion, I am not disposed as regards want of notice to distinguish between the two contracts.

I will only add that temporary or accidental detention from unexpected pressure of traffic is a risk incidental to railway transit, and one of which the customer must to a certain extent take his chance. But it is quite a different thing when the causes of probable detention are known and foreseen, and are not specifically disclosed to the customer when his goods are accepted.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have arrived at the same result, but chiefly on the ground afterwards explained, that the defenders by wilful fault neglected to make the pursuer aware, as it was their duty to do, of the block which had occurred at Boat of Garten, and consequent risk of delay in the transmission of his goods, when they received the fish in question from him on the 23d and 25th of September 1873.

Another ground of liability was referred to by your Lordship, viz., the failure of the defenders to provide sufficient engine power for marshalling the waggons at Boat of Garten, and this ground has certainly some support in the evidence. Shaw, the stationmaster at Boat of Garten, expressly says that if they had had sufficient engine power, they might have kept the station clear; and Imlah says that it was quite possible to pick out and forward the waggon containing the pursuer's perishable goods, although it would have taken three-quarters of an hour extra to have done so. Still there is a little difficulty

No. 19.
Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

attending this ground of liability,—keeping in view that in consequence of the special contract of parties, the import and legal effect of which, as stated by your Lordship, meets with my entire concurrence, the onus has been thrown on the pursuer. It may therefore be said that the pursuer ought to have followed up Shaw's evidence by shewing that the defenders might have got engine power by using proper exertions. But I rather think your Lordship is right in holding that the pursuer has done enough, by the evidence of Shaw and Imlah, to shift the onus, so as to have made it incumbent on the defenders to shew that they could not have got engine power, even if they had used reasonable exertions to do so.

But independently of that part of the case, I am clearly of opinion, both with reference to the fish which was booked with the defenders at Lossiemouth on the morning of the 23d, and still more so with reference to the fish booked with them at the same place on the morning of the 25th, that they must be held answerable as for wilful negligence, on the ground stated by me at the outset. According to the evidence of Shaw, they knew that the block had begun at Boat of Garten on the evening of the 22d, and I cannot doubt that a message might have been forwarded by them from Boat of Garten to Lossiemouth either on the night of the 22d or morning of the 23d, in order that the pursuer might have been informed of the great risk there was of delay in the transmission of his perishable goods. But no such message was sent, or at any rate the pursuer got no notice whatever of the block at Boat of Garten, or of the risk of delay in the transmission of his goods. He booked his goods with the defenders at Lossiemouth as he had been in the practice of doing for fifteen years, in the belief that they would be forwarded and delivered in Glasgow in time for the market of the following day. This was done without any warning being given by the defenders of the imminent risk of delay from the block at Boat of Garten. I think it was the duty of the defenders to have given such warning. It appears to me, therefore, that although the circumstances were different, the principles of decision in the case of Jarvie and Husband v. The Caledonian Railway Company, 18th March 1875 (2 Court of Session Cases, 4th series, p. 623), are applicable, and that on these principles the defenders are liable for the loss which the pursuer has sustained. They ought to have given the pursuer notice of the block and of the consequent risk of detention, so that he might judge for himself whether to forward his goods by the defenders, or keep them and make the best of them at Lossiemouth, or send them elsewhere; and in this view it is not immaterial that it is proved he could have sent them to Elgin, six miles from Lossiemouth, and that from thence they could have been forwarded in good time for the Glasgow market next day. I must therefore hold that the defenders by wilful negligence failed in their duty to the pursuer in not informing him of the block at Boat of Garten, and warning him of the consequent risk of detention of his perishable goods by that route. And it is chiefly on this ground that I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived.

Lord Gifford.—I have great difficulty in concurring with your Lordships in regard to the first parcel of goods. I agree with your Lordships that the special contract, giving it the interpretation which your Lordships have done, is a reasonable one, and therefore that it is under the special contract that the question of liability of the railway company arises. I think it was reasonable for the railway company to say, "Our ordinary charge for fish is so much, but if you will agree that we shall not be liable for delay except upon proof of wilful fault or negligence on the part of the company's servants, we will carry the fish at a cheaper rate," and if the merchant who is sending the goods agrees to this condition, and gets his goods carried on cheaper terms on that account, that seems to be a reasonable bargain. And I understand both your Lordships, differing from the Sheriff-substitute, to hold that the special contract in this case must receive effect.

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

The first claim arises from the detention of the goods sent from Lossiemouth on the 23d, which were not delivered in Glasgow till the 26th. The cause of the delay was the alteration or extraordinary increase in the company's traffic occasioned by the breaking down of the Bridge of Dun on the Caledonian line. Now, I do not think that the giving way of the Bridge of Dun was not a fault for which the Great North of Scotland Company were liable. All that can be said is, that they must do what was necessary in consequence of the derangement of traffic which the breakdown caused. Now, they did give additional service at Boat of Garten, and did what they fairly and honestly thought would be required, and the stationmaster at Lossiemouth, who had a conversation with the pursuer about the breaking down of the Bridge of Dun, says, "Our talk was about the difference it would make in the traffic, but I don't think we anticipated any stoppage." If there was a fault, it was an error in judgment, not foreseeing the extent of the difference it would make in the traffic. I do not think that is a fault which falls under the head of "wilful fault or negligence." In point of fact the anticipation of the stationmaster was well founded for several days, for it was not till the evening of Monday the 22d September that, as Shaw, the stationmaster at Boat of Garten, says "we began to get blocked," and it was only that night for the first time that they did not get the station clear. Here again the block which occurred that night can hardly, I think, be held to be the wilful fault of the company's servants, and, unless the fault comes up to this, it is not fault for which the defenders are responsible. The first lot of the pursuer's fish was sent off at seven next morning, and the only other fault which is mainly relied on by the pursuer is that notice was not sent of the stoppage. I think that is too narrow a ground to enable me to affirm that the sending on of the fish on the morning of the 23d should have been stopped, and that the failure to stop the fish at Lossiemouth was in the sense of the special contract "wilful fault or negligence." It comes to this, that because the station at Boat of Garten was not clear on Monday night, the defenders were bound to send word to all their customers that there was a possibility that the block which had begun that night would continue. It is a strong thing to say that this was a duty incumbent on the stationmaster at Boat of Garten in reference to all stations which might send goods that day; and, therefore, I think that the detention of this first parcel was just one of those detentions against which the company were protected by the terms of the special agreement.

As to the second parcel, I have not the same difficulty. There, I think, the observation is very important,—why did not the stationmaster at Boat of Garten let the stationmaster at Lossiemouth know that the pursuer's fish which had been sent off on the 23d were still at Boat of Garten on the 25th? And, therefore, as to the second parcel, I concur with your Lordships.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that when the appellants received the goods libelled they knew that owing to the accumula-

No. 19.

Nov. 6, 1875.
M'Connachie v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.

tion of traffic at Boat of Garten Station these goods were liable to be delayed in their transit; and find that in fact a block had taken place at that station on the 22d of September 1873, and that another block took place on the 25th of the same month, and that in consequence thereof the first consignment of the goods libelled was not delivered until the 26th of September, and that the second consignment was not delivered till the 27th of said month, and that these delays were occasioned by the fault and neglect of the appellants in not sufficiently providing for the due transmission of the goods: Find, separatim, that the appellants neglected to give notice to the respondent when they received the goods that the line had been blocked and that the goods were in danger of being delayed in transmission: Therefore find that the loss libelled arose through the fault and negligence of the appellants; dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment appealed from, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses," &c.

BOYD, MACDONALD, & LOWSON, S.S.C.—JOHN HENRY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 20.

Nov. 8, 1875.
Whitelaw, &c.

TEIND COURT.
Teind Clerk.

ALEXANDER WHITELAW AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Lee.

(Disjunction and Erection of Flowerhill.)

Parish—Disjunction and Erection quoad sacra—8 and 9 Vict. c. 44, sec. 8—Intimation.—This was an application for the disjunction and erection of the church and parish of Flowerhill. The district sought to be attached to the said church was situated wholly within the quoad sacra parish of Airdrie, which had been itself disjoined and erected from the parish of New Monkland. The Court appointed intimation to be made in the parish churches both of New Monkland and Airdrie.

J. B. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

DUNCAN MALCOLM MACFARLANE, Pursuer.—Balfour—Jameson.
MOCHRUM SCHOOL BOARD, Defenders.—R. V. Campbell.
BOARD OF EDUCATION FOR SCOTLAND, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—Trayner.

School—Schoolmaster—School Board—Relevancy—Malice—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62, sec. 60, sub-sec. 2—Jurisdiction—Reduction.—A school board resolved to "require a special report from an inspector" of schools under sub-section 2 of section 60 of the Education Act, 1872, on a school and teacher. The inspector, at the end of an unfavourable report upon the school alone, stated,—"Upon the whole I consider that the resolution come to by the . . . school board is borne out by the state of the school and the result of the teacher's labours." The school board then gave judgment removing the schoolmaster, which judgment was subsequently confirmed by the Board of Education. The schoolmaster raised an action of reduction both of the judgment of the school board and of the confirmation by the Board of Education, on the grounds (1) of deviation from statutory procedure, in respect that the inspector's report was one on the school and not on the teacher, and (2) of malice and oppression. In preliminary defences the defenders pleaded (1) that the Court had no jurisdiction, and (2) that the pursuer's statements were not relevant. Held (1) that the Court had jurisdiction in the action, in so far as based on relevant averments of deviations from the statutory procedure, although it had no power to review the judgment of a school board on its merits; (2) that the averment that the inspector's report, in as much as it referred only to the school and not to the teacher's qualifications, was not in conformity with the statute, was relevant; and (3) that averments of malice

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.

Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

1st Division. Ld. Curriehill. M.

against the school board in forming their judgment upon the inspector's report were irrelevant as a ground of reduction of their judgment.

Observed (per Lord President) that he reserved his opinion as to the relevancy of averments of oppression as distinguished from malice on the part of a public board in the execution of a statutory duty.

DUNCAN MALCOLM MACFARLANE, who had been appointed schoolmaster of the parish of Mochrum in 1848, raised an action on 26th March 1875 against the school board of that parish, and the Board of Education for Scotland, concluding for reduction of (1) a minute of the school board, dated 6th January 1875, whereby they resolved to remove him from the office of teacher of the public school of Mochrum, and (2) a minute of the Board of Education for Scotland, dated 26th February 1875, confirming the resolution of the school board; and for declarator that he was the teacher of the public school of Mochrum, and entitled to receive the emoluments of that office.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The minute or judgment of the school board of Mochrum, of date 6th January 1875, ought to be reduced, in respect—(1) That the report upon which it proceeded was not a proper report, in terms of 'The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872;' (2) that no proper copy of said report was furnished to the pursuer in terms of said Act; (3) that said judgment was malicious and unjust, and proceeded on a report which was itself unjust, and had been maliciously, oppressively, and unjustly obtained by the said school board at the time it was so obtained; (4) that the whole proceedings of the school board towards the pursuer in obtaining said report, and in dismissing the pursuer, were oppressive, malicious, and contrary to justice. 2. The minute or deliverance of the Board of Education for Scotland, dated 26th February 1875, ought to be reduced, in respect—(1) That it followed upon the inept and wrongous proceedings mentioned in the foregoing plea; (2) that it proceeded upon reasons furnished by the school board which were incorrect in point of fact, and which the pursuer had no opportunity of answering; (3) that it was oppressive and unjust to the pursuer.

Preliminary defences were lodged against satisfying production.

The school board pleaded;—1. The special report of Her Majesty's inspector not being reduced, the present action is excluded. 2. The school board's resolution removing the pursuer, and the confirmation thereof by the Board of Education, not being subject to the review of the Court, this action is excluded. 3. The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient, the action should be dismissed.

The Board of Education pleaded;—1. The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to warrant the conclusions of the summons. 2. The deliverance of the Board of Education for Scotland, sought to be reduced, having been pronounced in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon them by the said statute, is not subject to review, and the present action is incompetent.

The pursuer averred that after the school board came into office in May 1873 they made certain agreements with him as to the amount of his salary, but that subsequently, owing to a misunderstanding between him and the clerk to the school board as to the collecting of the fees, the members of the board conceived an animus against him, and in consequence rescinded the agreement as to salary. This agreement he had been compelled to enforce in another action in the Court of Session, in which he had succeeded. The remaining articles of the condescendence and answers thereto for the defenders, in so far as they are material, were as follows:—(Cond. 4) "In the month of March 1874 the school board resolved, as per minute of that date, to apply to the Department of Education in London for advice regarding two pupil teachers and a sewing mistress, whom they stated, but untruly, to have been refused admittance to the school by the pursuer, and they further instructed their clerk to write to the Department requesting that Her Majesty's inspector make a special report regarding the Mochrum public school and its teacher. The inspector subsequently visited the school on 14th April 1874, and made a favourable report, and a Government certificate of competency was sent to the pursuer as the result of said inspection. The school board took no action, however, on said inspection and report." (Answer 4 for Mochrum School Board) "The minute here mentioned is referred to for its terms. The visit of Her Majesty's inspector, on 14th April 1874, was made in the ordinary course of his duty, under sec. 66 of the Act, and not at the instance of these defenders with a view to special report, such as was subsequently obtained, and which is referred to. Quoad ultra denied." (Answer 4 for Board of Education) "Explained that the inspection and report here referred to were not made under the 60th section of the Education Act." (Cond. 5) "On 3d June 1874 the school board took up a new position with regard to the agreement for salary, alleging that it was for one year only; and of the same date they also resolved to ask for another special report on the Mochrum school and teacher, and they did so without coming to any resolution to the effect that the teacher was inefficient, as they were bound to do in terms of the 60th section of 'The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,' and although not two months had elapsed since the last report. In consequence of said request Her Majesty's inspector made a second inspection of the school on 27th October 1874, and thereafter issued his report thereon; said report is in the following terms:—" * (Answer 5 for Mochrum School Board) . . . The de-

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875. Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

* "1. School Board of Mochrum; 2. Mochrum Public School, A. G. S.—Education Act (Scotland), 1872, section 60 (2).—In accordance with my instructions to report on Mochrum public school under section 66, I visited it on the 14th April 1874. Taking into consideration that it was its first inspection I was able to report that it made on the whole a fair appearance in elementary work. I was afterwards instructed to report on the school under section 60 (2), and accordingly I again visited it on the 27th October 1874.

"As on the occasion of my former visit I found that the examination schedule was not filled up, and that there were no registers, no time-table, and no pupil teachers, although two candidates had been admitted at the previous inspection.

"There were 70 scholars present, and of these 39 were presented for examination under standards I., II., III., and IV., the same standards under which the scholars present in April were examined. I had no means of determining whether the same scholars were examined under the same standards on both occasions. The following were the results of the examination:

"Standard I.—13 scholars. Reading and penmanship on the whole fair. Spelling and arithmetic moderate. Notation and subtraction very imperfect.

"Standard II.—10 scholars. Reading and penmanship fair. Spelling moderate. Notation very imperfect.

"Standard III.—10 scholars. Reading and penmanship fair. 4 failed in writing, and none made a respectable pass in arithmetic.

"Standard IV.—6 scholars. Their knowledge in grammar was so imperfect that only one was fairly entitled to a pass in reading. 3 failed in writing, and 4 in arithmetic.

"Grammar, history, and geography (Article 19 c.) were subjects quite unknown.

"The children under 7 read pretty fairly.

"On the whole, I consider that the resolution come to by the Mochrum School Board is borne out by the state of the school and the result of the teacher's labours. A. Ogilvy Barrie, H. M. I." fenders made only one application for and obtained only one special report under section 60, sub-section 2, of the Act. . . . The resolution referred to by the inspector is the school board's resolution of 11th March 1874, to require a special report under the said 60th section of the Act. Quoad ultra denied." (Cond. 6) "Said report was not made in accordance with the requirements of sub-section 2 of section 60 of 'The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,' inasmuch as it is not a report upon the teacher, but only upon the school. Said report was also unjust and unfair to the pursuer, owing to its having proceeded on an inspection which was made at a time when, owing to the actings of the school board, and partly to other circumstances, the school was in a disorganised condition. A few days before the school board requested the second inspection they collected the accumulated school fees of three or four quarters, and charged fees which were not only higher than had been customary, but also very much higher than they themselves had advertised would be charged. In consequence of this about thirty of the scholars, chiefly those who were the most advanced, were withdrawn from the school. The school board next resolved that the school vacation was to commence on 17th June, which was an unprecedentedly early date for an agricultural district, and they directed the school to be re-opened on 27th July, so near the commencement of the corn and potato harvest as to be quite fatal to the regular attendance of pupils in a country parish. The irregularity of attendance was further increased by the outbreak of an epidemic whooping-cough, by which about fifty of the pupils were kept from school. The school board had at first directed the pursuer to teach according to use and wont, but after the inspection in April they changed the system, and required the pursuer to teach according to the Scotch Education Code, 1873, and the new system was only beginning to get into working order when the school was broken up for the vacation. The said inspection of 27th October was thus made at a time when it was impossible for any teacher to have got his pupils into a fit state to undergo examination under a new system which had been so recently introduced, and under which, from interruption and irregularity of attendance, the teacher had not proper opportunities for preparing the pupils to undergo an examination. The members of the school board were well aware of the state of things in the school, and in that knowledge they maliciously and oppressively requested a report from Her Majesty's inspector, with the purpose, and in the expectation, of obtaining a report from him unfavourable as to the state of the school, and upon which they might therefore venture to dismiss the pursuer. The pursuer believes and avers that the school board, or the majority thereof, and notably the Rev. William Allan, the parish minister (to whose recent induction into the parish the pursuer, as an elder of the congregation, had been opposed, and who took the leading part both in public and in private in promoting the pretended dismissal of the pursuer), were actuated by malice and ill-will towards him in requesting a report at the time they did, when by their own actings they had thrown the school into a state of disorganisation." (Answer 6 for Mochrum School Board) "Denied, under reference to the report. The school had been open after the vacation for three months before H. M. inspector's visit on 27th October 1874, and there was an average attendance of pupils." (Answer 6 for Board of Education) "Denied that said report was not made in accordance with the requirements of the statute." (Cond. 7) "It was quite impossible for the pursuer, from the copy report furnished to him, to know why he should be dismissed, or upon what ground he was being found fault with. Said report does not even bear that he was inefficient; and it refers to a resolution, no copy of which was furnished to him, and of the terms of which he is entirely ignorant. The pursuer has thus been deprived of the opportunity to defend himself, which it was intended should be afforded him by said Act." (Answer 7 for Mochrum School Board) "Denied. The special report had come to hand about 24th December 1874. . . . . A copy of the report as received, certified by the chairman as correct, was accordingly sent by the clerk to the pursuer next day." (Answer 7 for Board of Education) "Denied. The pursuer was duly furnished with a copy of said report. Explained that the pursuer was afforded every opportunity of defending himself before the Board of Education for Scotland, and that he availed himself of the opportunity so afforded for that purpose. The pursuer laid before said board several statements in reference to the proceedings of the school board and the report of Her Majesty's inspector, which were duly considered before the said board pronounced their deliverance confirming the judgment of the school board removing the pursuer from his office." (Cond. 8) "Notwithstanding that the school board were fully aware of the circumstances under which said report had been made and issued, and also that the pursuer had had no opportunity of defending himself, owing to the defective nature of the copy report furnished to him, they yet, upon 6th January 1875, proceeded most wrongfully, oppressively, and maliciously to resolve to remove the pursuer from his office. Said resolution or judgment is embodied in the minute of which reduction is first sought. The said Rev. William Allan presided at the meeting which resolved on the pursuer's pretended dismissal. The board's proceedings, with regard to the pursuer previous to their pretended dismissal of him, and the said dismissal itself, were oppressive, malicious, and unjust, and said judgment of dismissal was pronounced by said board maliciously and without probable cause; said proceedings were taken by the said board with the corrupt purpose, among others, of escaping from their contract as to the pursuer's salary, which, contrary to their contention, has been held binding on them, and which they had otherwise attempted to evade, but without success." (Answer 8 for Mochrum School Board) "Admitted that these defenders having considered Her Majesty's inspector's report, by resolution contained in their minute of 6th January 1875, removed the pursuer from his office, they having seen cause for this judgment, in terms of section 60 of the Act. Quoad ultra denied." (Cond. 9) "The judgment embodied in said resolution was submitted to the defenders, the Board of Education for Scotland; and the said board, proceeding upon the false, or at least misleading statements made by the other defenders, which were not communicated to the pursuer, and which he had no opportunity of answering, and upon the unjust report already referred to, proceeded oppressively to confirm the said judgment, although the same was inept, and had been arrived at in defiance of the provisions of the statute, and was otherwise inept and unjust. The said Board of Education embodied said confirmation in a minute or deliverance, which is the second deed of which reduction is concluded for." (Answer 9 for Mochrum School Board) "Admitted that these defenders' judgment removing the pursuer was duly confirmed in terms of the Act, by the Board of Education for Scotland. Quoad ultra denied. The pursuer made statements of dates 15th, 22d, and 28th January 1875, to the said board, containing the substance of his averments in this action. These statements these defenders were called upon by the said board to answer, and they did answer the same before the said board's confirmation, issued on 26th February 1875. The pursuer sent other communications to the said board, dated 6th and 9th January 1875, which these defenders did not see. Copies of pursuer's statements, as sent to them for answer, are herewith produced."

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

On 18th June the Lord Ordinary closed the record on the summons and preliminary defences, and on 17th July pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard the counsel for the parties on the record which has been closed on the summons and preliminary defences, finds that the action is not excluded or incompetent on any of the grounds stated in said defences: Therefore repels the defences so far as preliminary, reserving their effect as defences on the merits for future consideration: Appoints the defenders, the School Board of Mochrum, to satisfy the production by the first box day in the ensuing vacation: And in respect the defenders, the Board of Education, state that they intend to reclaim against this interlocutor, grants leave to them to reclaim, and finds them liable in the expenses of the preliminary discussion, and appoints," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The School Board of Mochrum, some months ago, under sec. 60 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, pronounced a judgment, which was confirmed by the Board of Education, removing from his office the pursuer, who had been schoolmaster of the parish since 1848. In the present action the pursuer challenges the validity of the judgment of the school board on various grounds, one of them being that the report of Her Majesty's inspector, on which it proceeded, was not a proper report in terms of the statute; and another, that the whole proceedings of the school board in procuring the report and dismissing the pursuer were oppressive, malicious, and contrary to justice. And he challenges the deliverance of the Board of Education, on the ground that the judgment which it confirmed was in itself inept; that the deliverance proceeded upon reasons furnished by the school board, which were incorrect in point of fact, and which the pursuer had no opportunity of answering; and that it was oppressive and unjust to the pursuer.

"In all the cases of removal of a schoolmaster under the Education Act which have hitherto been before the Court the validity of the judgment of removal has invariably been assumed, and the only question has been whether the removal was occasioned by such fault on the part of the teacher as to disentitle him to a retiring allowance. In the present case, however, the schoolmaster challenges the validity of his removal altogether, and he concludes for reduction of the minute or judgment of the school board dismissing him, and of the minute or deliverance of the Board of Education confirming that judgment, and for declarator that he is the teacher of the late parochial school of Mochrum, and that he alone is entitled to fulfil the duties of said office, and to receive the emoluments appertaining to him as such teacher.

"The pursuer has called as defenders both the school board and the Board of Education, and preliminary defences have been lodged for both defenders against satisfying the production. Several of the pleas are manifestly defences upon the merits, and do not here require to be farther noticed. The pleas which the school board maintain as preliminary and as excluding the action are (1) that the special report of Her Majesty's inspector, upon which their judgment proceeded, is not reduced; and (2) that their own judgment and the confirmation thereof by the Board of Education are not subject to the review of this Court. The Board of Education pleads that the action is incompetent, in respect that their deliverance, which is sought to be reduced, was pronounced in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon them by the statute, and is not subject to review.

"The objection to the action, founded upon the statement that the report of the inspector has not been reduced, is, in my opinion, ill-founded. It is not alleged by the pursuer that it is an untrue or dishonest report, or that the inspector was acting maliciously or oppressively in making it; and the report must therefore be deemed and taken to be a faithful, honest, and true report of the result of the inspector's examination. Whether it is a proper report in terms of the 60th section of the Act, and one upon which the defenders were entitled to proceed in removing the pursuer, is another and a totally different question, which, in my opinion, does not arise, and cannot be discussed as a

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.

Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

The school board acquiesced in this interlocutor, but the Board of Education reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Whenever a new jurisdiction, which did preliminary defence to this action, which proceeds upon the footing that, while the report is a true report of what the inspector observed, it was obtained by the school board under circumstances which render their applying for it, and acting upon it, malicious, oppressive, and unjust.

"The other preliminary defences, however, raise questions of difficulty and of great importance in connection with the working of the Education Act, the main question being, whether and how far the judgment of a school board dismissing a schoolmaster, and the deliverance of the Board of Education in confirming such judgment, are or are not subject to the review of the Court of Session? Now, so far as regards the merits of such judgments or deliverances—that is to say, the incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency of the schoolmaster, and generally the sufficiency of the grounds upon which the judgment proceeded, it appears to me that all review is excluded. The grounds of removal are, I think, left entirely to the discretion of these statutory boards. The words of the statute (sec. 60) conferring the jurisdiction are as follows:—'Any teacher of a public school, appointed previously to the passing of this Act, may be removed from his office in manner following, that is to say, ... (sub-sec. 2) If the school board of any parish or burgh shall consider that any such teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient they may require a special report regarding the school and teacher from Her Majesty's inspector charged with the duty of inspecting such school; and on receiving such report the school board may, if they see cause, remove such teacher from office, provided that, before proceeding to give judgment on the matter, they shall furnish to the teacher a copy of such report, and that a judgment removing the teacher shall not have effect until confirmed by the Board of Education.' I think the fair, natural, and sound construction of the statute is, that the removal of a schoolmaster is subject to certain checks, to be at the discretion of the school board, if they shall consider the teacher incompetent, unfit, or inefficient. These checks are, first, the preliminary one of requiring the school board, before pronouncing any judgment, to procure a report upon the school and the teacher from one of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools; and the other check is by declaring that the judgment of removal, when pronounced, shall not take effect until confirmed by the Board of Education.

"The intention of the Legislature clearly was (1) to secure that, while the administration of the school, including the power of removing the teacher, was to be lodged in the hands of the representative body forming the school board, such an important discretionary power should not be exercised without due deliberation on the part of the board, with the assistance of a special report on the school and teacher by an experienced inspector; and (2) that, in order to secure still further that justice should be done alike to the ratepayers, and the teacher, and the school, the confirmation of the Board of Education should be obtained before the judgment of removal could take effect. But I cannot think that it ever was intended that, where all these precautions were duly observed, the Court of Session should be made a Court of review for investigating and discussing the educational requirements of every parish and school district and burgh of Scotland, the capabilities of the schoolmaster, and his fitness or unfitness for the office. And my opinion is not affected by the circumstances that under the statute the confirmation by the Board of Education cannot be obtained after the lapse of three, or at most four years, from the passing of the Act, the existence of the board being limited to one or other of these periods. The discretionary power will then be exercised by the school board without the confirmation of any other board, and, unless flagrantly abused, it will not be interfered with by the Court.

"In a case somewhat similar which recently arose under the Poor-Law Act, which empowers the Board of Supervision to dismiss any inspector of the poor who may, in their opinion, be unfit for his office, it was held that the deliverance of the board removing the inspector was final and conclusive, and could not exist before, was conferred upon, and the administration of an Act of Parliament was committed to, a board answerable to Parliament, the Courts of

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.

Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

not be reviewed on its merits (Clark v. The Board of Supervision, 10th December 1873, 1 Rettie, 261). And in all the cases which have arisen under the Education Act, particularly the cases of Logiealmond, 5th February 1875, 2 Rettie, 417, and 21st May 1875, 2 Rettie, 698, and Glenshiel, 28th May 1875, 2 Rettie, 715, it was assumed in argument, and, I think, also in the opinions of several of the Judges, that an honest judgment of removal by a school board, confirmed by the Board of Education, could not be reviewed by this Court on its merits. But in all these cases, as well as in the case of the Board of Supervision, it seems to have been equally assumed that when a case of unfairness, malice, or oppression is stated against the school board this Court may interfere. Such interference, however, will not be by way of reviewing the judgment or investigating whether it proceeded on sufficient or insufficient grounds, but by inquiring whether the school board in their proceedings have violated the provisions of the statute, or exceeded the powers thereby conferred on them, or have oppressed, or were actuated by malice towards the schoolmaster.

"Nor will it be enough for the schoolmaster simply to say that the school board were actuated by malice towards him, unless he can also make out that the board, knowing or believing the school to be temporarily in a state of disorganisation from causes beyond the control of the teacher, maliciously procured a visit and report from the inspector at a time and under circumstances calculated to convey to his mind the erroneous belief that the unsatisfactory state of the school was due to the incompetency, neglect, or inefficiency of the teacher. But, if such a case shall be averred by a teacher, I think that it would not be right to prevent him from having his complaint investigated, merely because, in the ordinary case, an honest judgment of a school board is final under the statute.

"In the present case I have come to be of opinion that the averments of the pursuer amount substantially to the statement of a case of deviation from the statute, and of malice and oppression sufficiently distinct to entitle him to have it considered. He avers (1) that the inspector's report is not conform to the statute, because it is a report only upon the school and not upon the teacher. Had this been the sole ground of action I should have hesitated to sustain it, because I think that the report, although not expressly, is virtually a report upon the teacher when tested by the result of his labours. But (2) the pursuer avers that the report was applied for when the school was disorganised by unusual proceedings of the board regarding the school fees; by an outbreak of whooping-cough, which caused the absence of many of the scholars from tuition during the period preceding the inspection; by a sudden and unprecedented change in the vacation of the school, made by the school board, in consequence of which, for a long time after the school re-opened in the end of July 1874, many of the children were detained for a considerable time from school by their parents for harvest work and potato-lifting; so that when the inspection took place in October thereafter they were necessarily in a very imperfect state of tuition, and that the board had changed the subjects taught in the school from those which had been previously in use to the standards of the Revised Code, which it requires some time to render familiar to the scholars. These causes and others all being beyond the pursuer's control, operated, it is said, to disorganise the school and to cause the scholars to be temporarily in a backward condition at the date of the inspector's visit, and to convey to his mind an entirely erroneous notion of the true average condition of the school, and of his fitness as a teacher; and he says that the school board being aware of this state of matters, and having conceived personal animosity towards him in consequence of disputes and litigation between him and them regarding his salary and the collection of the school fees, they maliciously asked for the inspection at this juncture, in the hope and with the expectation of getting a report which would justify them in dismissing him. Now, I think that an action for the purpose of inquiring into averments such as these and reducing the judgment of removal, if they are proved, is not a review of the judgment on its merits, but is an investigation into the honesty of law were excluded.[1] Where a discretionary power, such as to dismiss a schoolmaster, was put into the hands of a board they were entitled and bound to inquire into all the circumstances. The resolution of a school board had no vitality until it was confirmed, so the schoolmaster could not be affected by it. The duty of the Board of Education was not of the nature of a review or appeal; it was confirmation on inquiry. The sort of questions which arose in such cases were not fitted for Courts of law; they were much better suited to be scrutinised by a board specially appointed. The Court could not interdict the Board of Education from considering the resolution of the school board with a view to confirming it. It was bound to assume that the board would act properly. Questions such asthis were the very ones entrusted to the Board of Education, and they were responsible to the Education Department of the Privy Council if they went wrong. After the statutory period of existence of this board expired the power of confirmation was given direct to the Committee of the Privy Council. (2) There had been no deviation from the procedure laid down in the statute. There was an examination by an inspector, a report by him, and following thereon a resolution by the school board and a confirmation of that by the Board of Education. There the school board throughout the whole proceedings in connection with the removal of the pursuer, and that is not excluded by the statute.

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

---

"I am therefore of opinion that so far as the preliminary defences of the school board are concerned they are not well founded.

"As to the defence for the Board of Education, I think that if the allegations of the pursuer regarding the judgment of the school board are correct, and in the present discussion they must be assumed to be so, the deliverance of the Board of Education confirming that judgment must stand or fall with the judgment itself, although neither malice, nor oppression, nor irregularity, is or can be averred against that board. If the judgment of the school board was irregular, malicious, and oppressive, the presumption is that the circumstances were unknown to the Board of Education when they confirmed the judgment, and that had they known all the facts they would have withheld their confirmation. They no doubt allege, although the pursuer does not admit the statement, that they gave the pursuer an opportunity of making any statement which he desired in reference to the judgment before they confirmed it, and it does not appear whether they made any investigations into the allegations which the pursuer now makes as to malice and oppression on the part of the school board. These, however, are matters for investigation, if hereafter the allegation shall be found relevant.

"The present discussion, however, is not whether the pursuer has made averments in whole or in part relevant, for that is a question as to the merits of the action, but whether the defenders have stated sufficient grounds to exclude the action altogether as incompetent. And on the whole matter I am of opinion that the defences stated are not proper preliminary defences against satisfying the production, that they should therefore be repelled so far as preliminary, reserving their effect as defences hereafter on the merits, and that the school board should be ordered to satisfy the production. After the production is satisfied defences will be ordered on the merits, and the relevancy of the averments of the pursuer, and the extent and mode of proof, will then fall to be discussed upon a closed record, containing the full and final statements of both parties. At present I express no opinion as to whether all or any of these averments are sufficient, if proved, to entitle the pursuer to decree of reduction. This is not the proper stage for discussing that question. It is enough that a prima facie case of malice and oppression is stated to entitle him to have the production satisfied.

"As the defenders, the Board of Education, have intimated their intention to reclaim they have been found liable in the expense of discussing the preliminary defences."

[1] Clark v. Board of Supervision, Dec. 10, 1873, ante, vol. i. 261.

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

was no averment of deviation from statutory procedure in the pursuer's record; all that was averred was malice on the part of the school board. But whether the school board had been malicious or not the true question was, had the Board of Education acted within their discretionary powers or not?

Argued for the pursuer;—The action should be sustained on two grounds,—

1. Statutory deviation. There had been three distinct deviations from the procedure laid down in the statute. (1) The school board had come to no resolution that the schoolmaster was unfit and inefficient before they called for a special report. (2) The report of the inspector was not on the master but on the school. (3) The copy of the report sent to the schoolmaster did not contain a copy of the resolution referred to in it, and as presumably the object of the rule in the statute, that he was to get a copy of the report, was that he might have an opportunity of defending himself, the copy sent was not in conformity with the statute. Even with the resolution it did not contain the information necessary for this purpose.

2. Malice and oppression. From the opinions of the Judges in the Logiealmond[1] and Glenshiel[2] cases it was clear that if a relevant case of malice and oppression was averred this Court would interfere and allow an inquiry. It was quite usual for the Court to inquire into cases even where their jurisdiction was expressly excluded, provided there were, as here, relevant averments of malice and oppression.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer of this action, Duncan Macfarlane, was teacher of the public school of the parish of Mochrum, but he was dismissed from that office by a minute or resolution of the school board of the parish, dated 6th of January 1875, which was confirmed by a deliverance of the Board of Education on the 26th of February following. By this action of reduction he seeks to set aside both these resolutions—the resolution of the school board dismissing him, and the resolution of the Board of Education confirming that dismissal.

The school board of the parish maintain, among other defences, that their "resolution removing the pursuer, and the confirmation thereof by the Board of Education, not being subject to the review of the Court, this action is excluded;" and the Board of Education plead that their deliverance "having been pronounced in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon them by the said statute, is not subject to review, and the present action is incompetent." These defences are stated as objections to satisfying the production.

The Lord Ordinary by his interlocutor has repelled these defences as preliminary, reserving their effect on the merits for future consideration; and he has further appointed the production to be satisfied. The school board have acquiesced in the interlocutor, but the Board of Education bring it under review by this reclaiming note; and the question raised is undoubtedly one of considerable importance.

The pursuer was in office as parish schoolmaster of the parish at the passing of the Act of 1872; and he belongs therefore to a class of schoolmasters who are dealt with in the statute in a somewhat exceptional way. The 60th section [1] Robb v. Logiealmond School Board, Feb. 5, 1875, ante, ii. 417, and May 21, 1875, ante, ii. 698.

[2] Morrison v. Glenshiel School Board, May 28, 1875, ante, ii. 715.

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875. Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

of the statute, particularly, provides for the manner in which they may be removed from office. In the event of their being charged with immoral conduct, or cruel or improper treatment of the scholars under their charge, the school board must prosecute before the Sheriff, and the Sheriff is authorised to entertain the complaint, and to pronounce the schoolmaster to be guilty or not guilty after considering the evidence adduced; and it is further provided that his sentence shall be final, and not subject to review.

But there is another class of cases provided for by sub-section 2 of section 60, with which we are more immediately concerned. "If the school board of any parish or burgh shall consider that any such teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient, they may require a special report regarding the school and the teacher from Her Majesty's inspector charged with the duty of inspecting such school; and on receiving such report the school board may, if it see cause, remove such teacher from office;" but it is provided that, "before proceeding to give judgment on the matter, they shall furnish to the teacher a copy of such report," and also that their judgment is to have no effect until it is confirmed by the Board of Education. Now, it seems to me that although there is nothing said in this sub-section about the resolution of the school board confirmed by the Board of Education being final and not subject to review, it still must be held to be quite as much so as a sentence of a Sheriff under the first sub-section would be. In short, I think that in the case of a board of this kind, appointed by statute, and vested with a jurisdiction which does not belong to any Court in the kingdom, and which is rather of an administrative than a judicial character, it is a matter of necessity that their decision should be final, and should not be reviewable in a Court of law.

But the pleas which are stated both by the school board and by the Board of Education proceed upon a failure to distinguish between the review of a judgment of this kind by a Court of law and the reduction of such a resolution or sentence as we have before us on the ground of incompetency. The school board of a parish and the Board of Education are both of them the creatures of statute. They can do nothing except under statutory authority. They can exercise no power whatever, except that which is given to them by this statute; and if they do not conform to the conditions upon which the statute authorises them to exercise that power then they are no longer acting under the statute, and their proceedings would be liable not to be reviewed but to be set aside as incompetent. The same observations would apply to the sentence of a Sheriff under the first sub-section of section 60, although these are declared by the statute itself to be final, and not subject to review. If the Sheriff were to proceed to the trial of a schoolmaster for some offence which is not specified in that part of the statute, or if he were to conduct the trial in such a manner as to be inconsistent with what is prescribed in this part of the statute, his sentence would be subject to be set aside beyond all question, as not having the statutory authority which can alone give it validity and effect.

The Board of Education seemed to contend, in the argument which was addressed to us, that they stand in a peculiarly protected position here, as being in effect a department of Government. It appears to me that there can be no distinction of persons as regards a matter of this kind. Whatever is directed to be done by statute must be done as the statute enjoins, and if it is not done as the statute enjoins this Court will set it aside. Suppose that the Board of Education—the proceedings of which are regulated to a great extent by the 3d

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

section of the Act before us—were to proceed at one of its meetings, in the performance of a duty such as that which we are now considering, to violate some of the conditions which are thereby imposed upon them—(it is provided, for example, that two members shall be a quorum)—suppose they proceeded to pronounce sentence, or to confirm the sentence of a public school board, by one of their number only, could it be maintained for one moment that that would have effect? It matters not in the least what the body may be who are to perform the statutory duty; if the duty is statutory this Court has jurisdiction to determine whether it has been performed in the way that the statute has prescribed; and if it has not, this Court has jurisdiction to set it aside. But that is not review of a sentence in any proper sense of the term; and therefore the pleas which have been stated as objections to satisfying the production are in their form and expression inapplicable to the case before us, if I rightly understand that case,—what I understand to be the main ground of reduction being that the school board of the parish of Mochrum did not proceed, in dealing with the pursuer, in the manner provided by the second sub-section of section 60.

Now, it is necessary to attend very particularly to what are the alleged deviations from the statute. It does not appear to me that the allegation in the 4th article of the condescendence is of much importance, because I think it sufficiently appears upon the face of that article itself that the report, which is said to have been obtained from the inspector somewhere in the month of April 1874, was not a special report, and was not intended by him to be a special report within the meaning of the 2d sub-section, and therefore the proceedings begin with what is alleged in the 5th article, where it is said that on the 3d of June 1874 the school board took up a new position with regard to the agreement for salary, and they "resolved to ask for another special report on the Mochrum school and teacher, and they did so without coming to any resolution to the effect that the teacher was inefficient, as they were bound to do in terms of the 60th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872." Now, I do not think there is any departure from the statute in what is here alleged. I do not think the school board were under any necessity of coming to a resolution, or recording their resolution in a minute, before they applied to the inspector to give them a special report. What the statute says is, that if they shall consider that the teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient, they may require a special report regarding the school. Now, of course, if by a resolution is merely meant an act of the will, then unquestionably there must have been such before they could go to the inspector. But if by a resolution is meant a recorded resolution —a minute of the body—then I can see no countenance for that contention in this part of the statute. It is enough that they should make up their minds to have a special report without recording that in their minutes. But then the report which they obtain from the inspector is open to some very serious observations. He reports that he has visited the school, and he states very particularly how many scholars were present, viz., 70,—that 39 of these "were presented for examination under standards 1, 2, 3, and 4, the same standards under which the scholars present in April were examined. I had no means of determining whether the same scholars were examined under the same standards on both occasions." And then he gives the result of the examination; and unquestionably the result was unsatisfactory—that is to say, the scholars appear to have been very little advanced. They do not seem to have learned much; they are not good in arithmetic; they are not good in spelling, and in a great many other things they are very deficient. All that is reported with considerable detail, and in the end he says, "grammar, history, and geography were subjects quite unknown."

No. 21.
Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

Now, nobody can doubt that that is a very unsatisfactory state of the school; but down to this point of the report there is not a word said about the schoolmaster; and the remaining paragraph is expressed thus,—"On the whole, I consider that the resolution come to by the Mochrum School Board is borne out by the state of the school and the result of the teacher's labours." Now, that is the report which is presented to the board; and a copy of it is furnished to the teacher, the object of which, of course, is that he may be enabled to state any objections that he has to the report, or give any explanations that may be necessary for the purpose of defending himself; and he complains of this report, in the first place, that while it is a report upon the school, it is not a report upon the teacher at all, and that there is nothing stated here against him personally against which he is called upon to defend himself; and, in the second place, he says that when the inspector states his opinion that the resolution come to by the Mochrum School Board is borne out by the state of the school, he does not know what the inspector means, for he is not aware of any such resolution as is here referred to, and he does not know what that resolution was. Now, the answer which is given to this allegation of the pursuer is somewhat important. It is—"Admitted that her Majesty's inspector made his inspection under said section of the statute on 27th October 1874, and his report is referred to for its terms. The resolution referred to by the inspector is the school board's resolution of 11th March 1874, to require a special report under the said 60th section of the Act." Now, it would appear from this answer that there had been a resolution to require a special report from the inspector upon the 11th of March; and if so, that would be a very sufficient answer to the objection which is otherwise unfounded, that there was no such resolution. But while the inspector's report is certainly quite sufficient to justify the school board's resolution of the 11th of March 1874 to require a special report, surely the special report itself ought to lead to something further before it can be acted upon. The school board, when they see the school in a state of inefficiency, as they conceive, are entitled to require a special report, and the inspector's special report is that they were justified in coming to that resolution, and that is all the length it goes. Now, that seems a very anomalous and extraordinary result, because the statute contemplates a very different report as a special report. The school board are to require a special report regarding the school and the teacher from Her Majesty's inspector of schools, and here is a report which deals with the school, represents the unfavourable condition in which it appears, and then concludes by saying that that unfavourable condition of the school justifies the school board in having asked him to make a special report, and there is not a word about the teacher at all. Now, we have seen enough of the working of this Act, and we know enough generally of the subject of elementary teaching and those in whose hands it is vested, to be aware that a school may be in a very unfavourable condition indeed without the fault of the teacher. Such things have been, and will be again; and there cannot be a better illustration than what this gentleman, the pursuer, himself alleges to have been the cause of the bad appearance of his scholars when the inspector visited the school. He says there had been an epidemic of whooping-cough, which had carried away a great many of the scholars for a very long time, that there had been a number of other untoward circumstances that had prevented the scholars from attending the school, and

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

that, in point of fact, from these causes they could not but be in the unfavourable condition in which the inspector reports them to be. Now, that may be all perfectly true, or it may not be true, we know nothing about that at present; but at all events it shews that a school may be in a very bad condition, indeed, from accidental causes over which the teacher has no control; and certainly a report to the effect that a school is in that condition is not a report concerning the teacher, or stating anything with regard to the teacher that can justify his dismissal under the 2d sub-section, because the ground of dismissal is quite distinctly specified; it must be incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency. Now, I confess, it appears to me that this was not such a report as the school board were entitled to use as the ground for removing the schoolmaster from office. The statute, I think, is very distinct upon this subject. The school board may have formed a bad opinion of the school and of the teacher; indeed, it is almost assumed that before they ask for an inspector's report they have at least an unfavourable impression of the school and of the teacher; and they go to Her Majesty's inspector for the purpose of having that impression confirmed or removed. It is therefore quite plain that what they must receive from the inspector, in order to justify further action, is a report which shall deal with the teacher as well as the school, and which shall give them ground, which they had not without such a report, for proceeding to remove the teacher from office. If they see cause, they may remove such teacher from office, that is to say, if they see such cause in the report which has been presented to them.

It has been alleged further by the pursuer that the members of the school board had been actuated by malice in their proceedings against him; and it is said, further, that they have acted oppressively towards him. Now, I have great difficulty in seeing how malice can be any ground, or even any element in a ground, for setting aside such a resolution as this, passed by the school board and confirmed by the Board of Education. If this teacher was inefficient, and was reported to be inefficient by Her Majesty's inspector, then it was the duty of the school board to remove him; and it was the duty of the Board of Education to confirm that resolution. But it is quite possible, and not a thing by any means unknown in practice, that parties should perform an unpleasant duty of that kind, or what would be an unpleasant duty to impartial persons, with a great zest and liking for the duty, or, in other words, maliciously. They may have been gratifying their own private malice at the same time that they were performing an obvious act of public duty. But will that invalidate the act of public duty? Most certainly not. If the thing ought to be done, the circumstance that the person who did it has the greatest rancour and hatred against the object of that resolution will not make the resolution invalid if it is well-founded in itself. And therefore I dismiss from consideration altogether the allegations of malice in this case. I think they have no relevancy whatever. Whether a case of oppression could be made out, as distinguished from malice altogether, against a public board in the execution of a statutory duty, I give no opinion. I think there is no case alleged here to justify any interference upon our part, except upon the ground which I have dealt with, viz., deviation from the statute; but upon that ground I arrive at the same conclusion with the Lord Ordinary. I think the pursuer has relevantly averred a deviation from the statute, in respect that this is not such a report of the inspector of schools as that inspector was called upon to give, or such a report as the school board were entitled to proceed upon to remove the schoolmaster; and that being so, the confirmation by the Board of Education can never make it any better. On the contrary, the basis of the whole proceedings being bad, all that has followed upon it must necessarily fall.

No. 21.
Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

Lord Deas.—As regards the amount of control which this Court may competently exercise over a school board in a different form of action than a reduction I do not think it necessary to say anything. That is a delicate matter, and a matter upon which I rather think there has been some judicial difference of opinion. It is not necessary to go into it here, because this is a process of reduction; and in such a process I very much agree with nearly all the observations which have been made by your Lordship. More particularly, I agree in thinking that there are here relevant averments of deviation from the statute. As regards the report of the inspector, upon which the school board professedly proceeded, I cannot doubt that there may be a great distinction between a report upon the state of the school and a report (which is what the statute requires) upon the efficiency of the schoolmaster, more especially if the fact averred by the schoolmaster here be true, viz., that the state of the school arose from causes (several of which he specifies) over which he had no control. He says that the school board, after the lapse of several quarters, during which fees at a certain rate had been charged, had suddenly raised the fees beyond what they had ever been before, and beyond the amount which they themselves had advertised, and that the new scale was applied even to scholars who had been allowed to attend for several quarters without paying the fees at all, and from whom was demanded a slump sum of arrears at the higher rate, which they were unable to pay, in consequence of which about thirty scholars left the school. Then he says that the whooping-cough was prevalent among the children, and from that cause about fifty more were absent at the time when this report was made. He adds a third cause of diminution of the number of scholars, viz., that the school board had determined that the vacation should commence at a different period from what it used to do, and terminate at a different period, viz. 27th July, when the corn and potato harvest, at which many of the children used to be employed in vacation time, was just coming on. From these and other causes it is said the number of scholars was very greatly reduced, and that the absentees included many of the more advanced scholars, who were therefore not seen by the inspector.

Perhaps these things may not be so, but we cannot judge of that at present. I cannot doubt the relevancy of these averments apart altogether from the averment that the object of all that was done was to get rid of the pursuer, and from the allegations of malice, which, as your Lordship has said, it is always a delicate matter to define in cases of this kind. I think if the pursuer proves the specific facts alleged this will at least shew how very different a report upon the school may be from a report upon the efficiency of the schoolmaster.

With these explanations, I entirely concur with your Lordship's observations, and think it unnecessary to say more.

Lord Ardmillan.—This is an important question. The action is one of reduction of a judgment of the school board, confirmed by the Board of Education. I concur in the result of the opinion expressed by your Lordships, that is, in appointing the production to be satisfied, and in declining to dismiss the action in limine as altogether irrelevant.

I have on former occasions expressed, and I still entertain, the opinion that

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Moorhurn School Board and Others.

the judgment of the school board, under the 2d section of the 60th clause of the Act, proceeding on the report of Her Majesty's inspector of schools, and confirmed by the Board of Education, is not reviewable on the merits. Where the ground of removal is stated, and that ground is within the provisions of the statute, and the procedure has been according to the statute, I think that review is excluded. The matter is within the power and the discretion of the school board, and is left to their decision, qualified by the checks afforded by the inspector's report, and by the supervision and the deliverance of the Board of Education. When the procedure for removal of a schoolmaster is according to the enactments of the statutes, I am of opinion that the law trusts the school board, and rightly and wisely abstains from interfering with the discretion of the board.

But, if the school board has not obeyed the statute, which alone is the source of the jurisdiction exercised,—if the statutory pre-requisites to a judgment of removal have been neglected or omitted,—if the judgment is not according to the statute, but is pronounced in disregard of its enactments,—then the protection of the statute cannot cover the deviation, and cannot avail the board.

Review, in the proper meaning of the term, is excluded. But, at the same time, if a judgment is contrary to the statute, it can on that ground be quashed or set aside by this Court. Deviation from the statute, on the part of a body created by the statute, is matter for consideration of the Court, and that is sufficient in the present position of the cause, for the defenders' pleas are reserved to be considered on the merits. All that we now do is to open the door of the Court for consideration of the case presented by the pursuer.

I need not repeat what your Lordship in the chair has so well explained. I agree in the view which your Lordship has taken of the procedure. I do not proceed on the absence of a recorded resolution prior to the inspector's report. But, if there was no resolution by the school board in regard to the efficiency of the teacher prior to the inspector's report of 27th October, and if that report, giving the result of his visits on the 14th April and on the 27th of October, is to be read without such prior resolution, then the inspector reports unfavourably on the school, but does not report the unfitness or inefficiency of the teacher. Now, so far as yet appears, there was no prior resolution in regard to the teacher, to the effect required, to support removal, and if there was no such resolution then the report does not set forth inefficiency, since it only refers to a non-existing resolution, and nothing more than the report was communicated to the teacher. Thus the ground of removal has not been reported on or made known, as directed by the statute, though the report is careful and intelligent, and by a most intelligent inspector. If the report by the inspector had stated distinctly that the teacher was inefficient, the absence of a recorded prior resolution would not in that case have been a fatal objection. If, on the other hand, there had been a recorded prior resolution that the teacher was inefficient, the omission of the matter in the report, apart from the expression of approval of the resolution, would not have been a fatal objection, for then the report would have supported an existing prior resolution. But here, in the absence of a resolution, the report, which only refers to a resolution, and does not set forth inefficiency, appears to me to be defective. I therefore think that a deviation from the statute is relevantly alleged, and that, reserving their effect on the merits, the preliminary pleas against satisfying the production have been rightly repelled by the Lord Ordinary.

I do not proceed on the separate ground that malice is here alleged. "The members of the school board were well aware of the state of things in the school, and in that knowledge they maliciously and oppressively requested a report from Her Majesty's inspector, with the purpose, and in the expectation, of obtaining a report from him unfavourable as to the state of the school, and upon which they might therefore venture to dismiss the pursuer. The pursuer believes and avers that the school board, or the majority thereof, and notably the Rev. William Allan, the parish minister (to whose recent induction into the parish the pursuer, as an elder of the congregation, had been opposed, and who took the leading part both in public and in private in promoting the pretended dismissal of the pursuer), were actuated by malice and ill-will towards him in requesting a report at the time they did, when by their own actings they had thrown the school into a state of disorganisation." These allegations against the school board, and made especially and personally against the minister of the parish, might avail to support an action of damages, but are not sufficient to support reduction of the judgment of the school board, confirmed by the Education Board. On this point I agree entirely with your Lordship in the chair.

No. 21.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board and Others.

It is suggested, though not very distinctly alleged, on the record and at the bar, that the pursuer had no opportunity of defending himself before the Board of Education. This is very improbable, and it is specifically and distinctly denied by the Board of Education; and one of the results of permitting the cause to proceed will be to ascertain the truth on this point. It is a matter within the pursuer's own knowledge; it will now be seen whether the statement is or is not true.

Lord Mure.—I entirely concur with your Lordship in the chair as regards the rules by which questions as to the finality of the proceedings of statutory boards are to be regulated, and as to the application of these rules to the circumstances of this case. And I shall only add that it appears to me that the decision now to be pronounced, relative to the jurisdiction of this Court to entertain complaints of the present description, will be in strict conformity with the decisions pronounced here and in the House of Lords under the Schoolmasters Act, 43 Geo. III. c. 54. I allude to the well-known case of Brown v. the Heritors of Kilberry, 15th Nov. 1825, and to the case of Ross v. Findlater, 2d March 1826, both reported in the fourth volume of Shaw; and the former of which was affirmed on the 12th of June 1829, apparently without any hesitation (3 W. and S. p. 441). By the Act of 1803 the proceedings of presbyteries relative to the trial of schoolmasters were declared to be final, in the most distinct terms, and not subject to review "by any Court, civil or ecclesiastical;" but it was nevertheless held in those cases that this Court had jurisdiction to deal with complaints against the judgment of a presbytery, where it was alleged that there had been deviations from the rules of procedure required by the statute. In the present case there is, I think, a relevant allegation that the report, which the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, requires that school boards must obtain as to the conduct of a teacher, before they proceed to dismiss him, was not laid before them in compliance with the statute. That, I apprehend, is a very serious objection, and one which entitles the party who makes it to have the proceedings in question inquired into.

The Court adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

George Cotton, S.S.C.—Maitland & Lyon, W.S.—Donald Beith, W.S.—Agents.

ALEXANDER AND GEORGE MILLER AND COMPANY, Pursuers and Respondents.—D.-F. Watson—Asher.
POTTER, WILSON, AND COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—Balfour—Mackintosh.

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

Ship—Powers of Master—Liability of Owners for Repairs—Bottomry—Maritime Risk—Agent and Principal.—P. W. and Company ordered a ship on commission for a Colonial navigation company, advanced money on her outfit, and appointed a captain with instructions to take her out to New Zealand, there to await the instructions of the company. The ship was originally registered in the name of P. W. and Company, but before she sailed the title was transferred to the manager of a bank for the purpose of securing an advance by the bank. On her voyage out the ship suffered damage, and put into a foreign port to refit. The captain, for sums advanced to him for necessary repairs, granted a bond binding himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, and also the ship, and the freight to be earned on her voyage, and at the same time drew bills, payable thirty days after sight, on P. W. and Company, for the same amount. The navigation company having become insolvent, P. W. and Company obtained a transfer of the ship from the bank, sold her, and received the price. In an action against P. W. and Company by the holders of one of the bills granted by the captain, for the amount of the bill, which they refused to accept, held, that as P. W. and Company were the employers of the captain, and at the date of the repairs had control of the ship, and were virtually the owners, they were liable for the sum sued for, the necessity for and application of the advance not being disputed, and that this liability was not affected by the captain having granted, as an additional security, the bond above-mentioned, which the majority of the Court were of opinion was not a valid bottomry bond.

Opinions (per Lord Gifford and Lord Ormidale), that the bond, although granted by the master in circumstances which entitled him to grant a bottomry bond, was void, in respect that the repayment of the sum advanced was not made contingent on the safe arrival of the vessel at its destination.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk) on the English cases of Stainbank v. Fenning, May 30, 1851, 11 Scott's C. B. Rep. p. 51; and Stainbank v. Shepard, Feb. 14, 1853, 13 Scott's C. B. Rep. p. 418.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

THIS action was raised on 7th May 1872 in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by A. and G. Miller and Company, merchants, Glasgow, against Potter, Wilson, and Company, merchants and shipowners there, for payment of £250, "being the contents of a bill drawn by William Graham, master of the steamer 'Pareora' of Glasgow, then at Paramaribo, upon the said Potter, Wilson, and Company in favour of Messrs Miller Brothers and Company of Paramaribo, and endorsed by them to the pursuers, dated 17th July 1867, and payable thirty days after sight, and which bill was duly protested for non-payment and non-acceptance; which bill the said Potter, Wilson, and Company were bound to have accepted and paid, in respect that it was drawn by the said master in security or payment of necessary furnishings or advances made to or on account of the said vessel, which had put into Paramaribo aforesaid in distress, and which advances and furnishings could not otherwise be obtained, the defenders being at the time of the drawing, and when the said bill was presented for acceptance, the employers of the said master, and the real owners or parties beneficially interested in the property of the said steamship, and lucrati by the advances and furnishings foresaid, and having ultimately sold and received the full price thereof, notwithstanding a bottomry bond granted by the said master to Mr Duncan Cameron Munro, now deceased, British Consul at Paramaribo aforesaid, dated 19th July 1867, which bottomry bond was held by the said Duncan Cameron Munro in trust for the pursuers to the extent of the amount of the bill founded on in the present action, . . . together with the interest thereof at the rate of five per cent per annum from the 24th day of September 1867, when the said bill fell due, and was presented and protested for non-payment, till payment."

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875. Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

The defenders stated in defence that they were not the owners of the vessel when the furnishings mentioned in the summons were made, that they were not the employers of Captain Graham, that they did not authorise him to draw on them for the sum sued for, nor to pledge their credit therefor, and that they were not lucrati by the advances and furnishings in question.

They further maintained that the alleged bottomry bond was invalid.

The following facts were admitted or proved :—

In the beginning of the year 1866 the defenders ordered for the Southern Steam Navigation Company in New Zealand, in this country, the steamship "Pareora," and advanced considerable sums on her account, which were not repaid. The defenders appointed Captain William Graham to the command of the vessel, with instructions to take her out to New Zealand, and thereafter to take instructions from Messrs George Gray Russell and Company, Dunedin, who acted on behalf of the Southern Steam Navigation Company. The vessel sailed from Glasgow on 31st October 1866.

The "Pareora" was originally registered in the name of the defenders, but before she sailed she was transferred to that of Mr Steele, manager of the New Zealand Bank, for the purpose of securing payment of certain bills for the price of the vessel discounted with the bank.

On her voyage out to New Zealand the "Pareora" suffered damage, and in April 1867 put into Paramaribo to refit, where she remained some time. Captain Graham granted to Mr Duncan Cameron Munro, British Consul at Surinam, a bond for £675 (No. 12/2 of process),* referred to in

* The document was in the following terms :—"Know all men by these presents, that I, William Graham, master of the screw-steamer 'Pareora' of Glasgow, belonging to William Johnstone Steele, of No. 50 Old Broad Street, London, banker, am held firmly bound unto Duncan Cameron Munro, Her Britannic Majesty's Consul and Lloyd's agent at Surinam, in the sum of £675 sterling of British lawful money, to be paid to the said Duncan Cameron Munro, or to his certain attorney, executors, administrators or assigns, for which payment well and truly to be made I bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, and also the said screw-streamer 'Pareora' of Glasgow, with her tackle, apparel, machinery, and furniture, and the freight to be earned by her on her voyage after-mentioned, by these presents, sealed with my seal on this the 19th day of July 1867.

"The said screw-steamer arrived at Paramaribo, Surinam, on the 1st day of April 1867 from Greenock, Scotland, she being unable to proceed to her port of destination, viz., Dunedin, New Zealand, from the want of proper sails and rigging, and the hindrance caused by two large iron elbows under the quarter for supports to the shafts of the screw propellers rendering said steamer quite unmanageable, and obliging her to put into this port in distress for want of provisions, and to have that done to the steamer that was necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage to the port of destination, such as to procure coals or fuel, as also engineers, with all other necessaries, to enable her to prosecute the voyage successfully to Dunedin, New Zealand, aforesaid; and the said William Graham, in order to be enabled to pay for the necessary and lawful disbursement and expenses to enable him to proceed to sea with her on the said intended voyage, hath requested the said Duncan Cameron Munro to lend and advance the sum of £675 sterling, for which amount the said William Graham has given off three setts of bills of exchange, all dated the 17th day of July the summons as a bottomry bond, and also bills drawn upon the defenders for the same amount. The bond and bills were granted by the master for sums advanced and expended in payment of accounts for necessary repairs and furnishings to the ship at Paramaribo in circumstances which entitled the master to grant a bottomry bond.

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875. Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

After leaving Paramaribo the "Pareora" got into more difficulties, and had to stop at Bahia, before reaching which Captain Graham died. At Bahia the crew were paid off, and the defenders sent out a person to take possession of the ship. The defenders having retired the bills discounted by the Bank of New Zealand, the vessel was again registered in the defenders' name, and was sold at Bahia, without prejudice to the rights of parties. The proceeds of the sale, £4457, 18s. 2d., were received by the defenders, who paid all expenses at Bahia. The Southern Steam Navigation Company became insolvent, and had nothing more to do with the "Pareora."

One of the bills drawn by Captain Graham upon the defenders was granted in favour of Miller Brothers and Company of Paramaribo, who endorsed it to the pursuers. The defenders refused to accept the bill.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), on 13th July 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact, the substance of which has been given in the preceding narrative)—"Finds (11) that pursuers now sue on the bills, pleading that the defenders are liable because they received the price as a surrogatum for the 'Pareora,' which was liable for the amount of the bond 12/2 of process, that document being a bottomry bond; and, secondly, that the defenders are liable, because the master was their agent to do what was necessary for the ship, and they were lucrati by his so acting, and took advantage of it, receiving the price of the ship, which contained fittings, &c., bought with money received under the bond; while defenders deny that 12/2 of process is a bottomry bond, or that they were lucrati by it, the repairs not having been done for their behoof, but to enable the steamer to proceed out to New Zealand: Finds on the whole case and in law (I.) that the bond 12/2 of process is substantially a bottomry bond, although not corresponding in every particular with the usual form of that document; (II.) that the defenders retained all along an interest in the 'Pareora,' as the Southern Steam Navigation Company could not claim her until they paid in the Bank of New Zealand the balance of defenders' advances, up to which time the defenders were entitled, on their retiring themselves the bills they had cashed into the bank, to redemand a transfer, as they ultimately did; (III.) that Graham, the captain, appointed by defenders, was no doubt bound, after the vessel should have been transferred to the Southern Steam Navigation Company, to act under their orders, but up to that time his powers over the vessel were subordinate, not to the Southern 1867, at thirty days' sight, on Messrs Potter, Wilson, and Company, Glasgow, one sett in favour of Messrs Miller Brothers and Company for the sum of £250 sterling, one sett in favour of D. C. Munro, Her Britannic Majesty's Consul, endorsed to Thomas Green, Esq., for the sum of £250 sterling, and the other sett for the sum of £175 sterling in favour of D. C. Munro, Her Britannic Majesty's Consul, and endorsed over to Alexander Denoon, Esq., 34 Old Broad Street, London. On the acceptance and due payment of the aforesaid bills of exchange, amounting in all to £675 sterling, this bond, given on vessel, machinery, furniture, and freights as well, so far as in my power, binding self, owner, and agents of said vessel, viz., Messrs Potter, Wilson, and Company of Glasgow, for the due and proper fulfilment of this my engagement, which, when duly fulfilled and implemented, this bond shall be thereby nullified and cancelled. WILLIAM GRAHAM."

---

No. 22.
Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

Steam Navigation Company, but to the defenders; (IV.) that thus Graham, in granting the bond and bills, was, to a certain though limited extent, acting on behalf of defenders; (V.) that as the advances received under the bond 12/2 of process refitted the 'Pareora' and enabled her to proceed to Bahia, where she was sold, and defenders received the proceeds, defenders were undoubtedly lucrati by the advances in question; (VI.) that therefore on both grounds the defenders must be held liable in repayment of these advances: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders as libelled: Find the defenders liable to the pursuers in expenses," &c.*

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Dickson), who, on 7th April 1875, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adheres to the findings under heads (1) one to eleven (11) inclusive, and to the finding under head I., 'on the whole case and in law,' in the interlocutor appealed against: For the reasons stated in the note hereto, recalls the remaining findings therein: Finds that the master of the 'Pareora' had not power to bind the defenders by bills for the repairs or furnishings to the vessel, and finds that the defenders are not liable for the said repairs and furnishings on the ground that they have been lucrati thereby: Finds that the defenders are liable therefor, in respect of having become owners of the vessel while the same was hypothecated under the said bottomry bond: Therefore adheres to the interlocutor in so far as it repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders as libelled: Adheres also thereto as regards expenses, and decerns."†

---

* "NOTE.—The question whether 12/2 of process is a bottomry bond is a very nice one. The fact that the owner is mentioned, not indeed in the bond itself, but in the appended narrative, is, to a certain extent, unfavourable to it; but it has been held that such an obligation is simply to be held surplusage. Besides, the terms in which the owner is mentioned,—'This bond given on vessel, machinery, furniture, and freight as well, so far as in my power, binding self, owner, and agents,' &c., 'for the proper fulfilment of this my engagement,' seem just to mean for the 'fulfilment of this bottomry engagement, so far as I can bind them to it.'

"The fact that no special rate of premium is named has been held in former cases not to invalidate a bottomry bond. The absence of a distinct statement of maritime risk is a more important want; but the English Courts have shewn themselves inclined to spell such a statement out of the most meagre and apparently insufficient grounds. For instance, it was held (Simonds v. Hodgson, 1832, 3 Barn. and Ad. 50), that when a captain in such a bond bound himself that it was to be repaid 'whenever I arrive in London,' that implied that the vessel should get safely there; whereas under these terms the captain might naturally have remained bound though he escaped there from a shipwreck. Here the statement that the captain binds not only the vessel but the freight to be earned by her on her voyage, which, of course, would not be payable if she were lost, shews that in his statement of liability he was contemplating her eventual safety. This is, at least, as good an indication of the intention of the captain as the words in the case above mentioned. In fact, the decisions seem to shew that if it appears from the circumstances that the intention of the parties was to execute a bottomry bond, its terms are to be very leniently construed, not only because it is often executed where good legal advice is not to be got, but also because while a bottomry bond is generally granted abroad, the forms of it are very different in different countries. Here the circumstances lead to the conclusion that a bottomry bond was certainly intended, and the terms of the document are not so inconsistent with that view as to render it null."

† "NOTE.—The Sheriff has experienced great difficulty in this case. Upon the main ground of action, viz., that No. 12/2 of process is a bottomry bond, he concurs, but with considerable hesitation, with the Sheriff-substitute.

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875. Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for them;—The master had no power to hypothecate the ship on an ordinary bond, but only upon the peculiar contract of hazard known

"The principles on which it has to be decided, whether the document is a bottomry bond or not, are thus stated in the most recent treatise on the law of merchant shipping:—'It is an essential part of the contract of hypothecation that the repayment of the money should be dependent upon the ship's arrival at her destination. If the deed makes the loan repayable at all events, the contract is invalid as an hypothecation. But as these instruments are the creatures of necessity and distress, and usually contain the language of commercial men, and not of lawyers, they receive a liberal construction. It is not, therefore, necessary that the risk should be mentioned in express terms; it is sufficient if it can be fairly and reasonably inferred from the whole document that it was the intention of the parties to make the repayment of the money dependent on this contingency.' See Maude and Pollock on Merchant Shipping, 2d ed., 391.

"The chief circumstances against the view that the document in question is a bottomry bond are—(1) that it does not bear to be so in express terms; (2) that it does not bear a rate of interest indicative of a maritime risk; (3) that it contains a clause in these terms:—'On the acceptance and due payment of the aforesaid bills of exchange, amounting in all to £675 sterling, this bond, given on vessel, machinery, furniture, and freights, as well so far as in my power binding self, owner, and agents of said vessel, viz. Messrs Potter, Wilson, and Company of Glasgow, for the due and proper fulfilment of this my engagement, which, when duly fulfilled and implemented, this bond shall be thereby nullified and cancelled.'

"Of these considerations, the first is of little or no moment. The second is important, because it may be assumed in general that a merchant will not make advances on a security subject to the risks of the sea without such an extra rate of interest as will cover the extra risk. The absence of such a rate has been held in several cases to shew that the document is not a bottomry bond (see 'The Emancipation' 1840, 1 Wm. Robinson's Appeal Cases, 124). But it is settled law that, while it is an element, and an important one for consideration, it is not conclusive (see MacLauchlan on Merchant Shipping, p. 49, 'Royal Arch' 1840, 1 Swab. Admiralty Reports, 269).

"In the present case the bond seems to have been taken, not so much as a direct and primary obligation in favour of the party making the advances, but as an additional security on account of it being doubtful whether the master could bind the defender by the bills.

"The defenders' argument, that the existence of these bills shews that the lender dealt with the case as an ordinary trade risk might be good if they admitted their liability under the bills. But it will hardly do for them to deny that the master had power to secure the advances by these bills, and at the same time contend that the granting of the bills proves that the advances were made on the security which they were supposed, but erroneously, to afford. It is more reasonable to hold that the lenders took the same view as the defenders do of the master's authority to grant the bills; while knowing that he had authority to give security on the vessel by a bottomry bond, and to hold that accordingly the lenders trusted to the bond rather than to the bills for repayment.

"Besides, it is settled that a bottomry bond is not rendered ineffectual by the existence of bills as collateral securities (see 'The Emancipation,' cited above, and other cases in Maude and Pollock, 2d ed. p. 390, 3d ed. p. 439).

"The Sheriff cannot adopt the defenders' argument that the idea of a maritime risk is excluded by the master having pledged his personal credit to the lenders, from having used the words, 'I bind myself, my heirs,' &c. These words, being followed immediately by those which give security on the ship, would seem not to infer personal liability by the master for the advances (see Simonds v. Hodgson, 1832, 3 Barnwell and Adolphus, p. 50).

"Looking to the scope of the document as a whole, and taking into view the

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875. Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

as a bottomry bond. The document relied on by the pursuers was wanting in all the indicia of a bottomry bond. It was not called a bottomry bond; no maritime interest was stipulated; and above all, it wanted the essential requisite that the liability of the lender to the sea risks must either appear or be fairly collected from the instrument.[1] The master was no doubt entitled to pledge the personal credit of the owners, but the defenders were at the date of the furnishings neither the registered owners, nor the true owners, nor was their credit relied on.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The bond was a good bottomry bond.[2] (2) If it was not, the defenders were liable as the employers of the master,[3] and as the persons who were really interested in the ship.

At advising,—

Lord Gifford.—This is an important case, and in many respects is attended with a good deal of difficulty. It raises several questions of great general interest in mercantile and maritime law.

After full consideration, however, I have formed a pretty clear opinion that the defenders, Messrs Potter, Wilson, and Company, are liable to the pursuers in the sum sued for. I think that the result which has been reached by both the Sheriffs is well founded, although I have come to this conclusion upon different grounds from those relied on by the Sheriffs.

It is admitted that the sum sued for, £250, forms part of larger sums which were advanced to the master of the steamship "Pareora," at or near Surinam, which sums were required to pay and were actually expended in paying for necessary repairs of and supplies to the "Pareora," to enable her to proceed on doubts which it indicates, and which the defenders' pleas shew to have been well founded as to the sufficiency of the bills, looking especially to the strong terms in which the security is taken on the vessel and her freight 'for her voyage,' looking to the narrative of the objects for which the advance was required, and to the absence of any other security or obligation for its repayment, the Sheriff considers that the parties must be held to have intended the document to be a bottomry bond.

---

"As to the other grounds of action, it is thought that the defenders are not liable under the bills drawn on them by the master, because they were not the registered owners of the vessel at the time, because they put in the master, not on their own account, but with the view of carrying out the directions of the shipping company on whose orders the ship was commissioned by them, and because they did not give the master authority to incur obligation on their credit.

"Nor, again, is it sufficient to infer liability that the defenders had an interest in the ship, or were afterwards lucrati by the transaction,—as witness the case of mortgage creditors or owners under a time charter, all of whom may profit eventually by repairs and furnishings to a ship in which they are interested, but who are not liable for debts incurred for these purposes by the master.

"Besides, it is not proved that the defenders have been lucrati; for there is nothing to shew that they would have been in any worse position if the vessel had been sold at Surinam, unencumbered by the debt there incurred, than they now hold, in consequence of her having been sold at Bahia."

[1] "The Emancipation," Jan. 31, 1840, 1 Wm. Robinson's Admiralty Cases, p. 124; Stainbank v. Fenning, May 30, 1851, 11 C. B. Rep. 51; Stainbank v. Shepard, Feb. 14, 1853, 13 C. B. Rep. 418, 22 L. J. (N. S.) Ex. 341; Abbott on Shipping (11th ed.), 133; Maude and Pollock on Shipping (3d ed.), 439; Bell's Comm. (M'Laren's ed.), i. 578, &c.

[2] "The Nelson," July 2, 1823, 1 Hagg. Ad. Rep. 169 (see Lord Stowell's judgment, 176); and cases cited in the Sheriff's note.

[3] Abbott on Shipping (11th ed.), 108.

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

her voyage. It is also admitted that the said sums were borrowed at a time and place, and under circumstances which entitled the master to grant bottomry bond for said sums. There is therefore no question as to the necessity or propriety of the advances or as to their actual and beneficial application, and there is also no question as to Captain Graham's power to borrow the sums, for the parties admit that he borrowed the money in circumstances which entitled him to grant bottomry bond therefor.

It is also admitted or sufficiently proved that the pursuers, Messrs Miller and Company, are in right of the £250 now sued for. They are indorsees of the captain's draft for that amount, the authority of the indorser being admitted in a joint minute, and although there is no formal assignation in favour of the pursuers of the so-called bottomry bond, still the bond, whether one of bottomry or not, is by the very terms of it so connected with the captain's drafts that I have no doubt of the pursuers' right to found upon the bond, whatever its true legal effect may be.

The only question in dispute therefore is, whether the present defenders, Messrs Potter, Wilson, and Company, are in point of law liable to the pursuers for the £250 now in question, and that either by reason of their position when the advances were made to the captain, or by reason of the so-called bottomry bond, or on any other grounds in law.

Now, I am of opinion that, apart altogether from the so-called bottomry bond, the defenders by their position and actings became liable for the necessary and indispensable advances made to Captain Graham at Surinam, and of which the sum now sued for forms part.

The captain of a ship at a foreign port who is without the means of communicating with his owners or employers, and where repairs or supplies to the vessel are indispensable, is entitled to get such necessary repairs executed or necessary supplies made, and to pledge therefor the credit of his owners or employers, and if that credit fails, that is, if the captain cannot obtain what is absolutely necessary on the personal credit of his owners or employers, he is entitled to get the money on a bond of bottomry, or, if he requires to pledge the cargo also, on a bond of respondentia. It seems quite fixed, however, that the captain's first duty is to obtain the necessary money or supplies on the personal credit merely of his owners or employers. This is the best and the cheapest mode of raising the money, and it is only when this fails or is found impossible that the captain can resort to the far more costly and expensive mode of raising money on a bond of bottomry or respondentia. The maritime interest, as it is called, or the price of the hazard or risk for which in a bond of bottomry the lender stipulates, is often very high, sometimes even a third of the sum advanced, and the law very properly will not allow the captain to impose this heavy burden upon his owners of he can raise the money on their credit or on cheaper terms. I need not cite authorities for this doctrine, for it was not disputed at the bar, and is completely established by many cases, and is laid down by most of the institutional writers. Professor Bell states the rule shortly thus (Bell's Coms., M'Laren, i. 579)—"In a foreign country the master is allowed to enter into bottomry if he can no otherwise procure the supply, but where he has already received the money on the footing of a personal credit he has no power to convert the personal contract into a bottomry transaction." And again (note 4)—"It is the master's duty, if possible, to obtain the advance on the personal credit of his owner." See the cases cited.

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

Now, I am of opinion, on the facts proved in the present case, that Captain Graham, proceeding strictly according to law, tried to obtain and did obtain the advance in question, not on a bond of bottomry strictly so called, but on the personal credit of the present defenders, Messrs Potter, Wilson, and Company, whom he regarded and with whom he dealt as his owners and employers, and upon whom as such he drew bills for the sums advanced. No doubt, besides the drafts, he also granted the bond which has raised so much difficulty in the present case, and the effect of this bond I shall consider by-and-by, but it seems to me perfectly clear upon the proof that Captain Graham intended to pledge and attempted to pledge for the advances the personal credit of Messrs Potter, Wilson, and Company, and it was upon them alone that he drew the bills for the amounts advanced.

Now, the question is, and I think it is the first question in the case, had Captain Graham power to bind the defenders for the necessary debts he incurred at Surinam? I am of opinion that he had. No doubt the rule of law is generally stated that in circumstances like the present the captain can only bind his owners, and the defenders maintain that at the date of the advances they were not the owners of the "Pareora," but merely the agents for the owners, "The Southern Steam Navigation Company (Limited)" holding a security over the ship for their advances, and the ship being then registered in name of Mr Steele, one of the directors of the Bank of New Zealand, London. I think, in law, however, and for the purposes of this action, the defenders at the time of the advance must be regarded as the owners, whom the captain had power to bind and did actually bind, for the necessary supplies. It is not necessarily the person whose name is on the register who is to be regarded as owner in a question like the present, but it is the person who has the real control of the ship, and from whom alone the captain derives his authority. The expression "the captain can bind his owners" is a little ambiguous and misleading; the language of the Roman law which we have adopted is more accurate. The captain binds the exercitors of the ship, and does so in virtue of his powers derived from them. The exercitor of a ship is the person who employs the ship and captain, by whom the captain is præpositus navi, and with whom alone the captain has a contract. The real question is, for whom did the captain act—who gave him power to act—who was his mandant—for the captain after all is only the mandatary of his employers. Lord Tenterden—(Tenterden on Shipping, 11th ed. p. 108) says, in reference to cases like the present,—"It should be observed also that the owners here spoken of are not in all cases the persons in whom the absolute legal title of the ship may be vested, but rather those from whom the master derives his authority, and whose agent he is on the particular occasion;" and this doctrine is recognised in a great many of the cases which have occurred.

It appears to me to be quite clear, not only that the present defenders were the only mandants with whom Captain Graham had any contract, and from whom alone he derived his powers, but that the defenders were the only parties who had the real control of the ship, and, as it turned out, the real interest in her. No doubt the defenders were agents for the Southern Steam Navigation Company, and if everything had gone right she would ultimately have been delivered to that company, but she never was delivered, and the company never had any active title or jus in re in the ship. The defenders apparently ordered her from the builders on their own credit and responsibility. The defenders registered themselves at first as the only owners, and though for a

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

while the defenders pledged her to a London bank in name of Mr Steele, one of the bank directors, that was a mere temporary security. The defenders paid the money they had borrowed and took her back—again registered her in their own names, and ultimately sold her for their own behoof, and received the whole proceeds of the sale. I think the defenders cannot successfully maintain, as in a question with the foreign creditor who advanced necessaries in the ship's exigency, that they are not the owners and that the captain had no right to bind them. Admittedly, the captain, in the straits to which he was reduced, had power to bind somebody who in law must be held to be his owners or exercitors, and it seems to me that the defenders are the only parties who can bear that character. It was hardly maintained—I think it could not be maintained—that the captain had power to pledge the credit of Mr Steele, the London bank director, or to bind Mr Steele personally, merely because he at the time stood as registered owner. Steele never granted any mandate or power in favour of the captain. As little, I think, can it be maintained that the captain could bind the Southern Shipping Company merely because it was intended that they should ultimately get the vessel, although with that company the captain had no communication and from them he had received no powers. The captain's only constituents were the defenders; they only were his employers; they only were liable for his salary or wages; and from them alone did he take his only instructions. The defenders in their letter of 26th October 1866, addressed to Captain Graham, prescribe clearly Captain Graham's duty,—"Your duty is a very simple one, namely, to take out the vessel in as short a time as you can, and to deliver her on arrival to our friends, Messrs George Gray Russell and Co., of Dunedin, from whom you will take all further instructions." Nothing can more clearly shew that Captain Graham was the defenders' servant until he should deliver the vessel at Dunedin. I think, as shipmaster, and until he got to Dunedin and gave up his charge there, he had full power to bind the defenders as in law his owners or exercitors, and that he had power to bind no one else.

Supposing the case had stopped here, and that no bond had ever been granted, I think the defenders' liability would be clear. It is true that a captain cannot liquidate such a debt as this and bind his owners absolutely by granting a bill in their name. He cannot cut his owners out of the defence that the advances were unnecessary or unjustifiable. But this is not an action upon the defenders' bill, binding the defenders or bearing to bind the defenders as for a liquidated debt. It is an action for the sum contained in the captain's draft which the defenders refused to accept and have never accepted, and the defenders' liability for which sum is the question raised in this action. I think the defenders are liable, and that the moment they admitted the necessity and the application of the advance that moment they were bound to have accepted the captain's draft therefor.

Now, in my view, the only remaining question in the case is, does it make any difference on the defenders' liability that the captain, besides drawing on the defenders for what was really the defenders' just debt, granted in addition the bond No. 12/2 of process. I have come very clearly to be of opinion that the granting of this bond—let the nature of the bond be what it may—does not affect the liability which the defenders have otherwise incurred for the necessary, the indispensable, and the beneficial advances sued for.

In the first place, I have come to form, and ultimately without much difficulty, a pretty strong opinion that the bond in question is not in the legal and strict sense a bottomry bond at all. My reasons for this opinion I may mention in a very few words, for the decision of the case does not depend upon this point. I think the bond is not a bottomry bond (1) because it does not, either in words or by implication, bear to be so. It is expressed absolutely, without any contingency mentioned for a definite sum payable at a definite date, and it bears to bind the captain, his heirs, the steamer "Pareora," with apparel, &c., the freight of the existing voyage and (if the captain had power) the owners and agents of the vessel. I cannot gather from the bond any of the elements of proper bottomry. (2) So far from being made contingent on the voyage, the advance is made payable at a precise date (thirty days after sight of the bills), a date which might be before or which might be after the completion of the voyage, but which was no way dependent thereon. (3) No maritime risk is mentioned or can be inferred upon the occurrence of which the bond and bills should be void. This is essential to bottomry—it is the meaning of the very name. The only circumstance from which such risk can possibly be inferred is the clause by which the captain pledges the freight of the existing voyage, and of course if the voyage was not completed no such freight would be earned. But the failure of this special freight leaves all the rest of the bond untouched, and it seems to me far too strong a step to hold that because an unearned freight is pledged or attempted to be pledged the whole bond is made conditional on the completion of the voyage. (4) To me it is conclusive that no maritime interest or premium for risk is either stipulated for or promised. The lender is not even to get legal interest or simple interest at the lowest rate. He is to get no interest at all till the bills fall due, thirty days after sight, and this would or might be many months after the advance; and on payment of the bills at maturity without interest the bond is declared void. It is to me absolutely incredible that the lender should not only lend his money for a long time without interest, but should actually be willing, for nothing, to run the risk of the whole principal if the vessel should be lost,—a contingency by no means improbable, as appears from the proof. It is said the lenders had charged a commission, and this may explain why no interest was to run for a certain time, but I cannot possibly hold that if this vessel had gone to the bottom the British Consul at Surinam, and the present pursuer whose money he advanced, were to lose their whole debt although they got nothing whatever for running such a risk. A contract more unfair I cannot imagine, for it would virtually say—if the vessel arrives, the generous lender will get his own without either premium or interest, but if it does not arrive the simple-minded lender shall be held to have made a gratuitous present of the whole advance. For these and other reasons I cannot hold the bond to be a proper bottomry bond.

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

Then, if the bond be not a bottomry bond, what does it come to? It is simply an attempt by the master to impledge the ship for his owners' or exercitors' personal debt. It rather appears from the authorities that a master has no power to mortgage the ship otherwise than by bottomry, and if this be so then the attempted mortgage is bad; but this will not affect the personal obligation of the owners to repay the advances for repairs and necessaries which in the ship's emergency the captain was obliged to get. The case really may be brought to this: The bond in question is either a good bottomry bond, or it is nothing—nothing, I mean, having the force of a mortgage. If, contrary to my opinion, it should be held to be a good bottomry bond, then the defenders are liable under it as having taken and sold the vessel. On the other hand, if the bond is bad as a bottomry and bad as a mortgage, then it must be just laid aside as void or pro non scripto, and the defenders remain bound as the owners, exercitors, or mandants, bound by the act of their duly appointed captain, and bound just as they would have been if the bond in question had never been granted. It seems to me that this last is the sound and true view of the case, and upon this view I am for deciding in favour of the pursuers.

No. 22.
Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I concur with Lord Gifford, subject to a single observation on a passage towards the close of his opinion, in which, if I understood it aright, his Lordship seemed to hold that, whether the bond was good or bad, the defenders were liable. In regard to this view I wish to guard myself by saying that there is high authority to the effect that the owners of a ship, or the persons in the position of owners, in such a question as the present, cannot be personally liable, if the master has granted a valid bottomry bond; and I can very well understand that there may be good reasons for this proposition. But it is not necessary to go into them.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I should have been inclined to hold, on general principles of maritime law, that it being admitted that the repairs were necessary, and that the sum in question was duly expended, the creditor to whom the master granted this hypothecation, or bottomry bond, has a valid claim on the vessel on the completion of the voyage; and I should think it manifestly unjust, in that state of circumstances, to allow the owners, on any mere technicality, to retain and sell the vessel and leave the creditor unpaid. In one sense such a contract must be strictly construed—that is to say, it must clearly appear that the master, being in a foreign port, could not otherwise have obtained the money necessary to enable the vessel to proceed; but that is substantially admitted here. But, that being admitted or proved, the form or expression of the instrument ought to receive the most liberal construction, and technical objections are not to be favoured. Looking to the substance rather than the form of the transaction, I think that the master had power to bind the vessel in the event which happened, and that it is idle technicality to object that, in an event which has not occurred, and under which the bond would not have been valid or binding, liability was not specially excluded by the words of the obligation. Such, I think, were the principles on which the Admiralty Court in England used to proceed. Lord Stowell, in words which have been often quoted in such cases, thus expressed the rules of construction which prevailed in that Court:—"Here we don't take the bond in toto, as is done in other systems of law, and reject it as unsound on the whole if vicious in any part. But we separate the parts, reject the vicious, and respect the efficiency of those which are entitled to operate."[1]

This principle has been often applied in England, either by importing into the bond conditions which are not expressed, or restricting general words within limits more narrow than the sense which they do express. Thus, while holding that the creditor in a bottomry bond must take the risk of the voyage, I should have been prepared in this case to have given effect to the act of the master, so far as his power extended, while I rejected the generality of the words so far as they might reach farther. This view would be entirely in consistency with the grounds of judgment in the case of "The Nelson," to Lord Stowell's

[1] "The Nelson," July 2, 1823, 1 Hag. Ad. Rep. 176.

No. 22.
Nov. 9, 1875.
Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

opinion in which I have already referred, and in the case of Simonds v. Hodgson, 1832, 3 Barn. and Ad. 50, decided by Lord Tenterden, and often quoted with approval. Indeed, Sir John Strange, Master of the Rolls, went much further in Samsun v. Bragington, 1750, 1 Vesey, 442, and sustained an hypothecating deed which was not conditional on the arrival of the vessel; and on the authority of that judgment the law was laid down in Abbott on Shipping, and so remained down to and including the 8th edition, as follows:—"But if the person who thus advances money does not choose to take upon himself the risk of the ship's return, and will be content not to demand maritime interest, there seems to be no reason why the master should not pledge both the ship itself and the personal credit of the owner"—(8th ed., p. 156).

But the difficulty I feel in giving effect to what I believe to be the general principle of maritime law in deciding the present case arises from the comparatively recent cases in the Common Law Courts, that of Stainbank v. Fenning, May 30, 1831, 11 C. B., and Stainbank v. Shepard, 13 C. B.,[1] in which the Common Bench held that the creditor in an hypothecating bond which did not bear to be dependent on the arrival of the vessel had no insurable interest, and that Lord Tenterden's opinion, supposed to have been expressed on the authority of Samsun v. Bragington, was wrong. Chief-Justice Erle differed from that judgment, and it has been adversely criticised by Continental jurists. But, if it be sound, it places an impediment in my way which it is difficult to surmount. This would leave the only question, whether it be a condition expressed in this bond, or to be inferred from its words, that the vessel should arrive at her destination. The indications relied on are very slender, and I am glad to be relieved of the necessity of coming to a conclusion in regard to them.

The case is thus reduced to alternatives. If the hypothecation is good, as the defenders sold the vessel the pursuer prevails on that ground; if it is invalid, it was because it was not intended to make the hypothecation dependent on the maritime risk. This leaves the obligation incurred by the master as a simple and unlimited undertaking on behalf of his employers to repay the amount expended in repairing the vessel; and if the repairs were necessary, which is not disputed, and the defenders were the employers of the master, they must be liable. It is laid down by all the authorities that the element to be searched for in such cases is not the ownership on the register, or even the legal ownership, but who gives the mandate—who confers the authority? I entirely concur with Lord Gifford's remarks on this head. The defenders were in fact owners in every sense; for the right of Steele, the bank agent, was a mere incumbrance; and as the defenders had never parted with the possession, the right of the New Zealand company resembled that of creditors rather than owners. But it is enough that the master was employed by the defenders and was subject to their orders. I entirely concur in Lord Gifford's views on this head, and adopt them without reserve.

Lord Neaves was absent.

This interlocutor was pronounced:*—"Sustain the appeal, and find as follows—(1) That the appellants (defenders in the Sheriff Court), as agents for the Southern Steam Navigation Company in New Zealand, ordered on commission in Britain the steamship 'Pareora,' and advanced considerable sums on her account, which have not been repaid; (2) that the appellants appointed Captain Graham to the command of the vessel, and that he continued throughout to be under the orders of the appellants; (3) that the vessel was registered in name of the appellants, but the title was transferred to Mr Steele, manager of the New Zealand Bank, for the purpose of securing payment of certain bills for the price of the vessel discounted with the bank; (4) that the 'Pareora,' on her voyage out to New Zealand, suffered damage, and put into Paramaribo to refit; (5) that Captain Graham granted to Mr D. C. Munro, British Consul at Surinam, for sums advanced to him as master, required by him to pay and expended in payment of accounts for necessary repairs of or supplies to the 'Pareora' at Paramaribo the bond No. 12/2 of process for £675, and also bills for the same amount, conform to the document No. 9/36 of process; (6) that after leaving Paramaribo the 'Pareora' got into more difficulties, and had to stop at Bahia; (7) that after the said steamship had lain some time in Bahia the crew were paid off, and the appellants sent out a person to take possession of the vessel, and the appellants, having retired the bills from the bank, the vessel was again registered in the name of the appellants; (8) that the appellants then sold the vessel, without prejudice to the rights of parties, and the proceeds of the sale, £4457, 18s. 2d., were received and held by the appellants, who paid all expenses at Bahia, and fall to be dealt with as a surrogatum for the vessel; (9) that the bill No. 7/1 of process, drawn by Captain Graham, was granted in favour of Messrs Miller Brothers and Company, of Paramaribo, who endorsed it to the respondents (pursuers in the Sheriff Court); (10) that at the date of these repairs the appellants were in possession and had control of the vessel, and were in the position of being employers of the master, and responsible for his legal contractions for the ship: Therefore, recall the interlocutors complained of, and of new repel the defences, and decern against the appellants (defenders) in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Find the respondents (pursuers) entitled to expenses in both Courts," &c.

[1] Stainbank v. Shepard, Feb. 14, 1853, 13 Scott's C. B. Rep. 418, 22 L. J. (N. S.) Ex. 341.

* Signed November 16, 1875.

No. 22.

Nov. 9, 1875.

Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson, & Co.

J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

AUGUSTUS TOWILL AND COMPANY AND MANDATARY, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Gloag.
THE BRITISH AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION (LIMITED), Defenders.—Fraser—Black.

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875.

Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

Sale—Principal and Agent—Usage of Trade—Proof—Parole.—Two brokers, acting respectively for the sellers and buyers of certain goods, having come to terms, the buyers' broker handed to the sellers' broker the following sale-note:—"Sold to (the buyers) . . . (the goods) . . . payment cash on delivery less 2½% in fourteen days as usual." This note, which was signed by the buyers' broker only, was sent by the sellers' broker to the sellers in a letter, in which he said, inter alia,—"Have sold . . . (the goods) . . . and herewith beg to hand said contract . . . Please transmit warrants and order for delivery, at same time confirming sale." On the same day the buyers' broker wrote to the buyers,—"We called on sellers' agents here and closed. . . . Contract we pass to-night through their friends here. On their confirmation of same, will then hand you counterpart." The sellers wrote in answer to their brokers' letter,—"We have your favour of yesterday with contract . . . which appears in order, with one exception. The payment clause should be cash in fourteen days (before delivery if required), less 2½% discount." A correspondence followed between the parties and their brokers, and finally the buyers refused to take the goods.

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875. Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

In an action at the instance of the sellers against the buyers for the price of the goods, the Lord Ordinary allowed the brokers to be examined as to whether the contract had been a concluded one between them or not. They both deponed that it was a concluded contract. The Lord Ordinary found that there was a concluded contract, and that the buyers were bound to fulfil it. On a reclaiming note, held (rev. judgment of Lord Young) (1) that the contract was one which fell to be construed by the Court, and that parole evidence had been improperly admitted; (2) that even had there been a concluded contract between the brokers, the sellers, by attempting to alter the "payment clause," were in breach, and that the buyers were therefore entitled to cancel the contract; but (3) on consideration of the sale-note and correspondence, that no concluded contract had been made, confirmation by the sellers having been a condition of the sale.

1st Division. Lord Young. B.

AUGUSTUS TOWILL AND COMPANY, merchants, Liverpool, and their mandatary, raised this action against the British Agricultural Association (Limited), whose offices were at Leith, for the sum of £2800 as the price of a cargo of between 350 and 400 tons of ancient bones which the pursuers alleged had been purchased from them by the defenders on 14th November 1873.

The alleged sale had, it was averred, been concluded between the brokers of the parties at Hull, the port at which the bones were warehoused. Sollitt, Hill, and Company acted as brokers for the pursuers, and John Harland and Company were brokers for the defenders. After some negotiations and correspondence* the brokers came to terms, and the defenders' brokers handed the pursuers' brokers a sale-note. This sale-note was as follows:—"Hull, 14th November 1873.—Sold to the British Agricultural Association (Limited), Leith, for account of Messrs Augustus Towill and Company, merchants, Liverpool, per Messrs Sollitt, Hill, and Company, Hull, about 350 to 400 tons (more or less) ancient bones, now laid in Bilton's and Winter's warehouses here at £6, 10s.—say six pounds ten shillings—per ton of 20 cwt., weighed and delivered free to craft here at the respective warehouses. Payment cash on delivery, less 2½% in 14 days as usual. Should buyers require three weeks to get them away to have this privilege, any dispute arising on this contract to be settled by arbitration as usual. JOHN HARLAND & Co."

Of even date with the sale-note the pursuers' brokers had telegraphed

---

* The following were some of the letters which passed:—

1. Pursuers to their brokers.—"20th Oct. 1873.—We have your favour of Saturday, and in reply, as we are in treaty with other buyers for the bones per Jno. Robinson, we will not bind ourselves to accept £6, 10s.; but if we were offered that figure to clear the parcel we would entertain it."

2. Pursuers to their brokers.—"10th Nov. 1873.—We are not anxious sellers of our bones per John Robinson for they are going to be very dear this next spring. At the same time if we got a bid of £6, 10s. to clear the lot we should be disposed to sell."

3. Defenders to their brokers.—"Leith, 11th Nov. 1873.—Ancient bones. We expected you would have been able to get these for us at our limit, but we now authorise you to bid £6, 10s. per ton f. o. b. less 2½% and delivery as required up to the end of the year. This is a very full price, and we cannot improve on it."

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875. Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

and written to the pursuers as follows:—"Your favour of the 13th inst. to hand, contents noted. This morning we wired you thus:

"'Have sold about three hundred and fifty tons ancient bones, ex John Robinson, at six pounds ten shillings per ton, less two and a half, and one per cent brokerage, delivery to be taken within a month,' craft being difficult to get, contract by post, which we confirm, and herewith beg to hand said contract. Messrs Harland and Co. being the parties with whom we were in treaty, but they, it seems, were only acting for another party we therefore got them to make out contract.

"Please transmit warrants, and order for delivery, at same time confirming sale, and oblige."

The defenders' brokers also wrote to their principals on the same day:—"We called upon the sellers' agents here, and closed at £6, 10s. per ton, less 2½% ex stores, herewith, 3 weeks to get them away, and wired you to that effect. We find that the owners are Messrs Augustus Towill and Co., Liverpool. Contract we pass to-night through their friends here. On their confirmation of same, will then hand you counterpart."

The pursuers wrote to their brokers on 15th November 1873:—"We have your favour of yesterday with contract for bones p. John Robinson, which appears in order, with one exception. The payment clause should be cash in 14 days (before delivery if required), less 2½% discount. We shall require some cash to account before we can give up warrants, which you will perhaps ask Messrs Harland and Co. to arrange, and then we will pass the warrants through our bankers, with order attached for, say, £2000."

Messrs Sollitt, Hill, and Company had an interview with Messrs John Harland and Company, and on 17th November wrote the pursuers:—"Your esteemed favour of the 15th inst. to hand, on receipt of which writer saw Messrs Harland and Co., and they will write their friends to-night, as requested, to the extent of £1500, they stating it might be the bones ran short of the weight calculated on, and then there is the 2½% to calculate as a deduction, so that £2000 would be too much like a payment in full before delivery. Will let you know the reply they receive from the north."

Harland and Company also wrote on the same day to the defenders:—"With respect to ancient bones, our friends stipulate that a certain amount must be paid in exchange for warrants. We expect they have got advances on them. We are writing them to-night."

To this the defenders replied by telegraph:—"Leith, 18th Nov. 1873.—Cannot agree to sellers' new stipulation ancient bones; will consider contract cancelled unless confirmed as originally made before four to-day."

This answer was communicated to the pursuers' brokers, and by them to the pursuers. A correspondence followed on the subject between the brokers and their principals on both sides.*

---

* The following are the most important letters and telegrams which passed subsequent to the date of the sale-note:—

1. Defenders' brokers to the pursuers.—"Hull, 14th Nov. 1873.—Through our neighbours here, Messrs Sollitt, Hill, and Co., we have bought of you, as per contract handed them, for account of our friends, the British Agricultural Association (Limited), Leith, the about 350–400 tons of ancient bones now here."

2. Pursuers' brokers to the pursuers.—"18th Nov. 1873.—We wired you to-day as follows:—In consequence of a call from Messrs Harland and Co., who had received the telegram of which we wired copy embodied in ours as follows:—'Harland Company have heard from their principals. Cannot agree sellers' new stipulation ancient bones.—Will consider contract cancelled unless confirmed as

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875.
Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

In the condescendence annexed to the summons the pursuers thus described the contract:—"The pursuers sold to the defenders a quantity originally made before four to-day. They propose to hand us bills of lading for bones, when delivered to craft, until payment is made as per contract. Contract asked to be returned if not accepted,' which we confirm but are without reply thereto."

3. Defenders to their brokers.—"Leith, 19th Nov. 1873.—Yours of y'day received. We can only confirm ours of equal date with reference to the bone contract, and as we cannot wait your friends' convenience in making the changes they have indicated will consider the contract cancelled. We will, however, be pleased to hear any new proposal they have to make through you."

4. Pursuers to their brokers.—"19th Nov. 1873.—We have now before us your favour of y'day confirming your telegram recd. late last evening, and in reply we are rather surprised Messrs Harland and Co. should decline to make a payment to a/c. the bones per Jno. Robinson against the warrants. Their principals are well aware of the usage, and always act up to it; at the same time, we have no desire to be as strict as they would be, and will hand over the warrant on payment of £1500 to account, or let you have the warrant, you shipping the bones in our name and to our order, and the buyer to pay an approximate amount against each B/ lading. We cannot do fairer."

5. Defenders to their brokers.—"Leith, 20th Nov. 1873.—Yours of y'day, with contract for bones enclosed. We can only agree to allow same to stand until to-morrow, when we shall see our buyer, and if he then consents to take the bones at the price and terms therein stated we shall have no objections; but as far as we are concerned you understand we cancelled the contract owing to the peculiar position your sellers took up. In any case, the date of the contract would require to be as from that on which we confirmed it. We shall be very glad for your sakes that we can still carry thro' the transaction, but, as you are well aware, it is impossible to get parties to wait indefinitely, and for which your principals are to blame."

6. Defenders' brokers to the defenders.—"Hull, 20th Nov. 1873.—We have by the second post, 1.45 P.M., yours of y'day crossing ours of same date, which will fully reply thereto. As to cancelling the contract, that is out of the question. We enclose your copy of letter received from Messrs Towill through their agent here." (Supra, No. 4.)

7. Defenders to their brokers.—"Leith, 21st Nov. 1873.—With reference to yours of yesterday, covering copy letter from Messrs Towill and Co., we regret for your sakes you have had all this trouble in vain, and that you did not make sure of the terms previous to passing the contract. As it is, we now decline having anything further to do with the parcel. Had we known your principals before we would not have cared to have made any offer for it at all. We enclose contract cancelled."

8. Defenders to their brokers.—"Leith, 22d Nov. 1873.—We have yours of y'day crossing ours of equal date, which we now beg to confirm. We didn't consider it necessary to wire, especially as you did not request this. We have now supplied ourselves with bones, and, for the present, are not buyers. We are glad to hear, however, that your friends will gain 2s. 6d. per ton on our having cancelled the contract. Perhaps this has something to do with their attempt to improve upon the contract made. In future, when you offer us anything through these principals, we shall be glad that you apprise us first."

9. Defenders' brokers to the defenders.—"Hull, 22d Nov. 1873.—We have yours of y'day crossing ours of same date. We are somewhat surprised you did not wire us y'day that you declined the bones on the contract handed you, as well as the sellers. You could have claimed them in accordance therewith, so long as the sellers kept the contract we sent them; any other or after suggestions you really had nothing to do with. We have, however, informed their friends here, in accordance with your letter, that you decline the same."

10. Pursuers' brokers to the pursuers.—"22d Nov. 1873.—We herewith send

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875. Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

of ancient bones then lying in the warehouses of Bilton and Winter, warehousemen, Hull, estimated and stated in the contract to amount to 350 or 400 tons (more or less), laid in said warehouses, at £6, 10s. per ton of 20 cwt., weighed and delivered free to craft at Hull. The contract stipulated for payment in cash after delivery, a discount of 2½ per cent being allowed on payment in cash within fourteen days after delivery. The contract provided that should the buyers require three weeks to get the bones away they should have that privilege. The contract, which is signed by the said John Harland and Company, and was delivered to the said Sollitt, Hill, and Company on behalf of the pursuers, is produced herewith. The defenders were thereby bound to take delivery of the said goods at the latest in three weeks after the date of the contract, that is, by the 5th December 1873, and they were thereby bound to pay the price within a fortnight thereafter, that is, by 19th December 1873."

The defenders relied upon their cancellation of the contract on 19th November (footnote, p. 120, No. 4).

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) A contract for the sale and purchase of the goods set forth in the condescendence having been concluded between the pursuers and defenders the defenders are bound to implement it.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) There never having been any concluded contract between the parties the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action. (3) The defenders having, before the conclusion of any contract between the pursuers on the one hand and John Harland and Company on the other, intimated to Harland and Company that they would not conclude the contract, the defenders are not bound by any pretended consent to the contract given by Harland and Company on the defenders' behalf.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, in the course of which the brokers of the parties and some mercantile men were examined as to the meaning and effect of the sale-note of 14th November. The brokers of both parties deponed that the contract was a concluded one on 14th November, and that they had power from their principals to enter into binding contracts; and the evidence of the mercantile men examined as to the usage of trade was to the effect that the sale-note made the contract a binding one according to the usage of trade.

On 19th March 1875 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor: —"Finds that the defenders are bound to fulfil the contract of sale entered into on 14th November 1873 between the pursuers and defenders through their respective brokers, duly authorised to that effect, and of which the sold-note, No. 6 of process, subscribed by the broker for the defenders, is a memorandum or note made and subscribed by the broker for the defenders at the time of the sale, by taking delivery of the bones thereby sold, and paying the price thereof at the rate of £6, 10s. per ton, under deduction therefrom of 2½ per cent discount, with interest from the 19th December 1873: Finds that the said price amounts to £2173, 11s.: . . . Therefore decerns against the defenders for payment to the pur-you copy of letter handed us by Messrs Harland and Co., whose principals have cancelled contract for bones ex John Robinson.

---

"We had another inquiry the other day. May we now offer them to the other parties? Awaiting reply."

11. Pursuers to their brokers.—"24th Nov. 1873.—We have your favour of Saturday, and, in reply, please inform Messrs John Harland and Co. that we shall compel the British Agricultural Association to fulfil their contract with us for the John Robinson's bones. We always thought it took two to cancel a contract, once made."

No. 23.
Nov. 12, 1875.
Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

suers of the said sum of £2173, 11s., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the said 19th December 1873 until paid, ... the pursuers, on payment of the said sum, handing to the defenders the warrant for delivery of the said bones: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.

The defenders reclaimed.

The cause was heard on 2d November 1875 before the First Division and Lord Rutherfurd Clark as Lord Probationer.*

Argued for the defenders;—

(1) The very terms of the letter written by the pursuers' brokers to them when forwarding the sale-note shewed that they did not think they

---

* LORD PROBATIONER.—This is a case on a contract of sale. The pursuers allege that they entered into a contract of sale with the defenders on 14th November 1873, and they bring this action to recover the price of the articles sold. The defenders allege, on the contrary, that there was no contract, and further maintain that if there was a contract the pursuers are in breach of it. In that state of the record a proof was allowed, and we have now under consideration the evidence taken, which is partly documentary and partly parole.

The Lord Ordinary has decided (1) that there was a concluded contract, and (2) that there has been no breach of contract on the part of the pursuers entitling the defenders to resile.

The first question for consideration is whether there was a concluded contract or not. The alleged contract is one entered into, not between principals, but between brokers. These brokers were examined before the Lord Ordinary, and both agreed that on 14th November 1873 a concluded contract was entered into between them, by which the one sold and the other bought the ancient bones in question. Therefore it appears on their evidence that there was a concluded contract. The defenders, however, say that there was no concluded contract—(1) because there was no authority on the part of the sellers' brokers to sell, and (2) because any contract required confirmation by the principals before it was concluded. The question really comes to be whether the contract is so expressed as to require confirmation by principals before it became binding. Considering that both brokers state distinctly that the contract which they themselves made was a binding one, I am of opinion that a contract was concluded in terms of the bought and sold note.

The second question is whether the contract was broken by the pursuers as the defenders allege. Some difficulty arises here from the explanation of the contract given by the pursuers on record. I prefer, however, to consider this question apart from mistaken averments, and on the documents themselves.

The contract is for the delivery of a considerable parcel of bones lying in two different warehouses in Hull, and the manner of executing this concluded contract was either to ship the goods to the defenders, or to hand over the delivery warrants.

The wording of the contract is—(quoted supra, p. 118). Whatever may be the precise meaning of these words, about which there is some doubt, it seems to me that they must mean that cash was to be given as nearly as possible simultaneously with the delivery of the cargo itself, that is, delivery to be received as against cash. The question then is, how is this to be done in a contract of this kind, where it is a matter of usage which is stipulated by the presence in the contract of the words "as usual." The pursuers say any arrangement with respect to this relates not to the constitution but to the execution of the contract, and so they intimated that before they gave up the warrants they must have a payment of £2000. The defenders immediately took up this position, that they were entitled to delivery before they paid cash. It seems to me, however, that this letter, which appears to have been read as if it introduced a new stipulation into the contract, did not do so, and that the defenders were not entitled to resile from the contract. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875.
Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

had powers to complete a binding contract without confirmation. The pursuers had not to this day confirmed the contract as set forth in the sale-note, and there was therefore no contract in existence on which they could sue.

(2) Even if a contract had been concluded the pursuers had been the first to attempt to alter its terms, and the defenders were at once put into a position to withdraw.

(3) The Lord Ordinary had acted wrongly in allowing parole evidence, as the contract was quite simple and easily understood,[1] and therefore none of the parole evidence could be looked at.

Argued for the pursuers;—

The contract had been constituted in the usual manner, and was a binding one. The whole effect of the pursuers' letter of 15th November was to effect a slight and usual alteration in the execution of the contract; but that could in no way affect its constitution, it being already binding on both parties.

The use of the words "as usual" in the sale-note were intended to import the usage of trade into the contract, and therefore parole evidence as to such usage was quite competent, and in this case that evidence was conclusively in the pursuers' favour.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action for the enforcement of a contract of sale said to have been completed on 14th November 1873, the commodity sold being about 350 tons of bones, and the pursuers being the sellers and the defenders the purchasers. The conclusions of the summons are for implement of the alleged contract of sale by payment to the pursuers of the sum of £2800 sterling, and taking delivery of the bones free on board at Hull, along with interest on the price from 19th December 1873 till payment.

The principal defence stated for the defenders is that the brokers who acted for them—Messrs John Harland and Company—were not duly authorised to complete this sale. In my opinion this defence is not well founded, for the correspondence clearly shews that they were duly authorised; but although they were so authorised the question may still remain, did they actually complete the sale? There remains also another defence: Supposing that the contract was completed, were not the pursuers themselves the first to commit a breach of it, and thus put the defenders in a position to resile?

The sale-note of 14th November 1873 was delivered to Sollitt, Hill, and Company, the brokers for the pursuers, by the defenders' brokers, on that day, and upon that day also Sollitt, Hill, and Company sent it to the pursuers. The terms of the letter in which they transmitted the sale-note appear to me very important. They are as follows:—"Herewith beg to hand said contract. Messrs Harland and Company being the parties with whom we were in treaty, but they, it seems, were only acting for another party, we therefore got them to make out a contract. Please transmit warrants and order for delivery, at same time confirming sale, and oblige." Now, at the same time and on the same day Harland and Company wrote their constituents, and they say:—"We called on the sellers' agents here, and closed at £6, 10s. per ton, less 2½ per cent ex stores, herewith, three weeks to get them away, and wired you to that effect. We find [1] Calder v. Aitchison, June 21, 1831, 9 S. 777; Peter v. Terrol, Sept. 26, 1818, 2 Mur. 28; Mackenzie v. Dunlop, Dec. 7, 1853, 16 D. 129, 26 Scot. Jur. 64.

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875.
Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

that the owners are Messrs Augustus Towill and Company, Liverpool. Contract we pass to-night through their friends here. On their confirmation of the same we will hand you counterpart." Now, it seems to me both the brokers for the pursuers and the brokers for the defenders acted on the footing that, although they as brokers had completed the sale, it required confirmation by the sellers. That was quite natural. The purchasers' brokers having made the offer with the approval of their principals, did not need further confirmation by them, but the sellers were not on the spot, and the contract entered into by their brokers would require their confirmation unless it were perfectly clear that they had given very full authority to their brokers to enter into contracts. I think, on the whole, that it would be very difficult to say that this contract could be completed until confirmed by the sellers. But the matter becomes still more difficult when we come on to a subsequent stage of this transaction, viz., on 15th November, when the sellers wrote to their brokers—"We have your favour of yesterday, with contract for bones p. 'John Robinson,' which appears in order with one exception. The payment clause should be—Cash in 14 days (before delivery if required), less 2½ per cent discount. We shall require some cash to account before we can give up warrants, which you will perhaps ask Messrs Harland and Company to arrange, and then we will pass the warrants through our bankers, with orders attached for, say, £2000." Here there is quite a distinct objection raised to one of the clauses of the sale-note—the one which the writer calls "the payment clause;" and I will shortly notice what I consider the meaning of that objection, but at present I would merely observe that the sellers themselves, equally with their brokers and the purchasers' brokers, thought that the contract needed their confirmation, because if it were not so it was too late to state this objection. Instead, however, of departing from it when it is not acquiesced in, they stand out for their proposed alteration throughout the whole correspondence.

Let us now see what is the meaning of the proposed alteration, and what would be the effect of the change in the terms of the contract if it were agreed to. The sale-note says:—"Hull, 14th Nov. 1873.—Sold to the British Agricultural Association, &c. . . . about 350 or 400 tons (more or less) ancient bones, now laid in Bilton's and Winter's warehouses here, at £6, 10s.—say six pounds ten shillings per ton—of 20 cwt., weighed and delivered free to craft here at the respective warehouses." Then comes the payment clause—"Payment cash on delivery, less 2½ per cent in fourteen days as usual. Should buyers require three weeks to get them away, to have this privilege. Any dispute arising on this contract to be settled by arbitration as usual." There has been a good deal of controversy as to the meaning of this contract. The pursuers, however, have made a very distinct averment as to what they understood it to mean in the first article of their condescendence, where they say—"The pursuers sold to the defenders a quantity of ancient bones then lying in the warehouses of Bilton and Winter, warehousemen, Hull, estimated and stated in the contract to amount to 350 or 400 tons (more or less), laid in said warehouses, at £6, 10s. per ton of 20 cwt., weighed and delivered free to craft at Hull. The contract stipulated for payment in cash after delivery, a discount of 2½ per cent being allowed on payment of cash within fourteen days after delivery. The contract provided that should the buyers require three weeks to get the bones away, they should have that privilege. . . . The defenders were thereby bound to take delivery of the said goods at the latest in three weeks after the date of the contract—that is, by 5th December 1873, and they were thereby bound to pay the price within a fortnight thereafter—that is, by 19th December 1873."

This is a very distinct statement as to the import of the contract, and it is very difficult to see how the pursuers, after making that statement on record, can be allowed to alter their view of the contract altogether, and say it was entirely erroneous, as they did in argument. If we take their own account on record, the letter of 15th November becomes very important, because the contract, as set forth on record, entitles the purchasers to take delivery of the whole subject, and not to pay, nor even grant a bill for the price, but within a fortnight after delivery they were for the first time to make payment of the price. I must say that is a very unusual contract, and very unfavourable for the sellers; but still, it is their own construction of it.

But what do they say in their letter of 15th November? They demand cash by 28th November, instead of 19th December, and that whether the goods have been delivered or not. It is impossible to conceive a greater difference than that which exists between the contract as construed by the pursuers on record and as altered by their letter of 15th November. The pursuers have also always stood upon their right to alter the terms of the contract before confirmation. It therefore appears to me that the contract was either never constituted, or that the pursuers committed a breach of it according to its true import as explained by themselves. But I am unwilling to rest our judgment upon the view of the contract stated by the pursuers on record, as that would appear a somewhat technical ground.

I am willing to read and construe the contract itself, and see whether the proposal of 15th November was not a material alteration on it. The contract as made is that the sellers sell to the purchasers a certain quantity of bones at a certain price, the fulfilment of the contract to extend over fourteen days, either by one delivery and one payment of cash, or several deliveries and several payments of cash as each delivery took place. The clause which follows seems to extend the period of fulfilment, if desired by the purchasers, to three weeks. That contract is quite easily read,—it contains no technical terms, there is no appeal whatever to usage of trade. "As usual" means just 2½ per cent discount, and fourteen days for delivery. They stipulated just the usual terms for delivery, and accordingly these words "as usual" appear again when it is stipulated that all disputes shall be "settled by arbitration 'as usual.'" The contract is therefore one for construction by the Court without the aid of experts or reference to usage of trade. I am of opinion that the construction I have put on this contract is the correct one.

What the pursuers say in their letter of 15th November is,—"The payment clause should be cash in fourteen days (before delivery if required), less 2½ per cent discount,"—that is to say, if the purchasers please to spread the delivery over three weeks they must still pay the full price in fourteen days. It is true this only makes a difference of a week, but the addition to a mercantile contract of this kind of stipulation, making cash payable a week sooner, is a very material alteration of the contract.

Whatever view is taken, therefore, of this case, whether (1) that the contract required confirmation, or (2) that it could be and was completed without confirmation, the result is the same. If the first view be taken, the contract was never completed; if the second, the pursuers were the first to commit a breach

No. 23. of it. I think we must recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor accordingly, and assoilzie the defenders.

Nov. 12, 1875. Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

LORD DEAS.—I am so entirely of the opinion expressed by your Lordship that it is hardly necessary for me to add anything. I think the brokers had power to complete a contract without confirmation by their principals—that is quite usual—they becoming personally responsible to the parties with whom they contracted. But although they had power to have done so, I think that was not what they did, because, although the contract was made between the brokers without any express stipulation for confirmation, they obviously came to the conclusion that, in acting for these particular parties, confirmation should be required before the contract was held concluded. That being so, be the powers of brokers what they may, this contract was not concluded until it should be confirmed.

In the second place, I am of opinion the words "as usual," in the note of date 14th November 1873, are not a stipulation that the contract was to be regulated by the usage of trade, but are merely a statement that the time of payment and the discount proposed were those which were usual. Nevertheless, usage of trade might competently enough be proved if there was anything technical or peculiar in the terms of the contract.

I do not, however, think that this contract requires explanation, for I see nothing technical or peculiar in it which the parole evidence can be said to clear up. The opinions of the witnesses adduced are no better and of no more weight than those of any other intelligent parties, and leave us, as before, to judge for ourselves.

In the third place, I agree with your Lordship that whichever view be taken of the alleged contract, whether according to the natural reading of it or the reading which the pursuers themselves assign to it in the record, the change proposed on 15th November was a palpable and material change on its terms. It was ingeniously suggested that the stipulation in the letter of 17th November 1873, "that a certain amount must be paid in exchange for warrants," was not a change on the constitution of the contract, but a reasonable change in regard to its execution. But I cannot distinguish between the constitution and the mode of execution of such a contract. The mode of execution is a most important part of the contract itself, and it is really attempting a distinction without a difference to say that the stipulated variation was on the mode of execution and not on the constitution of the contract.

The defenders intimated that if the demand made in the letter of 17th November 1873 was not departed from they would hold the contract as cancelled. The demand was adhered to, and the defenders consequently intimated that they now held the contract as actually cancelled. The reply to this was not a withdrawal of the stipulation, but a proposal to modify it; and, looking to the nature of the subject-matter of the contract, I think the pursuers were no longer entitled to object to the cancellation of the contract.

In any view, therefore, I concur with your Lordship that the interlocutor should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—It cannot be otherwise than with some hesitation, and on deliberate consideration, that I differ from the Lord Ordinary and the Lord Probationer. But, after careful and repeated consideration, I have, as your

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875.
Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

Lordship has done, come to a different conclusion. I do not doubt that the brokers for the parties could have entered into a contract of sale binding on both the parties whom they represented. The question is, did they do so? Was the contract at once completed by their interchange of notes, so that no confirmation was required and no objection was allowable?

I do not think the pursuers can maintain that the contract was completed finally by the interchanged note of 14th November 1873. The conduct of the brokers and the parties does not support this plea. That was not the opinion of either of the brokers at the time, for both of them dealt with the contract as requiring confirmation. We have here a letter on the day of the note which is said to form the complete contract from the pursuers' brokers to the principal asking confirmation of the sale—(supra, p. 119). We have also a letter from the defenders' broker to them saying they awaited confirmation—(supra, p. 119). This seems conclusively to shew that, by the brokers, the note was not looked on as finally constituting and completing the contract. They considered that it required confirmation. But that is not all. On the 15th of November the pursuers, through their brokers, proposed to make a change on the conditions of the contract. That proves that they did not consider the contract to be then finally and conclusively settled and closed. This proposal for a change, and not an unimportant change, was made while the contract was awaiting confirmation, and made by the pursuers, who now allege that the contract had been so completed as to exclude alteration. Still farther, the defenders' brokers having telegraphed to the defenders, the following is the communication made by the defenders to them:—"Leith, 19th November 1873. Yours of y'day received. We can only confirm ours of equal date with reference to the bone contract, and as we cannot wait your friends' convenience in making the changes they have indicated will consider the contract cancelled. We will, however, be pleased to hear any new proposal they have to make through you."

Now, a person who proposes an alteration on a contract made by his broker, and before him for confirmation, cannot afterwards be permitted to plead that the contract was at that time final and completed, not requiring confirmation nor susceptible of alteration. Such a plea by such a party is not correct in point of procedure, nor equitable on principle.

I do not think that the plea of mercantile usage or custom of trade is here applicable, nor is it stated on the record. The words "as usual" do not let in proof of general custom as affecting the construction of the contract, or the validity of it as made by the brokers. I rather think the words apply to the terms of discount.

I do not permit my opinion to be affected by the statement—I think the inaccurate statement—of the contract made by the pursuers on record. But on the sale-note, the correspondence, the conduct of the parties, and the ascertained facts, I have arrived at the same conclusion as your Lordship, and I think that the interlocutor complained of should be recalled.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion. As regards the powers of brokers to complete sales I have no doubt that in a large class of cases they can do so, but are understood to do so under implied authority to that effect, and that in such cases the bought and sale notes signed by them complete the bargain—Bell's Principles, sec. 89. The present, however, is not, in my opinion, one of those cases, because it is plain from the correspondence that both brokers dealt on the footing that their principals required to confirm. This is clear from the letter of 20th October 1873, in which the pursuers write to their brokers that they will not bind themselves to accept £6, 10s., "but if we were offered that figure we would entertain it." This letter was communicated to Harland and Company, the brokers for the defenders, and after some further correspondence between the brokers and their respective principals, the pursuers, on the 10th of November (supra, p. 118), again write to their brokers with instructions not to complete a sale, but to the effect that if they "got a bid of £6, 10s. to clear the lot we should be disposed to sell." This letter is then communicated to the defenders through their brokers, and on the 14th of November these brokers agree to take 350 tons of bones at £6, 10s., on certain stipulated terms, which are of the same date sent to the pursuers by their brokers, who write enclosing the sale-note and asking the pursuers to transmit warrants and delivery-orders, but requesting them at the same time to confirm the sale. Now, this is done after the contract had passed between the brokers, while Harland and Company, in their letter to their principals—the purchasers—say "on their (i.e. the pursuers') confirmation," a counterpart of the contract will be sent; thereby shewing plainly that neither of the brokers considered the bargain binding till confirmed by the pursuers. Instead, however, of confirming the sale the pursuers write on the 15th of November, and propose to alter the terms of the contract in material respects, but to this the defenders refuse to accede. It was in these circumstances that this dispute arose; and as I entirely concur in the construction put upon the contract by your Lordship in the chair, viz., that it was one for payment on delivery, I am of opinion that the defenders were warranted in refusing to agree to the alterations stipulated for by the pursuers, and are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

No. 23.

Nov. 12, 1875. Towill & Co. v. The British Agricultural Association.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor, assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the pursuers liable in expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the amount of said expenses, and report."

GEORGE BURN, W.S.—D. CURROR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 24.

Nov. 12, 1875. Kirk v. Kirk.

WILLIAM KIRK, Pursuer.—R. V. Campbell.
JANET B. DRYSDALE OR KIRK, Defender.—Mair—Hunter.
WILLIAM CARMICHAEL AND OTHERS, Co-Defenders.

Process—Divorce—Expenses.—It is a question for the discretion of the Court whether a wife who has unsuccessfully defended an action of divorce should be allowed her expenses in the Inner-House, and if she has reclaimed without probable grounds of success they will be refused.

Expenses—Divorce—Co-defenders.—The expenses of a husband who was successful in an action of divorce against his wife were allowed against three co-defenders, who had lodged defences but made no further appearance, conjunctly and severally, till the order for proof, and thereafter in the proportion of one-third against each.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. I.

WILLIAM KIRK, weaver, Dunfermline, obtained decree of divorce against his wife for adultery with three co-defenders.

The Lord Ordinary's finding as to expenses was as follows:—"Finds the co-defenders . . . . . conjunctly and severally liable in that part of the expenses referable to the raising of the action, and to the intervening procedure between that and the allowance of proof; and finds each of the

No. 24.

Nov. 12, 1875.
Kirk v. Kirk.

co-defenders separately liable in one-third of the remaining expenses of process, including therein the expense of precognitions."

The case was clearly proved, and the wife having reclaimed the Court adhered without calling on counsel for the pursuer.

Counsel for the defender moved for decree for her expenses against the pursuer in the Inner-House. It was conceded that the Lord Ordinary ought to have granted decree in her favour for the expenses in the Outer-House. The authorities undernoted were referred to.[1]

LORD ORMIDALE.—I should regret much if it were to be held by the Court as a settled matter that a wife, defender in an action of divorce, is in all circumstances entitled, at the expense of her husband, to reclaim against an adverse judgment of the Lord Ordinary. If that were so, she would on the same principle be justified in going to the Court of last resort at the expense of her husband; and the consequence would frequently be utter ruin, in a pecuniary point of view, to the unfortunate husband.

But I am not aware that any such principle has been established. On the contrary, the just and reasonable rule appears to me to be that the question how far the successful husband, pursuer in an action of divorce, is to be made liable for the expenses incurred by his wife in resisting the action is always one for the Court in the fair exercise of its discretion to determine according to circumstances. And an observation to this effect seems to have fallen from the Lord President, in the case which was referred to in the debate, of Donald v. Donald.

In the present case we were unanimously of opinion when deciding its merits that the adultery of the wife, extending over a period of several months, with three different co-defenders, had been proved beyond all manner of doubt, and so clear did this appear that we refused the wife's reclaiming note against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which was adverse to her, without requiring to hear the husband's counsel. For my own part, therefore, I cannot think that this is a case for allowing expenses against the husband subsequent to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and that to determine otherwise would be unjust, if not absolutely cruel, to him.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion. I think the principle is that as long as a wife has a probable ground of defence she may defend herself to the end at her husband's expense; and cases may be imagined in which she would be entitled to go to the House of Lords. But it is quite different where she has no probable ground of defence, as was the case with the defender here. To allow expenses against the husband in such cases would only have the effect of encouraging the advisers of a woman to persevere in proceedings in which their client has no real interest.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

The Court considered what decree should be pronounced with regard

[1] Donald v. Donald, March 30, 1863, 1 Macph. 741, 35 Scot. Jur. 434; Pitt v. Pitt, June 8, 1861, 24 D. 1444, 33 Scot. Jur. 528; Andrews v. Andrews, Feb. 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 401, 45 Scot. Jur. 269; Gow v. Gow, Feb. 21, 1855, 17 D. 477.

No. 24.
Nov. 12, 1875.
Kirk v. Kirk.

to expenses against the co-defenders who had lodged defences but made no further appearance.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find the reclaimer entitled to expenses against the respondent up to the date of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Quoad ultra refuse her motion for expenses: Find the co-respondents each liable in one-third of the additional expenses incurred by the respondent since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c.

MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—ROBERT MENZIES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 25.
Nov. 13, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Kechnie.

THOMAS JACKSON, Petitioner.—Brown—Balfour.
ARCHIBALD M'KECHNIE, Respondent.—D.-F. Watson.

Bankrupt—Trustee—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 103—Reparation.—An undischarged bankrupt recovered in an action a sum of damages for slander uttered subsequent to his sequestration. Held that under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act the sum vested in the trustee in the sequestration.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.

THE estates of Archibald M'Kechnie, shipowner, Glasgow, were sequestrated in 1870, and in 1873 the trustee was discharged. In 1875 the bankrupt, being still undischarged, raised an action of damages for slander against a firm of distillers, in whose employment he had been as a traveller, and obtained a verdict for £400. The slander was uttered in 1873, after the discharge of the trustee. At the instance of the creditors the former trustee in the sequestration, Mr Jackson, was re-appointed, and he presented this petition under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,[1] to have it declared that the sum of £400 vested in him at the date of the verdict. The money had not yet been paid.

The bankrupt appeared, and objected.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Declares all right and interest in the sum of £400 sterling or thereby mentioned in the petition, to which the said Archibald M'Kechnie has become entitled under the verdict of a jury returned and applied as set forth in the petition, to be vested in the petitioner as trustee on the sequestrated estates of the said Archibald M'Kechnie, as at the date when the said verdict was applied, in terms of the 'Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' and decerns: Finds no expenses due to or by either party." *

---

[1] 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 103—"That if any estate, wherever situated, shall, after the date of the sequestration, and before the bankrupt has obtained his discharge, be acquired by him, or descend or revert or come to him, the same shall, ipso jure, fall under the sequestration, and the full right or interest accruing thereon to the bankrupt shall be held as transferred to and vested in the trustee, as at the date of the acquisition thereof or succession for the purposes of this Act; and the trustee shall, on coming to the knowledge of the fact, present a petition setting forth the circumstances to the Lord Ordinary. . . . ."

* "NOTE.—The petitioner claims the money as being estate acquired or coming to the bankrupt after the date of the sequestration and before his discharge. The bankrupt, on the other hand, maintains that as the money has been awarded to him as solatium for defamation, his claim therefor against the defenders of the action was so entirely personal to himself as to exclude all claim upon the fund at the instance of the creditors of the bankrupt. And he relies in support of his contention partly upon a passing observation regarding actions of damages for defamation at the instance of a bankrupt under sequestration co-defenders separately liable in one-third of the remaining expenses of process, including therein the expense of precognitions."

No. 24.

Nov. 12, 1875. Kirk v. Kirk.

The case was clearly proved, and the wife having reclaimed the Court adhered without calling on counsel for the pursuer.

Counsel for the defender moved for decree for her expenses against the pursuer in the Inner-House. It was conceded that the Lord Ordinary ought to have granted decree in her favour for the expenses in the Outer-House. The authorities undernoted were referred to.[1]

LORD ORMIDALE.—I should regret much if it were to be held by the Court as a settled matter that a wife, defender in an action of divorce, is in all circumstances entitled, at the expense of her husband, to reclaim against an adverse judgment of the Lord Ordinary. If that were so, she would on the same principle be justified in going to the Court of last resort at the expense of her husband; and the consequence would frequently be utter ruin, in a pecuniary point of view, to the unfortunate husband.

But I am not aware that any such principle has been established. On the contrary, the just and reasonable rule appears to me to be that the question how far the successful husband, pursuer in an action of divorce, is to be made liable for the expenses incurred by his wife in resisting the action is always one for the Court in the fair exercise of its discretion to determine according to circumstances. And an observation to this effect seems to have fallen from the Lord President, in the case which was referred to in the debate, of Donald v. Donald.

In the present case we were unanimously of opinion when deciding its merits that the adultery of the wife, extending over a period of several months, with three different co-defenders, had been proved beyond all manner of doubt, and so clear did this appear that we refused the wife's reclaiming note against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which was adverse to her, without requiring to hear the husband's counsel. For my own part, therefore, I cannot think that this is a case for allowing expenses against the husband subsequent to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and that to determine otherwise would be unjust, if not absolutely cruel, to him.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion. I think the principle is that as long as a wife has a probable ground of defence she may defend herself to the end at her husband's expense; and cases may be imagined in which she would be entitled to go to the House of Lords. But it is quite different where she has no probable ground of defence, as was the case with the defender here. To allow expenses against the husband in such cases would only have the effect of encouraging the advisers of a woman to persevere in proceedings in which their client has no real interest.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

The Court considered what decree should be pronounced with regard

[1] Donald v. Donald, March 30, 1863, 1 Macph. 741, 35 Scot. Jur. 434; Pitt v. Pitt, June 8, 1861, 24 D. 1444, 33 Scot. Jur. 528; Andrews v. Andrews, Feb. 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 401, 45 Scot. Jur. 269; Gow v. Gow, Feb. 21, 1855, 17 D. 477.

No. 24.
Nov. 12, 1875.
Kirk v. Kirk.

to expenses against the co-defenders who had lodged defences but made no further appearance.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find the reclaimer entitled to expenses against the respondent up to the date of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Quoad ultra refuse her motion for expenses: Find the co-respondents each liable in one-third of the additional expenses incurred by the respondent since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c.

MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—ROBERT MENZIES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 25.
Nov. 18, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Kechnie.

THOMAS JACKSON, Petitioner.—Brown—Balfour.
ARCHIBALD M'KECHNIE, Respondent.—D.-F. Watson.

Bankrupt—Trustee—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 103—Reparation.—An undischarged bankrupt recovered in an action a sum of damages for slander uttered subsequent to his sequestration. Held that under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act the sum vested in the trustee in the sequestration.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.

THE estates of Archibald M'Kechnie, shipowner, Glasgow, were sequestrated in 1870, and in 1873 the trustee was discharged. In 1875 the bankrupt, being still undischarged, raised an action of damages for slander against a firm of distillers, in whose employment he had been as a traveller, and obtained a verdict for £400. The slander was uttered in 1873, after the discharge of the trustee. At the instance of the creditors the former trustee in the sequestration, Mr Jackson, was re-appointed, and he presented this petition under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,[1] to have it declared that the sum of £400 vested in him at the date of the verdict. The money had not yet been paid.

The bankrupt appeared, and objected.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Declares all right and interest in the sum of £400 sterling or thereby mentioned in the petition, to which the said Archibald M'Kechnie has become entitled under the verdict of a jury returned and applied as set forth in the petition, to be vested in the petitioner as trustee on the sequestrated estates of the said Archibald M'Kechnie, as at the date when the said verdict was applied, in terms of the 'Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' and decerns: Finds no expenses due to or by either party." *

---

[1] 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 103—"That if any estate, wherever situated, shall, after the date of the sequestration, and before the bankrupt has obtained his discharge, be acquired by him, or descend or revert or come to him, the same shall, ipso jure, fall under the sequestration, and the full right or interest accruing thereon to the bankrupt shall be held as transferred to and vested in the trustee, as at the date of the acquisition thereof or succession for the purposes of this Act; and the trustee shall, on coming to the knowledge of the fact, present a petition setting forth the circumstances to the Lord Ordinary. . . . ."

* "NOTE.—The petitioner claims the money as being estate acquired or coming to the bankrupt after the date of the sequestration and before his discharge. The bankrupt, on the other hand, maintains that as the money has been awarded to him as solatium for defamation, his claim therefor against the defenders of the action was so entirely personal to himself as to exclude all claim upon the fund at the instance of the creditors of the bankrupt. And he relies in support of his contention partly upon a passing observation regarding actions of damages for defamation at the instance of a bankrupt under sequestration

No. 25.

Nov. 13, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Kechnie.

The bankrupt reclaimed, and argued;—The distinctive feature of this case was that the claim arose subsequent to the sequestration. Therefore the bankrupt, in desiring to retain this money, did not seek to diminish the estate which had passed to the creditors. The decision in Thom v. Bridges and M'Queen founded on by the Lord Ordinary turned on the fact that there was injury to the real estate. Here there was made by the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) in deciding the case of Thom v. Bridges and M'Queen, March 11, 1857, 19 D. 721, but chiefly upon certain English cases in which it seems to have been held that the assignee in bankruptcy is not entitled to institute in his own name an action for recovery of damages for injury to the character of the bankrupt—See Beckham v. Drake, 26th July 1847, 2 H. L. Ca. p. 579, and Rogers v. Spence, July 20, 1846, 12 Cl. and Fin. 700. The principle, however, upon which all these cases was decided appears to be this, that as personal actions of the kind in question frequently involve matters of great delicacy, affecting the feelings, comfort, and reputation, not only of the bankrupt, but of his relatives and connections, it should be left very much to the bankrupt's own discretion whether any action should be raised for the vindication of his character. But that reason ceases to operate as soon as the bankrupt exercises that discretion by voluntarily raising the action, and still more where by insisting in the action until he obtains a verdict for damages he shews his determination to make the whole matter public. It appears to me that a bankrupt who raises such an action before obtaining his discharge does so in the knowledge, if not with the expectation, that in the event of his obtaining a verdict clearing his character, and awarding substantial damages, the pecuniary part of the award would be claimed by his creditors. I am unable to see on what intelligible principle money which has been awarded to a bankrupt by the verdict of a jury—no matter on what grounds—and for which he is in a position to charge the defenders against whom he has obtained the verdict, to make immediate payment, should not be regarded as estate acquired by or coming to him within the sense and meaning of the statute.

"It was, indeed, admitted at the bar by the counsel for the bankrupt that the money in the present case must be regarded as if it had been already actually paid to the bankrupt, and had been deposited in bank. But while making that admission he maintained that the Court is entitled and bound to inquire from what source the money has come, and to refuse to make the vesting order if, as in the present case, the money is ascertained to have been acquired as solatium for an injury so purely personal to the bankrupt as defamation. I can see no ground whatever for affirming that contention. The statute declares that the whole estate acquired by the bankrupt before his discharge shall be transferred to and vested in the trustee as at the date of acquisition. No part of the estate acquired is excepted, and acquisition by the bankrupt is declared to be acquisition for his creditors; and on that principle the case of Thom v. Bridges and M'Queen was decided. And farther, even assuming that the judgments in the English cases referred to would be followed as precedents in precisely similar cases in this country, I am of opinion, for the reasons already stated, that they are not applicable to cases in which an illiquid personal claim of damages, depending for its enforcement upon the bankrupt's voluntary exercise of a discretionary power, has been liquidated and converted into money, and recovered by the bankrupt in an action voluntarily raised by himself in the exercise of his discretion. In all such cases the money which he recovers must be regarded as estate acquired by or coming to him within the meaning of the statute. It may be his misfortune that he has not obtained his discharge, either in consequence of his own tardiness in applying for it, or from his inability to comply with the statutory requisites; but the facts that he is still an undischarged bankrupt, and that he has since his sequestration acquired the sum of £400, appear to me to make the claim of the petitioner for a transference of that sum to himself as trustee irresistible. I am therefore of opinion that the prayer of the petition should be granted. I do not think that this is a case for awarding expenses against the bankrupt."

No. 25.
Nov. 13, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Kechnie.

none. The injury was entirely personal. It depended on the feelings of the bankrupt, and the trustee would have had no title to pursue an action of damages. This was clearly decided in England by the cases referred to by the Lord Ordinary under a bankruptcy statute substantially the same as our own, and the question was one which should be decided on general principles common to both countries. Assuming the trustee to have a right to the money he must first compensate the bankrupt for the trouble and expense he had incurred in vindicating the claim.

The petitioner argued;—1. It is not necessary to inquire whether the trustee would have had a title to pursue the action of damages. The money having been recovered is clearly "estate" within the meaning of the 103d section. The effect of that section as to acquirenda is exactly the same as that of the 102d section, which deals with property belonging to the bankrupt at the date of the sequestration. The expression there is "the moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt, wherever situated, so far as attachable for debt, to the same effect as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained or intimation made at that date." It could not be denied that this was moveable estate attachable by creditors. In the same way the 29th section provided that the award of sequestration is "of the estates which then belong or shall thereafter belong to the debtor before the date of the discharge."

But, 2, this was a claim which the trustee might have insisted in. Two remedies were open to a person injured in his character—(1) He might have brought an action concluding for a palinode or retractation. Possibly that was an action of so personal a character that it could not be taken up by his trustee in bankruptcy. But (2) he might sue for damages, and that claim was competent to his trustee or his executor. That was explained in Auld v. Shairp,[1] in which all the authorities were reviewed. It is only right that it should be so, because everything that is estate is justly due to creditors until the bankrupt is discharged. It is true that the English authorities are the other way on the question of the title to sue, but that is owing to a difference in the law.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question raised in this case has never, so far as I know, been expressly decided. The respondent, an undischarged bankrupt under sequestration, brought an action of damages for defamation, after the trustee in his sequestration was discharged, and at a time when no proceedings were being taken in the sequestration. The slander was uttered subsequent to the date of the sequestration. In that action he obtained decree for £400. The money has not yet been paid. The creditors re-appointed the trustee, evidently for the purpose of making this fund available to them, and the trustee now applies for a vesting order to enable him to obtain payment of this sum for behoof of the creditors.

We have had an able argument upon two questions—1. How far the trustee acquired right by virtue of the sequestration to the bankrupt's claim for reparation; 2. Whether, at all events, the title of the trustee does not carry for behoof of the creditors this sum of money which the bankrupt has recovered. On the first question the argument for the bankrupt was that a claim for reparation for injury to character is so personal in its nature that it does not pass to the executors of the injured party, or, at all events, to his trustee in bankruptcy. I do not think it is essential to the present case to decide whether that argument is sound or not. I am not prepared to say that the trustee in a sequestration would have a right to pursue such a claim as this. I can quite well conceive, at all events, that there may be demands so personal in their character that they would not pass to the trustee. Examples may be easily suggested. But that is not the question here. The bankrupt has no such claim. His claim has been satisfied; and the only matter in dispute is simply a sum of £400.

[1] Dec. 16, 1874, ante, vol. ii. 191

No. 25.

Nov. 13, 1875. Jackson v. M'Kechnie.

It will not, in my opinion, affect the result, although we were to assume that the claim, in satisfaction of which that sum is due, was not transmissible by virtue of the Bankrupt Statute. To take an illustration from another branch of the law: In the case of Cochrane v. Bogle[1] we have an example of a right so personal that it could not be made the subject of diligence by creditors. The question arose before the recent legislation on entails, and was, whether the creditors of an heir of entail possessing under an entail which did not effectually prohibit sale could adjudge the faculty or power of sale which was competent to the heir. It was ruled that it was personal, and not transmissible; but if the lands had been sold there could have been no doubt that the creditors would have been entitled to attach the proceeds. So in the recent case of Auld v. Shairp some doubt was entertained whether the executrix had a right to take up a claim arising out of slander, and to raise an action on it after the death of her husband who had been defamed. But there could have been no doubt that if Dr Auld had raised the action, and obtained decree before his death, his widow and executrix would have been entitled to uplift the money. Or, again, suppose in this case the debtor were unable to pay, and adjudication were led of his real estate, and M'Kechnie had made up a title to it, would there be anything special in the position of that property, owing to the fact that it was acquired by enforcement of a personal claim of damages, which would protect it from the diligence of creditors? I think not. In short, I think the personal element vanishes when the claim is satisfied, and we are only dealing with a sum of money which necessarily passes to the trustee under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act.

There is another point, on which it is not necessary to enter. I can imagine circumstances under which the creditors in a sequestration might be held to have abandoned such a claim to the bankrupt, so that they would afterwards be excluded, if anything was recovered, on the ground of implied assignation. But here there are no materials for such a plea.

I think, however, that M'Kechnie is entitled to be kept indemnis, and that he may be entitled to some compensation for his time and trouble. I propose, therefore, that we should sustain the title of the trustee, and appoint M'Kechnie to lodge in process a note of his demands.

LORD ORMIDALE and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Before answer, allow the reclaimer to lodge in process a statement of any claim he may have for time, trouble, and expense in connection with the action of damages for slander at his instance against Messrs W. and J. Mutter."

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—JOHN WRIGHT & JOHNSTON, L.A.—Agents.

[1] March 2, 1849, 11 D. 908, 21 Scot. Jur. 319, H. L. March 25, 1850, 7 Bell, 65, 22 Scot. Jur. 403.

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875.
Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

ROSS, SKOLFIELD, AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Guthrie Smith—J. J. Reid.
THE STATE LINE STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED), Defenders.—Asher—Jameson.

Agent and Principal—Joint Stock Company—Powers of Manager.—The principal agent or manager of a joint stock shipping company, to whom was committed the whole management of the company's trading business at home and abroad, and who guaranteed the freight earned by the company's ships, but whose appointment did not confer an express power of drawing or accepting bills on behalf of the company, appointed a sub-agent at a port to attend to the company's business there, and, among other duties, to collect the freights payable at the port. It was the practice of the manager to draw bills upon the sub-agent in anticipation of freight to be earned by the company's ships. The bills, after being accepted by the sub-agent, were discounted by the manager, and retired at maturity by the sub-agent out of freight collected in the interval. The amount was debited to the company in accounts rendered by the sub-agent to the manager. The bills were not entered in the books kept for the company by the manager in such a way as to shew the true nature of the transaction, but this could have been discovered from the accounts rendered by the sub-agent to the manager, which were placed before the auditor of the company.

The manager ceased to hold that office while two of the bills were current, and shortly after became bankrupt. The company having refused to allow the sub-agent credit for the amount of the bills, he sued the company for the amount. Held that the manager had not authority from the company to receive and discharge payments in anticipation of freight; that the pursuer had failed to prove by the books or otherwise that the directors were aware or ought to have been aware of the course of dealing; or that in fact the proceeds of the bills had been received by the company; and that the pursuer had therefore failed to establish liability against the company.

Question, how far the books kept for the company by the manager were evidence against the company in a question with the sub-agent.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young.

THE State Line Steamship Company (Limited) was established for the conveyance of goods and passengers between the United Kingdom and North America. They had two lines of steamers, one of which plied between the Clyde and New York, and the other between the Mersey and New Orleans. The registered office of the company was in Glasgow.

Under the powers conferred by the articles of association* of the company, the directors, in October 1872, appointed Lewis T. Merrow and Company, merchants, Glasgow, to be the principal agents or managers of the company's trading business. The terms of the appointment, which was in writing, were as follows:—"First, Messrs Lewis T. Merrow and

* The portions of the articles of association of the State Line Company bearing upon the authority of the managers were as follows:—

"Art. 63. The business of the company shall be managed by the directors. . . . .

"Art. 64. The directors shall have power to appoint such office-bearers, including a manager or managers, as may appear to them necessary for the proper conducting and management of the business of the company. . . . . They shall also have full authority to grant a procuration to any properly qualified person, empowering him, in name and on behalf of the company, to draw, accept, and endorse bills, and to draw and endorse cheques in connection with the business of the company.

"Art. 66. The directors may, from time to time, borrow for the purposes of the company such sum or sums of money as they may think proper, so that no more than £100,000 be owing at any one time over and above such sum and sums of money as may have been borrowed with the sanction of a general meeting."

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875. Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

Company are hereby appointed the principal agents or managers of the company's trading business and affairs, both at home and abroad, the whole of which shall be under their management, they being bound, however, to carry out any instructions which the directors of the company may at any time see fit to give in the conduct of the business.

"Second, The managers shall be bound to devote their whole time and attention to the company's business, and on no account shall they be entitled or allowed to engage in other business, or to undertake other employment of any kind whatever which can interfere with or be detrimental to the company.

"Third, The managers shall be entitled to a commission at the rate of ten per cent on the gross freights, passage-money, or other earnings of the ships of the company, the managers paying all expenses incident to the management of the business of the company or its affairs, including the maintenance of the different agencies both at home and abroad, and travelling and advertising expenses, and guaranteeing the due payment of all freights, passage-money, or other earnings.

"Fourth, The managers shall provide themselves with suitable offices in Glasgow, and it shall be imperative on them to keep a proper set of books, shewing the whole of their transactions, and all sums received or disbursed by them; which books shall be open at all times to the inspection of the directors of the company, or any party employed by them to examine the same, and shall form the property of the company. The directors shall be entitled to make such provision for the control of the finances of the company as they see fit."

Merrow and Company appointed Ross, Skolfield, and Company, shipping agents, Liverpool, to act as sub-agents for the State Line Company at Liverpool, but the State Line Company were not parties to the appointment. It was the duty of Ross, Skolfield, and Company to take charge of the company's steamers on their arrival, to attend to their loading and unloading, to collect freight payable at Liverpool and remit it to Glasgow, to pay for ships' stores and other disbursements, and generally to attend to the business of the company at Liverpool. For each voyage they rendered an account to Merrow and Company.

Merrow and Company were shareholders to a large extent in the State Line Company. In order to avoid calls upon the shares it was their object to carry on the business of the company as much as possible without applying to the directors for money. With this view, from the month of April 1873, they were in the habit of drawing bills upon Ross, Skolfield, and Company, in anticipation of the homeward freight of the company's steamers. The bills were accepted by Ross, Skolfield, and Company, and thereafter discounted by Merrow and Company, and as each bill fell due it was retired by Ross, Skolfield, and Company out of State Line freights collected by them in the interval, and the amount debited to the State Line Company in the accounts rendered by Ross, Skolfield, and Company to Merrow and Company. Prior to 1st October 1874 there were twenty-one such bills, amounting to nearly £50,000, of which £13,800 was drawn against the freight of the "Alabama," one of the company's steamships.

On 30th September 1874 Merrow and Company intimated to Ross, Skolfield, and Company the arrival at New Orleans of the "Alabama," and advised them of their intention of drawing upon them for £4000 against freight by the "Alabama." Accordingly, on 1st October 1874, Merrow and Company sent two bills for £2000 each to the pursuers for acceptance. They were accepted on the following day, and returned to Merrow and Company. The bills were as follows:—"Glasgow, 1st October 1874. £2000, 0s. 0d. stg. Sixty days after sight pay to our

No. 26. order the sum of two thousand pounds sterling on a/c of freight per s.s. 'State of Alabama.' LEWIS T. MERROW & Co. To Messrs Ross, Skolfield, and Co., 9 Chapel Street, Liverpool."

Nov. 17, 1875. Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

On 19th October 1874 Merrow and Co. ceased to be managers for the State Line Company, and, accordingly, Ross, Skolfield, and Company's appointment as sub-agents fell also. On 5th December 1874 the estates of Merrow and Company were sequestrated.

The two bills above mentioned were retired by Ross, Skolfield, and Company at maturity on 4th December 1874. The homeward freight of the "Alabama" was uplifted by Ross, Skolfield, and Company under a special agreement with the State Line Company, but the latter repudiated liability for the bills, and refused to allow Ross, Skolfield, and Company credit for their amount.

Under these circumstances Ross, Skolfield, and Company raised an action against the State Line Company concluding for payment "of the sum of £3731, 19s. 6d. sterling, being the amount contained in two bills, each for the sum of £2000 sterling, dated the 1st day of October 1874, and drawn by Lewis T. Merrow and Company, the defenders' managers in Glasgow, upon the pursuers, and accepted by them, under deduction of the sum of £268, 0s. 6d. sterling standing at the credit of the defenders in the pursuers' books, with interest on the said sum of £3731, 19s. 6d. at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the 4th day of December 1874 until payment."

The pursuers averred in regard to the bills in question;—(Cond 5) "These bills passed through the books of the defenders, were discounted by them, and the proceeds were applied to the purposes of the company."

They pleaded;—1. The pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for, in respect that the bills sued on were drawn by the defenders' managers in the execution of their business, and with their authority, and that the said bills were and are the bills of the defenders. 2. The pursuers are entitled to decree, in respect that (1) the said bills were drawn in pursuance of the course of dealing above condescended on; (2) that the actings of their managers in drawing bills in their own name were homologated and adopted by the defenders; and (3) that the proceeds of the discount of the said bills were applied to the purposes of the defenders.

The defenders denied liability, in respect, as they alleged, that the bills sued on were not granted with their authority, or on their behalf, and that the proceeds were not received by them.

The Lord Ordinary having allowed a proof, a minute was put in for the parties (No. 18 of process);—"The pursuers moved for leave to amend the summons by striking out the words following, namely:—'being the amount contained in two bills each for the sum of £2000 sterling, dated the 1st day of October 1874, and drawn by Lewis T. Merrow and Company, the defenders' managers in Glasgow, upon the pursuers, and accepted by them, under deduction of the sum of £268, 0s. 6d. sterling standing at the credit of the defenders in the pursuers' books.'

"And the parties consent that the Lord Ordinary and the Court shall have power to determine in this action the question whether or not the bills which are mentioned in article 5 of condescendence were drawn by Lewis T. Merrow and Company with the authority or on behalf of the defenders; and according to the determination of this matter the pursuers shall have credit for the said bills in accounting with the defenders."

The result of the proof was shortly as follows:—Neither the articles of association of the State Line Company nor the written appointment of Merrow and Company as managers conferred any express authority upon the managers to draw or accept bills for the company, or to discharge prepayments of freight for the company.

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875. Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

It appeared that the directors of the company were not in fact aware that Merrow and Company were in the habit of drawing bills in anticipation of freight. The proceeds of such bills were entered as cash receipts in the books kept by Merrow and Company for the State Line Company. The true nature of the transactions was not apparent upon the face of the books, though this might have been discovered from the statement of each voyage rendered by Ross, Skolfield, and Company to Merrow and Company. Only one audit of the company's books had taken place, viz., in December 1873 for the year ending 2d October 1873. Upon that occasion the voyage statements were placed before the auditor. The auditor's evidence on this point was as follows:—"I had to ask for the voyage statements to audit the account-current which I got from the secretary, and Merrow and Company supplied me with voyage accounts for that purpose. These enabled me to audit the account-current and the balance-sheet. (Q.) Did you require to have recourse to any of the books kept by Merrow and Company? (A.) Not necessarily, had the accounts been fully instructed by vouchers. I only required them as corroborative evidence. I had no occasion to examine the accounts between Merrow and Company and their sub-agents."

It was impossible to ascertain from the documents put in evidence whether or not the State Line Company were lucrati by the proceeds of the two bills in question. The proceeds were lodged in bank in the name of Merrow and Company, who about that time made disbursements for the State Line Company. On the other hand, Merrow and Company were largely indebted to the State Line Company for unpaid calls upon the shares held by them.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties, and considered the record, proof, and productions, along with the joint minute, No. 18 of process, sustains the amendments now made by the pursuers in terms of the minute, No. 18 of process: Finds that the two bills mentioned in the 5th article of the condescendence were not drawn by Messrs Lewis T. Merrow and Company with the authority or on behalf of the defenders: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—I was desirous that the parties in this case should come to some arrangement, if possible, because my judgment is very much against my inclination. I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that it has not been proved that these bills were drawn with the authority and on behalf of the defenders. In the management of a company the authority to draw or accept bills is not an authority to be implied, it is not usually possessed, and it requires to be conferred. It does not arise from the office. Now, Mr Merrow himself, who gave very candid evidence, acknowledged that there was no authority conferred upon him. It is said that in pursuit of an effort, in which they ultimately failed, to carry on the business of the State Line Company without applying to the directors for money, Merrow and Company drew and accepted bills; but there was no authority to do so. It is further said that there was no secret about it; that is to say, that the bills were entered in the books which were kept for the company's business by himself and his partner as managers, but Mr Merrow could not say that they were aware of the fact, and he certainly had never mentioned it to them. Two of the directors were called, one of whom was actually examined, and the other dismissed without examination, being held as concurring, and they were corroborated by the secretary, that they were totally ignorant of such a thing. I cannot therefore hold that there was authority;

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875. Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

The pursuers reclaimed.

Argued for them*;—(1) The powers of Merrow and Company were not to be measured by those of an ordinary agent. They were by the terms of their appointment responsible for the payment of the freight. They were not exceeding their powers in drawing to account of freight, which was only a mode of getting in the money which under their appointment they were bound to do, and the pursuers were, in paying to them, only doing what they were bound to do, viz., remitting the freight. Had they done so in cash that would have discharged them, and so should this mode of remittance. (2) Even if Merrow and Company were acting in excess of their powers the defenders must be held to have homologated the course of dealing followed by their managers. It did not matter whether the directors were personally cognisant of the matter or not. The books kept by the managers were the books of the company. The books and vouchers, and, in particular, the statements of voyages sent by the pursuers, were patent to the directors and their auditor, and a proper investigation would have shewn that Merrow and Company were drawing bills in anticipation of freight. (3) The defenders had in and even had there been authority to draw bills or to accept bills, in the one case for money due to the company, and in the other for money due by the company, I should not by any means have held that that imported authority to anticipate freights. I cannot take the view that was urged by Mr Smith that the managers were quite at liberty to take as much prepayment of freights to be earned hereafter as any agent in Liverpool or elsewhere was willing to give him. It is a serious matter to pledge the earnings of the company's ships for the future, and put the money into the hands of the managers. That is a trust which it is for every company to determine for itself whether it will repose in the managers or not. It does not affect the question that the managers did so, and that the directors, by a scrutiny of their books, might have ascertained it,—I mean the books kept by them as managers of the company,—because the information recorded in those books is the managers' information, and not necessarily the knowledge of their employers, unless it was their duty, which I cannot hold it was, to make a searching examination of the books in order to see whether there was not evidence of some irregularity, which they had had no reason whatever to suspect. Therefore, though for all purposes I regard these as the books of the company itself, as much so as the books of any company kept by the manager and under his superintendence, I do not hold that the directors are to be held as sanctioning this practice, which the managers had addicted themselves to, of drawing bills, not only for money due, but also in anticipation of money to be earned. Therefore, though firmly believing that the bills were accepted, and the money paid, in the honest belief entertained by the pursuers that the money was for the accommodation of the State Line Company, the managers having power to take advances on account of the company,—while thoroughly believing that that was their state of mind, and that their case is a hard one, I cannot, upon the evidence, arrive at the conclusion that the practice was sanctioned by the company so as to bind them; and my judgment will be to that effect, and assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of the present action, with expenses."

---

* The parties differed as to the purport of the second clause of the joint minute, No. 18 (supra, p. 136). The defenders maintained that its effect was to narrow the question to the authority of Merrow and Company to draw the bills in question on behalf of the defenders, and stated that if this had not been their understanding they would have led further evidence upon other branches of the case. The pursuers maintained that they were entitled to prevail if they could establish the indebtedness of the defenders upon any of the grounds pleaded on record. The case was debated upon the more general footing, the defenders reserving their right to found upon the joint minute in case of an appeal to the House of Lords.

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875. Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

effect got the benefit of the proceeds of the bills in question in the shape of stores. The evidence on this point was not perhaps so clear as might be desired, but unless the defenders could shew that Merrow and Company were in possession of other funds belonging to the company when the bills were discounted it followed that the disbursements by Merrow and Company for the defenders must have been made from the bills in question.[1]

For the defenders the undernoted authorities were cited.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As originally framed this action was laid upon two bills of exchange. When the case came to be tried by the Lord Ordinary the reference to the bills in the summons was struck out, and it became an action simply for payment of money. The question tried before the Lord Ordinary was whether or not the bills mentioned in article 5 of the condescendence were drawn by Merrow and Company with the authority or on behalf of the defenders; and from the language of the joint minute I should not have gathered that any other question was in the contemplation of the parties who signed it. But the real question is, whether Merrow and Company could anticipate an expected asset of the State Line Company in the shape of freight and give a receipt for it. If they could do so, it is of no moment how payment was made, whether by a draft on the agents, accepted by them, or by a remit of money.

The affirmative of this question can only be maintained on the grounds, first, that it was within the province of Merrow and Company to anticipate freight from the nature of their employment; secondly, if that be not sufficient, that it was warranted by the course of dealing sanctioned by the State Line Company; and thirdly, if neither of these grounds avail, that it was the fact that the money was applied to company purposes, and therefore that the company received substantially payment of the freight.

On the first of these questions, viz., whether Merrow and Company had right to anticipate freight, I am very clearly of opinion that in the case of an ordinary agent no such powers can exist. This was nothing but borrowing money on the security of expected freight from the person into whose hands the freight would come; and that is a power which an ordinary agent does not possess. But it was maintained for the pursuers, and to some extent not without soundness, that Merrow and Company were not ordinary agents, and that the manager of a joint stock company, who has the whole charge of a business, who is not only entitled to manage, to the exclusion of any other member of the company, but is also liable for the fund to be realised in the course of his administration, does not stand in the same position as an ordinary agent. In this case Merrow and Company were appointed managers in the widest possible terms. They were to transact the whole trading business of the company. The shareholders, who were not necessarily men of business at all, were not to manage the business,—not even the directors, unless they chose to interfere. The managers were to [1] Authorities as to Powers of Managers.—Turnbull v. M'Kie, Feb. 26, 1822, 1 S. 353 (N. Ed. 331); In re Land Credit Company of Ireland, ex parte Overend, Gurney, and Co., April 30, 1869, L. R. 4 Chan. App. 460; In re London and Mediterranean Bank, ex parte Birmingham Banking Company, July 2, 1868, L. R. 3 Chan. App. 651.

[2] North British Bank v. Ayrshire Iron Co., June 29, 1853, 15 D. 782, 25 Scot. Jur. 466; Smith's Mercantile Law, p. 127.

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875. Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

appoint agents, and to guarantee the freight. Merrow and Company were thus responsible for the whole profits, and I am not inclined to say that they were not entitled to regulate to a very large extent the manner in which the funds were to come into their hands. I can conceive cases in which it would be very beneficial to the company that agents so appointed should be entitled in some degree to regulate payment of freight before it became due. But there is one element in this appointment which must not be overlooked, and which is patent on the face of it, that the position of Merrow and Company was temporary. If their powers of management ceased before the freight became an asset of the company at all the expected security necessarily fell, and reduced the whole transaction to a money advance on the acceptance of the Liverpool agents without any security. On the first matter, then, I hold their bills to be nothing more than receipts for prepayment of freight, and I think it was not within the powers of Merrow and Company to bind the expected freight.

The next question is, whether anything in the course of dealing sanctioned by the company had the effect of enlarging the powers of Merrow and Company in this particular; and this raises the question, how far the books kept by Merrow and Company are evidence for the pursuers. If the books did disclose such a course of dealing, I should be of opinion that, although Merrow and Company did not comply with the conditions of their appointment in keeping proper books—as these were the only books kept, and that in the knowledge of the company itself, and seeing that they were audited by the company's auditor, who was certainly bound not merely to go over the calculations and figures, but to report the whole state of the company's affairs and examine the vouchers, and seeing also that the auditor had access to these books, and did examine the accounts relating to the steamers,—I should be of opinion that the books were perfectly good evidence as they stand to bring home knowledge to the directors of what they contain, provided they did contain evidence of a course of dealing of this kind, especially as the question arises not with Merrow and Company, but with a third party. I think that third party is entitled to hold the books of Merrow and Company to be the books of the company to every effect. If there is any defect in these books that was the fault of the company. I went along entirely with the argument for the pursuers, that whatever might be said in a question between Merrow and Company and the State Line Company it is out of the question for the directors of the State Line Company to say that Merrow and Company did not keep the accounts in the way in which they instructed them.

But then comes the question, what did the books indicate? They contain no evidence of the usage which is alleged. I should say that Merrow and Company did not consider that they were dealing on behalf of the company in the drafts which they made, but apparently the reverse, for the entries of the proceeds of the bills are reported not as the result of the prepayment of freight, but of cash payments by Merrow and Company. It is the fact that in some twenty instances in the course of the company's business such bills were drawn, but they were not so entered as to disclose their true character. You can perhaps find it out if you examine very minutely, but in order to establish implied authority for a course of dealing it is necessary to have something much more distinct.

The third question is one on which I have more difficulty, viz., whether this money was truly applied to the purposes of the company. I should not consider it absolutely conclusive that Merrow and Company were indebted to the

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875. Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

State Line Company at the time when the bills were discounted, for if it was clearly apparent that, although in debt to the company, Merrow and Company had no other funds to apply to a purpose for which the State Line Company were responsible, I am not prepared to say that their being indebted to the company would be conclusive against the pursuers' contention. My difficulty is rather to find any materials on which that result can be arrived at. We do not know whether the debt due to the company arose on shares alone, which were held by Merrow and Company, or on the company's business. The whole matter is left in perfect darkness. At the date when these bills were discounted there were payments made by Merrow and Company on behalf of the company, but I am not able to say that these payments were made from funds provided by the bills. The payments were made out of a general account, and the money was paid into that general account, and that is all that can be said.

On these grounds I concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

LORD ORMIDALE.—This is just a case of borrowing money by Merrow and Company, by drawing and accepting bills. The question, then, comes to be whether Merrow and Company, the managers of the State Line Company, had the power of so borrowing money. I doubt whether even the directors themselves had, under the articles of association, power to borrow money in such a way. I rather think they had not. Every presumption is against the idea that the board conferred such a power on their managers, and certainly I cannot find anywhere in the proof evidence of a direct authority. When we look at the proof we find two of the directors concur in saying that Merrow and Company could get, and did get, money from the board whenever they needed it. It has been, however, argued that there was an implied authority. Of that also I am unable to find any evidence. The only witness who speaks to this is Mr Duncan, the auditor, who examined and checked the books of the company, but it does not appear to me to have been part of his duty, beyond the matter of figures, to say whether the business of the company was being properly conducted or not.

The point—indeed the only one—upon which I felt some difficulty was as to whether the State Line Company were to be taken as bound by the books of Merrow and Company. As between Merrow and Company and the State Line Company these books are not evidence at all, and the question is how far they are so in a question with Merrow and Company's sub-agents. I do not think they are. I am not able to distinguish Merrow and Company from the pursuers, who are just the hands of Merrow and Company in carrying out their arrangements.

As regards the proceeds of the bills, I am unable to find that the company were lucrati; and I agree with your Lordship in the chair in holding that there is a total absence of evidence that the pursuers' moneys were applied for the benefit of the State Line Company.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have come to the same result, and to a large extent upon the same grounds. The action as originally laid was in the form of an action by the acceptor of two bills to recover the amount contained in them against the defenders' limited company, who, it is said, were represented by the drawer. An amendment of the summons has, however, now been made, by which all reference to bills is excluded from the conclusions, and the action now reads simply as a petitory action for a sum of money. If, upon any ground disclosed on record, the pursuers can establish their claim against the defenders for the sum sued for, or any part of it, it will be a good action. A difficulty has, however, been created by the second part of the joint minute, which appears to be an agreement by the parties to narrow the question to the authority of L. T. Merrow and Company, as managers, to draw the bills on behalf of the defenders. It was stated, however, for the pursuers that this was not their intention. I am not unwilling to consider the question between the parties in its general aspect, and on all the grounds embraced on record, although I cannot quite get over the difficulty caused by a party asking a judgment on one issue as the issue in the cause, and then discarding that issue and raising another.

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875.

Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

The question is substantially whether the pursuers, who were sub-agents under Merrow and Company for the State Line Steamship Company, are entitled to recover from the limited company advances which they made to the principal agents. Laying aside the mere form of the action and the form in which the bills were drawn, the real question comes to this—Had Merrow and Company power to borrow for the defenders, and power to bind the defenders to repay the loan? I scarcely think it makes any real distinction that Merrow and Company borrowed from the sub-agent and not from a stranger or third party. No doubt the borrowing was made in anticipation of freight to be earned. The freight was looked to as the means of repaying the loan, but the transaction was really £4000 lent by the pursuers, the sub-agents, to Merrow and Company as principal agents. The question is the same as if the pursuers had handed the sum in cash to Merrow and Company, and said that they would keep it out of freight, which, as sub-agents, they expected to collect and receive. But, then, this expectation was not realised, for, before the freights became due, Merrow and Company were displaced from the agency, and consequently the pursuers, as sub-agents, were also displaced, and the defenders uplifted their own freight, and hence the present action. Had, then, Merrow and Company power to contract a simple loan, binding the defenders for repayment, or had they power to impledge freight not yet due? If they had power to do either, the pursuers must prevail.

Merrow and Company were the principal agents or managers of the defenders' trading business. I am disposed to think that the appointment was within the articles of association, which gives power to the directors to appoint a manager or managers. Undoubtedly their appointment involved very large powers. But did it include a power to borrow, or a power to impledge unearned freights, so as to bind the State Line Company? The general rule is that a manager has not power to borrow. Such power, when it is meant to be given, must always be specially or expressly conferred, and will very rarely be implied or presumed, and it is not included in the idea of management of such a business as the State Steamship Company. Nor is a power to pledge his principal's property easily presumed in the appointment of a manager. Perhaps, it may be said, a fortiori, that if the manager has not power to borrow on the personal security of the limited company, still less has he power to impledge the freight, the ships, or other property of his employers. The case is quite different from an advance upon goods consigned for sale. In that case the consignor is proprietor of the goods, and can do what he likes with them. Of course, he may pledge his own goods to the consignee who gives him an advance thereon. If,

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875.
Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

indeed, a manager advances money for behoof of his principal, and in course of his management he becomes their creditor on account, he will have a right of action against that principal, whether the money advanced came out of his own pocket or was borrowed. The difficulty only arises when the money borrowed by the agent or manager is not applied for the principal's use, so that the principal is not lucratus.

I have come to be clearly of opinion that Merrow and Company had no power to borrow so as to bind the State Steamship Company, unless the money borrowed was applied for the company's use in the ordinary course of management. If, on their general account, no balance was due to Merrow and Company, and this turned out to be the case, then it is clear Merrow and Company could not sue their principals for the sums in question, no part of which sums had been applied for the principal's behoof.

Now, Merrow and Company, not having any right of action for this sum, have the sub-agents any right of action? If I am right in holding that the terms of their appointment did not confer upon Merrow and Company power to borrow, have their written powers been increased by the course of dealing between them and the defenders? It is sought to establish this, in the first place, by general evidence, and secondly, by Merrow and Company's books. In order to give Merrow and Company larger powers than those contained in their written appointment the claim to larger powers must be brought home to the knowledge of the defenders. An agent cannot enlarge his powers merely by exceeding them, for however long a time. Homologation is the foundation of this part of the pursuers' case, knowledge is essential to homologation, and this knowledge and this homologation must be very clearly proved, in order to override and extend the terms of a written appointment. I think that the pursuers have failed to shew that the State Line Company or their directors knew that Merrow and Company were borrowing money for them.

As to Merrow and Company's books, even if these had shewn far more clearly than they do that they were getting advances from the sub-agents, I should hesitate to affirm that the pursuers are entitled to found upon these books in a question with the defenders. No doubt the defenders had a right to look at these books, but that was a check in favour of the defenders. I do not think that if a principal has a right to look at his agent's books, but does not avail himself of that right, the agent can say, "You ought to have looked at my books, and therefore you must be held as authorising all that you might have discovered there." Although, for certain purposes, the agent's books are the books of the principal, the agent can never found upon them against the principal. Were the pursuers, then, in the position of third parties, or were they mere sub-agents of Merrow and Company? I think they were sub-agents, and not entitled to the privilege of third parties to found on Merrow and Company's books in their favour. Merrow and Company could never give the sub-agents larger powers than they had themselves. Nor, in a question between the pursuers and the defenders does it matter what view Merrow and Company took of their powers. It is not a question of good faith; it is a question what the powers of Merrow and Company actually were. Nor will it do for the pursuers to say that they took it for granted that Merrow and Company had such powers.

Upon the question of power to borrow I therefore come to the result that Merrow and Company and their sub-agents, the pursuers, could only claim what was actually applied for behoof of the defenders; and if Merrow and Company

No. 26.

Nov. 17, 1875.
Ross, Skolfield, & Co. v. State Line Steamship Co.

applied the advance to their own purposes, the pursuers have no claim against the defenders.

But it is said that the sums were applied for behoof of the State Line Company. If it were clearly made out that the advance had gone into the pockets of the State Line Company, it would be difficult to resist the pursuers' claim. But, in the first place, Merrow and Company's books do not establish this. These books have a column for the steamers, and another headed "private." While one of the bills is entered in the steamer column in pencil the proceeds are in both cases put into the private column. Viewing these books as the books of the State Line Company, it is only the steamer column which represents their books. The private column is, in no possible sense, the books of the State Line Company, but are the books of Merrow and Company as individuals; and, as such, these books shew that Merrow and Company, as individuals, received the whole proceeds of the bills. If the money has gone into the pocket of Merrow and Company, the pursuers must shew that it came out of the pocket of Merrow and Company; and the only way to shew that is to shew that Merrow and Company made advances to the State Line Company. But, instead of that, Merrow and Company were greatly indebted to the State Line Company. I do not know that we can distinguish between a debt on business transactions and a debt arising from unpaid calls. If the State Line Company had been asked to repay advances made by Merrow and Company, they would have been entitled to say that a larger sum was due to them by Merrow and Company in the form of unpaid calls. But really we are left very much in the dark. It is not proved that Merrow and Company had no funds of the defenders in their hands when they drew the bills. If they had such funds, they were bound to have applied them in the first instance.

I do not think, however, that the books of the agent can be read in favour of the sub-agent in a question with the principal.

On the short ground that this is an action against the State Line Company for a loan obtained by their agent, and that the agent had no power to borrow, and that it has not been shewn that the sum borrowed was applied for the benefit of the principal, the opposite appearing to be the case, I am of opinion that the defenders should be assoilzied.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the sums sued for do not constitute any debt or obligation against the defenders: Quoad ultra adhere to the interlocutor complained of, and find the reclaimers liable in additional expenses," &c.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 27.

Nov. 20, 1875.
Gibson v. Adams, &c.

ANDREW GIBSON, Suspender.—Balfour—M'Kechnie.
ANDREW ADAMS AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Asher.

Proof—Writ or Oath—Suspension—Removing—Verbal Lease.—The proprietor of a house and garden in a town obtained a Sheriff Court decree ordaining the tenant to remove at the Whitsunday removing term 1875, being the expiry of seven months for which he alleged the premises had been let.

In a suspension brought by the tenant he alleged—1. a verbal agreement for a lease of five years followed by possession and rei interventus; and 2. an interim agreement for a yearly tenancy. Held that the suspender could only

No. 27.
Nov. 20, 1875.
Gibson v. Adams, &c.
1ST DIVISION.
Lord Young.
B.

prove the averment as to a five years' lease by writ or oath, but that the averment as to a yearly tenancy could be proved prout de jure, and the landlord, in respect of his averments as to a seven months' tenancy, appointed to lead in the proof.

THIS was a suspension of a decree of removing, obtained in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire by Andrew Adams and his wife, as proprietors of a cottage and garden at Ruthrieston, against Andrew Gibson, the occupant thereof. The Sheriff Court summons, which bore date 23d March 1875, concluded that the defender be decerned to remove from "the dwelling-house of Woodbine Cottage, steading, offices, garden ground, and other premises . . . . occupied by him as tenant thereof under the pursuers, and that at the 4th day of June next 1875" (the Whitsunday removing term in Aberdeen), "at which date defenders' right to occupy said subjects expires." The proprietors averred that they were heritable proprietors of Woodbine Cottage and garden, having purchased the same from a Mr Duthie in the beginning of March 1875, with the intention of occupying them on 4th June of that year. They stated that Mr Duthie had told them that the subjects were let to the defender from the end of October 1874 till 4th June 1875, and that, upon the sale being completed, Mr Duthie had informed the defender that he must leave at that date.

The defender stated that he was tenant of the subjects under a verbal lease for five years from 4th December 1874, which lease had been followed by possession, and rei interventus, in so far as he had improved and planted the garden, at considerable expense to himself, with the approval of Mr Duthie, the lessor.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) To entitle the defender to retain possession of the subjects after the 4th June next, under his alleged lease of five years, he is bound to constitute his lease by written evidence. (3) The defender's averments relative to his expenditure in connection with the garden, made with the view of founding a plea of rei interventus, are irrelevant in the present action; and, in any view, the plea of rei interventus is untenable, as the defender's operations in the garden were carried out after he had received notice to quit. (4) The defender is not entitled to a proof of alleged rei interventus having reference to a verbal lease for more than one year. (5) In any view the defender, supposing rei interventus had taken place, could prove the alleged verbal lease only by the oath of the granter.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The said lease is, in the circumstances, at least effectual for one year from said term of entry.

On 13th May 1875 the Sheriff-substitute (Comrie Thomson) granted decree of removing as concluded for; and on 27th May the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor.

Gibson, the defender, then, on 2d June, lodged this note of suspension of the decree of removing. The note was passed on caution. In the statement of facts annexed to the note he averred, as he had formerly done in the Sheriff Court, that he had a verbal lease for five years from Duthie, but added (Stat. 2), "In the meantime, and until the said lease for five years was formally completed, the complainer understood and believed, and in point of fact it was the case, that the said subjects were let to him, and he was to occupy and possess the same for at least the period of one year from and after the said 4th of December 1874." The respondents in their answers repeated the statement that Gibson was allowed to occupy the subjects from the end of October 1874 until 4th June 1875. They also explained that the averment of a lease for one year was now made for the first time. The suspender further averred that he had ex-

No. 27.
Nov. 20, 1875.
Gibson v. Adams &c.

pended money in sowing and preparing the garden in the spring of 1875 to the knowledge of Duthie and the respondents, and if he were removed as at 4th June he would not reap the crop he had sown

On 15th October the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties, allows them a proof of their respective averments so far as not admitted, the respondents to lead in the proof."

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On competency of new statement as to one year's lease. It was not competent for a defender in an action of removing, which requires the greatest despatch, to cause delay by stating new and material averments and pleas in a suspension in this Court. The object of allowing statements of fact and pleas in law in a suspension of a removing was to promote despatch, and not to afford ground for additional delay. (2) The new averment being incompetent, all that remained to be considered was the original avernment of a verbal lease for five years, followed by rei interventus. It was settled law that a verbal lease for five years could only be proved by writ or oath of the lessor; and only after the lease was so set up could there be a proof prout de jure of rei interventus.[1] An avermènt of a verbal lease for any period over a year could not be allowed to go to proof as if it contained an averment of a verbal lease for one year only.[2] The proof here must therefore be restricted to one by writ or oath.

Argued for the suspender;—The defender in an action of removing could only bring the decree under review by means of a suspension,[3] and a record had to be made up in such suspensions.[4] The object of this procedure was that the case might be clearly stated and fully put before the Court. There could, therefore, be no doubt that the additional statement was competent.

The pursuers of the removing themselves alleged in their summons that the defender was a tenant, and that for a period over a half year, which certainly raised a presumption that the defender had some title. The very nature of the subjects, comprising as they did a large garden, precluded the idea of a six months' tenancy, and that during the winter months. If the pursuers could turn out the defender at Whitsunday, they could have done so at any time. Once a person was in possession of such subjects as these on a just title he was entitled to retain possession till the natural termination. Parties to a tenancy such as this could neither of them act capriciously.[5]

All verbal leases were good for one year at least.[6]

At advising—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a suspension of a decree of removing pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of Aberdeenshire, and confirmed by the Sheriff-principal. It bears, as we gather from the note of suspension, to decern and ordain the complainer to flit and remove himself, in the ordinary terms, from certain subjects occupied by him "as tenant thereof under the pursuers, and that at the 4th day of June next, 1875, at which date the defender's right to occupy said subjects expires." We are informed that the 4th of June is the Whitsunday term in [1] Walker v. Flint, Feb. 20, 1863, 1 Macph. 417, 35 Scot. Jur. 253.

[2] Fowlie v. M'Lean, Jan. 18, 1868, 6 Macph. 254, 40 Scot. Jur. 141; Gowans v. Carstairs, July 18, 1862, 24 D. 1382, 34 Scot. Jur. 700.

[3] 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 44.

[4] 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 86, sec. 4.

[5] Buchanan v. Baird, Dec. 15, 1773, M. 8478.

[6] A v. B, June 26, 1791, M. 15,181; Lady Craiglockhart v. Burton, Feb. 10, 1711, 4 Br. Sup. 830; Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, vol. i. 351.

Aberdeen, and the respondents, who are the owners of the subjects, and pursuers of the removing, say that the terms of the complainer's occupation were that he was to occupy the subjects in question from the end of October 1874 until 4th June 1875, when he was bound to remove. This is a very peculiar period of occupancy—it is not yearly nor even half yearly. It is a half year's term plus a broken period of another term. The allegation, however, is that he was tenant of the subjects for that period. The complainer, on the other hand, contends that when he entered on the occupation of these subjects in the end of 1874 the respondents' author promised to give him a five years' lease from and after December 4, 1874, but that in the meantime, until that lease was made out, he was to be tenant, and to occupy the subjects for at least a year from and after 4th December 1874. We have thus two distinct averments—(1) that there was an agreement to give him a five years' lease, and (2) that until that was done he was to hold on a yearly tenancy.

The Lord Ordinary has not distinguished between these averments, but has allowed the parties a proof of their averments generally. We cannot allow that, because it is in violation of the settled rule of law that verbal leases for more than one year can only be proved by writ or oath of the party. So we must alter the interlocutor to the effect of restricting the mode of proof of the five years' lease to writ or oath.

As regards the proof of a lease for one year, I am rather inclined to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's arrangement that the respondents are to lead. A very peculiar period of tenancy is averred by them, which involves some sort of special agreement between the parties; and where persons aver such peculiar agreements they are not to be taken for granted, but fall to be proved. I think, therefore, that the respondents should lead in the proof.

LORD DEAS.—This interlocutor ex facie allows a proof by parole of the averment of a verbal lease for five years. I can have no doubt that we must recall that interlocutor. Your Lordships are all well aware that, by a series of decisions, a verbal agreement for a lease of more than one year's duration can only be proved by writ or oath. If the bargain be so proved, then, but not till then, rei interventus may be proved by parole to make the bargain effectual.

There is here, however, a separate averment of a lease for one year, and that averment it is competent to prove by parole. It is true that the defender's statements in the inferior Court record are exceedingly vague, but so also are those of the pursuers; and I think, therefore, it is only fair to take into view the defender's explanation in the record in this Court (Stat. 2), which is, in substance, that the subjects were, by a separate and distinguishable bargain, let to him for one year until a lease for five years could be formally entered into. It certainly seems more probable, prima facie, that the lease was for a year than that it was for the period averred by the pursuers—viz., from the end of October to 4th June. The lease was one of a cottage and garden. A garden requires to be stocked, and the person who stocks it naturally expects to reap the fruits. The period of endurance averred by the pursuers is unusual, unless it be sanctioned by some local usage, and I therefore agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary that they ought to lead in the proof.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel

No. 27.

Nov. 20, 1875.
Gibson v. Adams, &c.

on the reclaiming note for Andrew Adams and Margaret Adams against Lord Young's interlocutor of 15th October 1875, recall the said interlocutor: Find that the averment of the complainer,—that Robert Duthie, when proprietor of the subjects now belonging to the respondents, promised and agreed to give the complainer a lease of the said subjects for five years from 4th December 1874, —can be proved only by writing or by the oath of party: Quoad ultra allow the parties a proof of their averments prout de jure, the respondents to lead in the proof, and the proof to proceed before Lord Deas on a day to be afterwards fixed by his Lordship, reserving all questions of expenses."

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 28.

Nov. 20, 1875.
Stafford v. M'Laurin.

JANET M'LAURIN OR STAFFORD, AND HUSBAND, Petitioners.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
AGNES FERGUSON OR M'LAURIN, &c., Respondents.—D.-F. Watson—Asher.

Arrestment on Dependence—Expenses.—Arrestment is not competent on the dependence of an action of reduction in which the only pecuniary conclusion is for the expenses of process.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

THIS petition for recall of arrestments was presented by Mrs Janet M'Laurin or Stafford, residing in Surrey, and her husband, under sec. 20 of 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114 (Personal Diligence Act, 1838), on the ground that the arrestments were incompetent and oppressive.

The arrestments complained of had been used on the dependence of an action by Mrs Agnes Ferguson or M'Laurin and others against the petitioners and others, concluding for reduction of certain deeds, and for payment of £100, "or such other sum as our Lords shall modify as the expenses of process to follow hereon."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the arrestments complained of, except to the extent of £100 sterling, and decerns, reserving the question of expenses."

The petitioners reclaimed, and argued;—Arrestments could only be used on the dependence of an action which concluded for payment of money under section 16 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838. Arrestment was not a proper diligence to secure a debt which was future or contingent. Until the action was decided against the defender it was not certain that he would be found liable in expenses. The claim for expenses was not the subject-matter of the action. But even if the expenses should be held to be the subject-matter of the action they were a future debt. The reason why arrestments were held to cover interest and expenses in actions of debt was that they grew out of the debt. The practice in the Bill-Chamber had been to refuse to issue diligence on a summons which did not conclude for a sum of money.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—The conclusion for expenses was a claim

[1] Ross v. Renton, Feb. 26, 1712, M. 690; 2 Bell's Com. (5th ed.) 67; May v. Malcolm, June 7, 1825, 4 S. 76; Telford's Executor v. Blackwood, Feb. 3, 1866, 4 Macph. 369, 38 Scot. Jur. 186; Personal Diligence Act, 1838, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, secs. 16 and 17; Dove v. Henderson, Jan. 11, 1865, 3 Macph. 339, 37 Scot. Jur. 161; Shand's Practice, 226; Wilkie v. Tweedale, Feb. 25, 1815, F.C.

No. 28.

Nov. 20, 1875.
Stafford v. M'Laurin.

for a sum of money. claim for expenses. At advising,—

The principal debt was in the same position as the They both depended on the success of the action.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition for recall of arrestments, and the Lord Ordinary has so far granted the prayer and has loosed the arrestments except to the limited extent of £100. The petitioners have reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and contend that the arrestments should be recalled in toto, on the ground that they are wholly incompetent. The question involved is one of some importance and of general application, but I confess that I entertain no doubt of the way in which it is to be solved. The action on the dependence of which the arrestments were used is one of reduction, and of nothing else. It concludes for the reduction of certain documents, and for payment of £100, or of whatever other sum shall be modified as the expenses of the process. It was conceded in the argument that, but for this last conclusion for expenses, the arrestments would be incompetent. The question before us therefore is reduced to this point, Whether in an action on the dependence of which otherwise arrestments could not be used, they are nevertheless made competent by the fact of the conclusion for expenses? I am of opinion that they are not. I think that the case of Weir v. Otto, 8 Macph. 1070, is directly in point, and that the present case goes no further. I am quite unable to see any distinction between the two diligences of inhibition and arrestment on the dependence of an action.

But there are various other authorities which have been referred to, and which are of great importance, because in these cases it was undoubtedly taken for granted that such a diligence as has been used here would have been incompetent. For example, there is the case of Telford's Executor v. Blackwood, 4 Macph. 369, in which the petitioner prayed for recall of arrestments used upon the dependence of an action of count, reckoning, and payment. This action concluded for payment by the defenders to the pursuers of the amount that should appear to be due to them, while the pursuers at the same time expressed willingness to pay to the defenders whatever balance, if any, might be found after the count and reckoning to be due by them. With great difficulty the Second Division, when I sat there, held that the arrestment was competent, upon the ground that the conclusion was for payment of a sum of money apart altogether from the separate conclusion for a sum in name of expenses. If the conclusion for expenses had been considered to warrant the arrestment we should have had no reason to consider the other point. That and a variety of other decisions are not direct authorities, but go greatly to aid the inference we draw from the case of Weir v. Otto.

The only difficulty which has been suggested arises from the consideration that arrestment covers the expenses of process, and in like manner the interest which may accrue on the principal sum from the date of citation. From this it is argued that in its original use it was intended that it should so secure the expenses, and did have this effect. But I think it was a good answer which was made to this argument that expenses and interest are future debts not due at [1] 33 Geo. III. c. 74, sec. 3; 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 2; Thomson v. Butters, March 10, 1798, M. 1224; Wight v. Wight, May 20, 1822, 1 Sh. 424; Macdonald v. Wingate, Feb. 2, 1825, 3 Sh. 494; Ritchie v. M'Lachlan, May 27, 1870, 8 Macph. 815, 42 Scot. Jur. 477; Weir v. Otto, July 19, 1870, 8 Macph. 1070, 42 Scot. Jur. 628; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868), sec. 18.

No. 28.
Nov. 20, 1875.
Stafford v. M'Laurin.

the date of the arrestment on the dependence, and therefore not covered by it. They only afterwards become a part of the debt, as incidents of and outgrowths from it, and are recoverable under the ultimate process of furthcoming. That is a good explanation of the difficulty.

The argument used upon both sides upon the words of the statute 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114, secs 16 and 17, is not of much avail. The words of these sections give authority to insert in the summons a warrant of arrestment, and describe the summons on the dependence of which, after the insertion of a warrant, effectual arrestment may proceed, as a summons "concluding for payment of money." It is contended, on the one side, that this can only be an action of debt concluding for payment of a sum of money; on the other, that a summons in which the only conclusion for payment is for expenses is in strict language within the section of the Act. But the determination of the construction of these words of the statute brings us back to what we have already been considering. This statute must refer to summonses which conclude for payment of a principal sum of money.

It has neither been established by practice nor by decision that this arrestment is good, and the appeal to the Act of Parliament is equally unavailing. I cannot assent to the view of the Lord Ordinary, and I am of opinion that the arrestment must be recalled in toto.

Lord Deas.—I concur with your Lordship. All the authorities go in the direction pointed out. But apart from authority, I should have arrived at the same result. Diligence by arrestment or inhibition on the dependence of an action is an extraordinary remedy, and is not to be extended further than it has been sanctioned by usage. Now, there is no instance of the remedy having been allowed on the dependence of an action containing no pecuniary conclusions except the conclusion for expenses. All the authorities go the other way. If a different view were taken it would follow that arrestment on the dependence would be competent in all kinds of actions; for, except by mere omission, expenses are habitually concluded for. It has been held that the omission of a conclusion for expenses is not fatal to a claim for expenses, because these are incidental merely, and not part of the subject-matter of the action. I agree with your Lordship that when expenses are awarded the arrestment will be held to cover expenses and interest, but that is because these are incidents which then accrue to the principal sum concluded for, just as an arrestment of a cow has been held to cover its calf subsequently calved.

As to the statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, sec. 16, I should say that it does not apply to a summons whose only pecuniary conclusion is for expenses. It would require something more explicit to make it so apply, and I do not think it was so intended.

Lord Ardmillan.—Even if this question were entirely open, and now to be decided on principle, I should be of opinion that in a case of this kind, which is simply an action of reduction, where there is no petitory conclusion for payment of money, arrestment on the dependence is not competent.

Arrestments in security on the dependence of an action is an extraordinary remedy,—an equitable and appropriate remedy,—but not, I think, to be extended beyond the limits which have been sanctioned by law, and recognised by practice.

No. 28.
Nov. 20, 1875.
Stafford v. M'Laurin.

I do not think the case turns on the statute of 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114. The competency of using arrestments does not depend on that statute, though the procedure in arrestments was regulated by it. I agree with your Lordship in the chair in regard to this Act. I have no doubt that where there is a petitory conclusion for money an arrestment on the dependence will be available to the pursuer to cover expenses.

When competently used as regards the leading petitory conclusion it will be effectual to secure the expenses. This result is, I think, right on principle, the expenses, as it were, growing during the procedure, and attaching to the debt concluded for; and it is according to practice.

But on this summons there is no allegation of a present debt, no conclusion for a present payment, no ground for the extraordinary diligence of arrestment on the dependence.

The point has been decided in regard to inhibition in the case of Dove v. Henderson, 11th January 1865, and in the case of Weir v. Otto, 19th July 1870. Both judgments—one in each Division—were unanimous. In the first of these cases the opinion of Lord Curriehill, and in the last the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, are conclusive; and the law has been so assumed in other cases, and so far as I have been able to ascertain the use of either inhibition or arrestment to secure expenses only, where there is no petitory conclusion in the summons, is unknown in practice. No precedent for it has been adduced.

On principle, the able argument of Mr Balfour was to my mind quite satisfactory. In point of authority, the only decisions truly in point are adverse to the competency; for, as regards this question, I am unable to perceive any sound distinction between inhibition and arrestment. And to sustain this arrestment would be against usage and without precedent, contrary, as I believe, to the understanding and practice of the legal profession.

Lord Mure.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I have only to add that, although at first I had some doubt as to the effect of the words "concluding for payment of money" in the 16th section of the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, I have come to be of opinion that these words do not warrant an arrestment such as that here in question. For it was, I conceive, incompetent, at the date of that Act, according to the law of arrestment, as then understood and administered, to arrest on the dependence of an action in which the only pecuniary conclusion was that for expenses. I am satified that these words cannot be held to have operated a change in the law, and that the provisions of that 16th section were only intended to introduce, with reference to the then existing rules of law applicable to arrestment, the simple process of inserting a warrant of arrestment in the summons, instead of obliging a party to have recourse to the separate and more expensive proceeding of using letters of arrestment on the dependence.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Alter the said interlocutor: Recall the arrestments complained of simpliciter, and decern: Find the petitioner entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

Thomas White, S.S.C.—Hamilton, Kinnear, & Beatson, W.S.—Agents.

No. 29.

Nov. 23, 1875.
Magistrates of Leith v. Lennon.

THE MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF LEITH, Complainers.—Kinnear—Harper.
MRS ELEANOR BOYLAN OR LENNON, Respondent.—Brown.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Statute 48 Geo. III. c. 151, sec. 16.—Where the days for reclaiming against a Lord Ordinary's interlocutor had expired, without a reclaiming note being lodged, the party moved the Lord Ordinary for leave to reclaim under the Act of 1808, sec. 16. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor refusing the motion, against which the party reclaimed. Held, in the circumstances, that the Lord Ordinary had exercised a sound discretion in refusing leave to reclaim.

But question, whether it was competent to bring the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the matter under review.

Bill-Chamber. 2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. I.

THIS was a note of suspension and interdict brought in the Bill-Chamber by the Magistrates of Leith against Mrs Lennon, residing in South Fort Street, Leith, to prevent her building upon the wall between her property and the public park at North Leith.

The respondent, along with her answers, lodged a note to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, No. 10 of process, in which she stated "that the operations complained of on the mutual wall in question were finally completed on Friday the 15th of October 1875; that the note of suspension and interdict for the complainers was not presented until Monday the 18th October; and that the respondent has not since said 15th October interfered with the condition of said wall, and has no intention of doing so; and undertakes to make no alterations on the wall without judicial authority or the consent of the complainers."

The statements in this note were not admitted by the complainers.

The Lord Ordinary (Curriehill), on 26th October, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that the respondent states in the minute No. 10 of process that the operations sought to be interdicted were completed before the note was presented, and that she has no intention of interfering further with the wall in question, and now judicially undertakes in said minute that she will make no alteration on the said wall without judicial authority, or the consent of the complainers, refuses the note: Finds the complainers liable in expenses; modifies the same to £8, 8s. sterling," &c.

Against this interlocutor the complainers instructed their agent to present a reclaiming note.

The fourteen days within which such reclaiming note required to be boxed (A. S. 24th Dec. 1838, sec. 5) expired on 9th November without the complainers' agent having presented his note.

The complainers thereafter moved the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Rutherfurd Clark), in terms of the Act 48 Geo. III. c. 151, sec. 16,* for leave to reclaim, and at the same time lodged a minute in which they stated "that of this date (26th October 1875), Lord Curriehill, Ordinary, officiating in the Bill-Chamber, was pleased to pronounce an interlocutor refusing the note of suspension and interdict. That the complainers were advised to reclaim against the said interlocutor, but the reclaiming days

* "The Administration of Justice and Appeals Act, 1808," 48 Geo. III. c. 151, sec. 16, provides that "if the reclaiming or representing days against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary shall, from mistake or inadvertancy, have expired, it shall be competent, with the leave of the Lord Ordinary, to submit the said interlocutor, by petition, to the review of the Division to which the said Lord Ordinary belongs; but declaring always that in the event of such petition being presented the petitioners shall be subjected in the payment of the expenses previously incurred in the process by the other party."

No. 29.

Nov. 23, 1875.
Magistrates of Leith v. Lennon.

were allowed to expire through mistake or inadvertency in the following circumstances, viz. :—Prior to the pronouncing of the interlocutor the usual statutory notice for the election of town-councillors had been issued, and no meeting of the council was held till after the election. The election took place on the 2d November 1875, and the first meeting of the council thereafter was held on Friday the 5th November. The interlocutor was submitted to this meeting, when instructions were given to reclaim. The papers were immediately prepared for the printer, and put in his hands on Saturday 6th November. On the evening of the 8th a proof of the print and the manuscript papers were sent for delivery to the agent at the town-clerk's office, but instead of being delivered there were left at the police office, where they were not discovered till the afternoon of Tuesday the 9th November, on which day the days allowed for reclaiming expired."

The Lord Ordinary (Rutherfurd Clark), on 13th November, pronounced an interlocutor refusing the complainers' motion for leave to reclaim.

Against this interlocutor the complainers presented a reclaiming note.

The respondent objected to the competency, and argued;—The leave of the Lord Ordinary was essential under the 16th section of the Act of 1808 to enable a party to come to the Inner-House after allowing the proper reclaiming days to expire. He was the sole judge of whether he ought to grant or refuse leave, and there could be no review of his decision on that point by the Inner-House.[1] (2) Even if review was competent the Lord Ordinary was right, and his interlocutor should be adhered to.

Argued for the complainers;—(1) The reclaiming note was competent.[2] It brought under review a final interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and one with which one of the parties to the case was dissatisfied, and of which therefore they were entitled to apply to the Inner-House for review—(6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 18). (2) The Lord Ordinary had gone wrong in refusing leave; he had taken too strict a reading of the statute.

LORD ORMIDALE.—This is one of a class of cases which seldom present themselves for the consideration of the Court. There is nothing, I think, more essential in the administration of justice than that litigants should be able to know when their contentions have come or may be brought to a termination. To secure this very desirable object the time within which parties may reclaim from the Outer-House to the Inner-House, or may appeal from the Court of Session to the House of Lords, is regulated by statute, and the principle of the statutory provisions on the subject obviously is that parties are not to be entitled to hang up a litigation beyond certain limits as regards time. An extraordinary remedy, however, is provided, where, in certain circumstances, and from certain causes, the limited period for reclaiming from the Lord Ordinary to the Inner-House has been allowed to elapse. By the Act 48 Geo. III. c. 151, sec. 16, it is made competent to submit a Lord Ordinary's interlocutor to review after the lapse of the reclaiming days, but that only where the days have been allowed to expire "from mistake or inadvertancy," and on condition that the leave of the Lord Ordinary to reclaim has been obtained. Had the question been a new one, I

[1] Babington v. Babington's Trustees, Feb. 20, 1841, 3 D. 611, 13 Scot. Jur. 62; Forbes v. Trail, June 17, 1843, 5 D. 1212.

[2] Waterston v. Kirkpatrick, Feb. 27, 1852, 14 D. 546, 24 Scot. Jur. 252; Plock and Logan v. Wallace, Dec. 16, 1841, 4 D. 271, 14 Scot. Jur. 107; Bennet v. Pyper, Feb. 19, 1833, 11 S. 414, 5 Scot. Jur. 245; Arnot v. Thomson, Feb. 4, 1826, 4 S. 427; Officers of State v. Alexander, June 29, 1864, 2 Macph. 1294, 36 Scot. Jur. 646.

No. 29.

Nov. 23, 1875.
Magistrates of Leith v. Lennon.

should have entertained little or no doubt that the leave of the Lord Ordinary was not only intended to be indispensable, but that his reason for refusing such leave was not reviewable. But it appears that cases have occurred in which the Court have assumed that they were entitled to review the Lord Ordinary's decision in granting or refusing leave. Without formally determining that question, or holding that it must or must not be determined, I shall follow the course taken by the Court in some of the cases referred to, and consider whether the Lord Ordinary in the present case was well or ill founded in his refusal to give leave to reclaim. If he was right in refusing to give leave to reclaim that will be of itself sufficient to enable us to dispose of the case.

Now, without going very particularly into the circumstances stated by the reclaimers both in their minute and from the bar, I think it manifest that they and their agent must have had the question of reclaiming repeatedly and anxiously under consideration before and about the time when the reclaiming days expired. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was pronounced on 26th October. Owing to the change in the municipality, caused by the elections of 2d November, it is said to have been necessary to postpone presenting the reclaiming note till the new Council came into office. The reclaimers and their agent must therefore have had the question of reclaiming before them both prior to 2d November and afterwards on 5th November when the matter was submitted to the new council, and their authority to reclaim obtained. On the following day, Saturday 6th November, the papers were sent to the printer. It is hardly possible therefore to imagine a case in which his duties with regard to reclaiming could have been more fully and constantly brought under the attention of the agent for the reclaimers. But it is said that on the 8th November, the day before the reclaiming note required to be lodged, a proof of the print was sent to the agent, by the printer, for revisal, but being delivered at the wrong place, it was not received by the agent or revised by him. Now, the agent must have known very well what the boxing hours on the 9th of November were, and when he found that the proofs had not been sent for revisal, and still more when he found the prints had not been timeously delivered to him for boxing, he should have instantly sent to the printer to inquire about them. This, however, he did not do. The result was that he did not get the prints till the evening. But even then, when he did get them, I quite concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that he ought to have resorted to the expedient, well known to practitioners, of sending the reclaiming note to the house of the clerk, who would doubtless have received and marked the paper, though after office hours. All this was left undone, and, as now alleged, "from mistake or inadvertency." I cannot, however, hold that a mere statement that there was mistake or inadvertence is sufficient to warrant the Lord Ordinary in granting leave to reclaim, or the Court now in saying that he was wrong in refusing leave. I rather think that the failure to reclaim in the present case arose from carelessness and inattention; and being of this opinion, I think the Lord Ordinary was quite right in refusing leave to reclaim, and that his interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

I think it right to add, in fairness to the reclaimers' agent, that in nothing I have said is it to be understood that I intend to cast any reflection upon him. It is impossible to suppose that he, or any agent in his position, can attend personally to the details in connection with the lodging and boxing of reclaiming notes. That, and such like matters, must frequently, if not always, be committed to clerks or others, by and through whom blunders may unavoidably sometimes occur. It says a great deal indeed for the regularity with which Court business is generally conducted that such cases as the present very rarely present themselves.

LORD GIFFORD.—If this case had raised the general question whether a party was to lose a valuable right through his reclaiming note being lodged too late, and the party shewed us that he had duly instructed his agent, and that the non-lodging of his note had arisen from the carelessness, ignorance, or fault of his agent, or of the agent's clerk or apprentice, I should be most unwilling to hold that the party was without relief. I think the statute was intended to give a remedy to the client not only against accidents but against the negligence or ignorance of his agent or his agent's clerk, wherever the client can say that he has done everything that he personally could duly and timeously to reclaim. The party suffers sufficiently in having to pay the whole previous expenses, though of course he has his relief against his agent. Therefore had the case raised the general question I would not, merely because of the gross fault of the agent, deprive the party of the right of review, and thus perhaps preclude and foreclose the most important and momentous patrimonial interests. The real question in such cases is, did the party intend to acquiesce, or did he hesitate about reclaiming? If he did so he cannot be restored against it, for it is of the utmost importance that litigation should take a definite end. But the specialties of the present case relieve us of this general question.

The point which the Magistrates of Leith wish to be allowed now to raise is a mere possessory question. There is no pretence that they will be cut out of their rights, or prevented from trying any question of right. The only question is, whether they are to be entitled to a summary instead of an ordinary remedy. In the course of the litigation between them and Mrs Lennon she has lodged a minute, which the Lord Ordinary has thought fit to make the foundation of a possessory judgment in her favour. There is no room to say that the magistrates intended to acquiesce. But their reclaiming note was not in time. They then come to the Lord Ordinary for leave to reclaim against the interlocutor as one which has become final by mistake. The remedy is an extraordinary one. It is for the discretion of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court whether it is to be applied or not. And, viewing it as a question of discretion, I agree that the Lord Ordinary has come to a sound decision.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two questions here, first, whether the Lord Ordinary is sole judge on the point whether leave to reclaim should be given, and second, whether, supposing he is not sole judge, the judgment he has come to is right.

On the first point, I am of opinion that he is the sole judge. Where by statute the leave of a special judge or Court is required, no other authority is admissible to supply the want of that leave. For instance, where our leave is necessary to enable a party to appeal to the House of Lords, and we have thought fit to refuse such leave, is it to be supposed that the House of Lords would listen to a representation from the party that we were not warranted in refusing him leave to appeal. I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary was the sole judge whose leave could make this reclaiming note now competent, and that it is incompetent without it.

No. 29.

Nov. 23, 1875. Magistrates of Leith v. Lennon.

As, however, a different view appears to have been entertained by the Court in previous cases I shall not put my judgment on that ground. For I am further of opinion that there has been nothing stated to bring the case under the Act of 1808. Specific days are fixed by statute within which the steps required in order to reclaim must be taken. Where an equitable remedy is sought against the strictness of legal forms it must be supported on equitable grounds. I do not say that if the reclaimer were in danger of losing a valuable right, that very fact might not form an equitable consideration to induce the Court to relieve him of the excessive penalty of his negligence. But we have no such case here. The judgment sought to be reclaimed against is only a possessory judgment. The party is not precluded from resorting to a declarator of his right. There does not seem in this case to have been any mistake or inadvertence. The cause of the reclaiming note not being lodged was mere carelessness or negligence, which is not what the statute contemplates. In these circumstances the party cannot be allowed to plead the negligence of his advisers, even if he himself deliberately intended to reclaim, and instructed his adviser accordingly.

Lord Neaves was absent.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the complainers against Lord Rutherfurd Clark's interlocutor of 13th November 1875, refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the said interlocutor: Find the complainers liable in additional expenses," &c.

W. H. Couper, L.A.—William Paterson, L.A.—Agents.

No. 30.

William Alexander, Pursuer.—J. G. Smith—Strachan.
Alexander Butchart, Defender.—D.-F. Watson—Wallace.

Nov. 24, 1875. Alexander v. Butchart.

Property—Servitude—Shop Sign—Implied Grant.—A proprietor of a tenement of houses consisting of a shop story and three upper stories above the shop, when in the personal occupation of the shop story, erected wooden panels above the window and door of the shop to receive his name and sign, which panels extended beyond the middle of the joists of the floor separating the shop story from the one above it. These panels were afterwards used for the same purpose by successive tenants of the shop. In 1870 the whole subjects were exposed for sale by public roup. The tenant of the shop purchased the shop story and took a disposition of the subject "as presently occupied" by himself. The upper stories were purchased by another person In an action of declarator and interdict at the instance of the latter against the purchaser of the shop story, held that there was no ground for sustaining an implied grant to the defender of the right to use the panels beyond the middle of the joists, as he had failed to instruct that it was reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the shop.

Opinion (per Lord Gifford) that if a thing is to be made a burden upon property, without entering the titles it must be capable of being brought under one of the known servitudes.

2d Division. Ld. Craighill. I.

In and prior to 1851 William Sime was proprietor of a tenement at the corner of Overgate and Barrack Street, Dundee, consisting of a shop story, and three upper stories and attics. The shop story he occupied himself as a stationer, and continued to do so till 1860.

In 1851 Sime made certain alterations on the front of the buildings, and inter alia enlarged the shop window upwards, and constructed two

No. 30.

Nov. 24, 1875. Alexander v. Butchart.

panels one over the window, and the other over the door, for the purpose of displaying his sign. These panels extended about nine inches above the middle of the joists of the floor separating the shop story from the one above.

In 1860 Sime let the shop story to Peter Hean junior, and again in 1863 to John Strathearn junior, and in 1869 his trustees let it to Alexander Butchart.

All these tenants, including the defender, during the period of their tenancies occupied the above-mentioned panels with their names and signs.

In 1870 the whole property was exposed for sale by Sime's trustees by public roup. Alexander Butchart, who was still tenant of the shop story, then purchased it and received a disposition dated 13th and recorded 16th May 1870, of "all and whole that shop and back-shop, No. 57 Overgate, Dundee, as presently occupied by the said Alexander Butchart," &c.

William Alexander purchased the remainder of the property, being the three upper flats and attics. His disposition was dated 8th and registered 11th July 1870.

On 20th January 1875 he raised this action against Alexander Butchart, to have it declared "that the centre of the joists is the boundary line dividing the shop No. 57 Overgate, Dundee, belonging to the defender, from the tenement above said shop belonging to pursuer, ... and that the defender is not entitled to paint or place his sign or other inscription on the panels above the window and door of said shop, or on any part thereof which is above the said boundary line," and to have the defender's sign removed, and for interdict.

The defender admitted that the panels upon which his sign was placed extended partly above the middle line of the joists which divided his shop from the flat above belonging to the pursuer, and that his name was displayed on the panels.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The right to use the said sign having been conveyed to the defender as part and pertinent of his shop the pursuer is not entitled to decree. (2) The defender having right to the said sign as part and pertinent of his property the action should be dismissed, with expenses.

A photograph of the front of the premises was produced, and further probation was renounced.

The Lord Ordinary, on 17th June 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—Repels the defences, and decerns and declares; as also decerns and ordains, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defender liable in expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . A right of property in the wall higher up than the line of separation is not claimed by the defender, but he claims 'the right to use the said sign;' and the ground on which this right is asserted is, that, as alleged, it was 'conveyed to the defender as part and pertinent of his shop.' There is confessedly no express conveyance of the right, and as the right had not existed for the prescriptive period, it was not an accessory of such a kind as could have passed with the property, unless there was a conveyance, express or implied. The defender accordingly contends that, though there was not an express, there was an implied conveyance of the right; and several cases, particularly those of Preston's Trustees, 22 D. p. 66, and Cochrane v. Ewart, 4 Macq. p. 117, were referred to in support of his contention. The Lord Ordinary accepts the doctrine to be deduced from these authorities, but he is unable to see that the present case is one to which it can be applied. The use of the signboard in dispute is not a necessary or a natural convenience of the shop belonging to the defender. Assuming that every shop must have a sign, there is no reason, other than the caprice of the person by whom it is put up, why the sign should be so large as

No. 30. The defender reclaimed.[1]

Nov. 24, 1875. Alexander v. Butchart.

LORD ORMIDALE.—In this case the pursuer seeks to have is declared (1) that the centre of the joists is the boundary line between the shop belonging to the defender and the tenement above said shop belonging to himself, the pursuer. About that there is no dispute. And (2) that the defender "is not entitled to paint or place his sign or other inscription on the panels above the window and door of said shop, or on any part thereof, which is above the said boundary line." It is here that the question between the parties arises.

The defence to the action proceeds on the assumption that the defender is entitled to the use, to some extent at least, of what is the property of the pursuer. He claims to go beyond the boundary line to a certain extent. His object in doing so is intelligible enough. The only question is, has he the right.

The defender does not found on express grant, neither does he found on acquiescence. In truth there could be no room for the latter plea, for, prior to 1870, the two properties belonged to a common owner. The defender rests his case entirely on implied grant, to be found, he says, in the terms of the titles, and in the circumstance that his sign required to be placed where it is for the comfortable enjoyment of the property he has acquired in the shop below. And in support of this contention he has cited the case of Cochrane v. Ewart, as decided in the House of Lords.

Now, it is a little singular that this being the substantial plea on which the defender founds, he yet has renounced probation without any facts having been either admitted or disclosed to shew that the having his sign in the particular place in question was necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of his shop. He does not even make in the record any averment to that effect. He might have established it by proof, and would have been allowed an opportunity if he had desired it of doing so on a very general averment, but he has made no such averment at all.

---

to encroach upon contiguous property. Here the dispute is only as to the size of the letters composing the sign. They may be reduced, and if they be so, the encroachment complained of by the pursuer will be avoided. The circumstance that the letters were so large as to pass beyond the boundary line was nothing but an accident, and its occurrence the Lord Ordinary thinks neither proves or even suggests that there was conveyed to the defender the right to use his neighbour's wall as if it were his own property, as part or pertinent of the premises conveyed to the defender. A disposition by implication may be sustained where the thing claimed is a necessary or natural appurtenance; but even where the claim is sustained it will be so only with hesitation, because parties are always able by their contracts to include not inferentially, but explicitly, everything which is to be conveyed. The judgment of Lord Chancellor Westbury in the case of Suffield v. Brown, 33 L. J. (Chancery), p. 249, in which prior cases were reviewed, is, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, an instructive decision. Of course it is not binding here as an authority. The views, however, on which it proceeded seem to the Lord Ordinary to be shaped by no peculiar system, but, on the contrary, to be such as should be recognised in a case like the present, whatever be the country in which the judgment is to be pronounced."

[1] Authorities referred to.—Preston's Trustees v. Preston, March 7, 1844, 22 D. 366, 16 Scot. Jur. 433; Cochrane v. Ewart, March 25, 1861, 23 D. (H. of L.) 3, 4 Macq. 117, 33 Scot. Jur. 435; Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, May 28, 1875, ante, vol. ii., p. 729; Suffield v. Brown, 33 Law Journ., Chan. 249; Munro v. Jervey, Nov. 23, 1821, 1 S. 161; Buchan v. Carmichael, Nov. 25, 1823, 2 S. 526; Dickson v. Morton, Nov. 25, 1824, 3 S. 310; Bell's Prin. sec. 979.

No. 30.

Nov. 24, 1875.
Alexander v. Butchart.

We have therefore to determine on the papers before us as they now stand whether the right claimed has been established. The defender appeals to the general understanding that a sign is a necessary adjunct to a shop. I admit that in the general case a sign is a necessary adjunct to a shop; but I should require a great deal more to satisfy me that it is not an adjunct which must be confined to the property of which the shop is a part. Looking at the photograph which has been laid before us, I am not satisfied that the defender cannot perfectly well place his sign on his own property with equal advantage as on his neighbour's. And I am the more disposed to think that he ought to be content with doing so, because by encroaching upon his neighbour's property he deprives his neighbour of the opportunity of using his property for what may be necessary, in his view, for the comfortable enjoyment of it. In these circumstances the principle of decision in Cochrane v. Ewart appears to me to be inapplicable.

The only other point that I need notice is the contention of the defender that the implied grant on which he founds can be spelt out of the terms of his disposition, which bears that the property is disponed "as presently occupied" by the defender himself, he having been previously tenant of the shop. But I cannot come to the conclusion that the expression "as previously occupied" was intended to carry such a right as is here claimed, or to do more than merely denote the subject sold.

For the reasons I have now explained, I have no difficulty or hesitation in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD GIFFORD.—The first question is what right was conferred by Sime's trustees on the purchaser of the shop story. Did they give him a right to have or to keep his sign or name-board partly projecting upon or over the wall of the flat above? I do not think that they did, and if this had been intended it should have been expressed in the disposition. In like manner, as between Sime's trustees, had they remained proprietors of the shop story, and the pursuer, as the purchaser of the upper stories, I think such a right as the defender contends for here could not have been held to have been reserved.

But we are dealing with parties who are both singular successors of Sime's trustees. In point of fact there is very little difference in the dates of their respective titles. The subjects were in the market at the same time. They were bought at nearly the same time. And it is a mere accident that the defender's title to the shop story was first granted and first registered. It was quite well known at and before the sale that the subjects were to be separated, and if the defender looked upon the use of these panels as a sign-board as in any way necessary to the beneficial occupation of the part of the tenement which he was buying he was bound to have asked an express conveyance of the right, and to have had it made plain that that privilege was conferred upon him. This he did not do, but he now says that he relied on continuing to enjoy it as an incident or pertinent of his property, or, as he puts it in argument, he considered it as implied in the grant and conveyance to him.

It is true, indeed, that when certain rights are necessary for the fair and reasonable enjoyment of a subject, and are actually possessed with the subject sold, over other subjects belonging to the seller, they will be held as conveyed, and may be effectual against the seller and his successors although they do not enter the records. In all these cases, however, the purchaser of the burdened

No. 30.

Nov. 24, 1875.
Alexander v. Butchart.

subject is held to be put on his guard by the actual exercise of the right claimed, which I think is almost always of the nature of a known servitude. But I do not think that the purchaser of the upper flats can be held to be, as opposed to the purchaser of the shop story, in that position. How could he discover the existence of any such right as that claimed by the defenders. Though he examined the front of the tenement, and saw the sign there, still on referring to the defender's disposition he would find no reference thereto, and he was entitled to trust to the conveyances just given to the defender and offered to himself, and finding no such right in favour of the defender, either conveyed or reserved, he was entitled to conclude that no such right existed. The defender, on the other hand, was bound to know that there might be many uses which the common proprietor was making of his property which must come to an end when the subjects came to be separated, and that the use which he himself had been enjoying was just one of them which he must take his chance of being allowed to continue, if he did not buy the whole property or get a special grant of the right in his conveyance.

But, further, I am of opinion that the right claimed here does not come up to the definition of a right necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the subjects. It is quite clear that the defender can do without it without much difficulty. There are several ways in which he can display his name and sign without encroaching upon his neighbour's wall above him.

I am even disposed to go a little further, and say that by the law of Scotland, if a thing is to be made a burden upon property which does not enter the titles it must be capable of being brought under one or other of the known servitudes. Where such is not the case it can only be effectual if it enters the infeftment, or so far as there is a personal contract between the parties.

But I prefer to confine my judgment to the first point, namely, that there is no ground here for holding that there was an implied grant to the defender.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—There is no question of property here. The defender claims a right of servitude over part of the pursuer's property for the purpose of displaying his sign. It is not maintained that the alleged servitude has been made the subject of express grant; but it is said that there is an implied grant. The reason urged is this, that prior to the division of the property the wall, as the defender now claims to use it, was used for the purpose of displaying the sign of the occupant of the shop, and that this use of the wall is necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of the shop. There is neither averment nor proof to that effect, and I cannot draw the inference.

It is a question whether, supposing there were an agreement for a servitude of the kind, the burden would pass against a singular successor without entering the title. I doubt it very much; but on this point I do not express an opinion.

The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Neaves were absent.

The Court adhered.

David Milne, S.S.C.—Henry Buchan, S.S.C.—Agents.

CATHARINE THOM AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Balfour—Wallace.
DANIEL MACBETH AND OTHERS, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—M'Laren.

No. 31.

Nov. 26, 1875.
Thom, et al. v. Macbeth, et al.

Property, pro indiviso—Division and Sale.—In an action of division and sale of a heritable property, held that, though not physically incapable of division, the estate was incapable of division with due regard to the rights and interests of parties, inasmuch as division would reduce for the time the market value of each party's share, and that a pro indiviso proprietor was therefore entitled to insist on a sale of the whole estate and division of the price.

Observed (per cur.) that in the case of sale of a pro indiviso property under the orders of the Court a power to the pro indiviso proprietors to bid at the sale might be reserved in the articles of roup.

Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that a pro indiviso proprietor was not bound to run the risk of the market, but was entitled to have his present interest realised.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

THE pursuers of this action of declarator, division, and sale, Miss Catharine Thom and Mrs Eliza Thom or Annan, daughters of the late Robert Thom of Ascog, Bute, were each proprietors of five-twentieth parts pro indiviso of the estate of Ascog.

The defender, Daniel Macbeth, was proprietor in his own right of two-twentieth parts pro indiviso, and, as sole surviving trustee under the trust-settlement of the late Robert Thom, of the remaining eight-twentieth parts pro indiviso of the estate of Ascog. The last-mentioned eight-twentieth parts pro indiviso of the estate were held by the defender in trust, four-twentieth parts for the pursuer, Miss Catharine Thom, in life-rent and her children in fee, and the remaining four-twentieth parts for the pursuer, Mrs Eliza Thom or Annan, in liferent and her children in fee. The estate of Ascog was held by the pro indiviso proprietors subject to certain heritable debts with which it was burdened in the hands of the late Robert Thom of Ascog. The several pro indiviso shares above mentioned were also held subject to certain burdens by way of annuity and otherwise imposed upon them respectively.

The pursuers set forth on record that they were very desirous that the estate should be sold, and that they should receive payment of the shares of the price to which they were absolutely entitled, or, failing a sale, that the estate should be divided so that they might enter into several possession of the shares to which they had right; that it was highly expedient, for the just interests of all concerned, that the estate should be sold, and the numerous burdens upon it satisfied and provided for out of the price; that the estate was incapable of being divided according to the shares and just interests of the several parties having interest therein; and that it was incapable of being divided at all without very great loss and depreciation of value.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The said lands and estate being incapable of division, according to the just rights and interests of parties, or at least being incapable of division without great loss and depreciation of value, the pursuers are entitled to have decree of sale, as also decree relative to the disposal of the price as concluded for.

The defender, Daniel Macbeth, resisted the action, on the ground that it was for the interest of all parties that the estate of Ascog should be retained as a whole, it being an improving estate, in the immediate neighbourhood of Rothesay, well adapted for feuing, and yearly increasing in value, both from feu-duties and otherwise, to a large extent.

He further denied that the estate was incapable of being divided, and opposed a sale on the ground that, looking to the nature of the estate, if it was not to be retained as a whole, it was much more for his interest,

No. 31.

Nov. 26, 1875.
Thom, et al. v. Macbeth, et al.

as an individual, and for the interest of the trust-estate which he represented, that it should be divided, than that it should be sold at that time.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) In any view the pursuers are not entitled to insist on the said estate being sold as concluded for.

After finding that the pursuers were entitled to insist in the action, the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie), on 31st May 1873, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the closed record, before answer remits to Mr Hugh Kirkwood, Killermont, by Maryhill, to inspect all and whole the three pound land of Over and Nether Ascog, . . . and to report whether the said lands can, with due regard to the rights and interests of the parties specified in the conclusions of the summons, be divided between the said parties in the proportions therein specified, or whether the said lands and others cannot with such due regard to their rights and interests be divided between the said parties, and that a sale thereof is necessary;" and in the event of his being of opinion that a division could be so made, to report the scheme of division which he would suggest; and in the event of his being of opinion that a division could not be so made, to report the upset price and any conditions of sale which should appear expedient to him.

Mr Kirkwood reported that he was "clearly of opinion that it would be highly injudicious to attempt a division of the estate, and that such a course would be against the interest of all the parties concerned;" that he looked upon it "as an estate incapable of division in the proportions referred to without great depreciation of value; and as portions of the estate have a present and prospective feuing value, it would (looking at the value to be put upon these as more or less speculative) be next to impossible to make a fair and just allocation;" that he was further of opinion "that the estate would sell readily as a whole, and bring a higher price if exposed in one lot than it would do were it put up for sale in several lots." Having made a valuation of the estate as a whole, he suggested £37,000 as the upset price.

The defender put in a note of objections to Mr Kirkwood's report, "in respect that a sale is not necessary, and that the lands described in the summons can be divided between the parties." He maintained, and offered to prove, that a division was quite practicable, and suggested a scheme of division as one among others which might be adopted. The cumulo valuation of the several parts into which he proposed to divide the estate amounted, according to his valuation, to £33,000. The difference between the two valuations was, however, mainly accounted for by the different values put on the feuing portion of the estate.

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th January 1874, remitted to Mr Kirkwood to reconsider his report and the note of objections for Mr Macbeth. Mr Kirkwood reported that he adhered to his opinion "that it would be highly injudicious to attempt a division of the estate, and next to impossible to make a fair and just allocation."

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary (Young), on 9th June 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that it is proper and necessary that the lands and estate of Ascog . . . should be sold, and the price thereof divided among the parties having right thereto, and decerns: Appoints the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure, with a view to the sale of the said lands and others by public roup," &c.*

---

* "NOTE— . . . Upon this additional report being lodged Mr Macbeth maintained that Mr Kirkwood was wrong in the opinion which he had expressed, and moved that he should be allowed a proof at large that a sale was

No. 31.

Nov. 26, 1875.
Thom, et al. v. Macbeth, et al.

Mr Macbeth reclaimed, and argued;—Mr Kirkwood's opinion and report were founded mainly on this, that a larger price would be got for the estate if exposed as a whole than if exposed in lots, and he therefore arrived at the result that division would entail a pecuniary loss upon each separate party. Admitting that there would be pecuniary loss to any of the parties who at once sold their allotments, a sale would involve still greater loss to those parties who were desirous of retaining the estate as a whole. It was an improving estate, capable of a great enhancement of value by development. Present sale would be at a sacrifice of much of the prospective value. As therefore a present sale, either as a whole or in lots, would be prejudicial to the interests of all parties, the pursuers, if they refused any longer to remain in communione, were not entitled, in order to save themselves from a loss, which would be of their own causing, to inflict a still greater loss upon the defender. Of the two alternatives the defender was entitled to choose the least prejudicial to himself, and insist upon a division in order that he might at least retain and benefit by the development of his own share of the estate, rather than submit to a present sale of the whole. His legal right was to hold that property in severalty which he had been holding pro indiviso. The interests of the pursuers were not to rule the question. They were insisting on a change, and if there was to be any loss it must fall on them. It was only where a property held pro indiviso was physically incapable of division, as a house, manufactory, &c., that a party could insist for sale.[1] There was no such case here. The estate consisted of arable ground, feuing ground, and ground already feued, and a scheme of division could easily be arranged, as he was prepared to prove.

Argued for the pursuers;—The meaning of the term "impossible" or "incapable" of division in the decisions founded on was not physically impossible or incapable of division, but impossible or incapable of division having due regard to the just rights and interests of all concerned. In that view, Mr Kirkwood's report was conclusive that it was impossible to divide the estate without sacrificing a portion of its value. The defender was not now entitled to ask a proof.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only question is whether the estate can be reasonably divided in such a manner as to protect the just interests of all concerned.

---

neither necessary nor proper, and that the estate could be fairly divided among those having right thereto, with a due regard to their rights and interests.

"The Lord Ordinary has refused to give effect to this motion of Mr Macbeth, because he considers that Mr Macbeth having acquiesced in the remit to Mr Kirkwood, and having not only followed out and taken part in the proceedings under that remit before Mr Kirkwood, but also having objected to his first report, and having acquiesced in and taken part in the proceedings before Mr Kirkwood under the second remit, is in the same position as if he had actually consented to each of these remits, and is bound by Mr Kirkwood's reports—(Dixon v. Monkland Canal Company, H. of L. 1 W. and S. 636; Wilson v. Struthers, 15 Sh. 523, 9 Scot. Jur. 268; Brown v. Love, 4 D. 386, 14 Scot. Jur. 141). These reports are, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, conclusive as to the impropriety of a division, and as to the propriety and necessity of sale. And therefore he has given decree to that effect."

[1] Stair, iv. 3, 12; 1 Bell Com. (M'Laren's ed.) 62; Anderson v. Anderson, March 11, 1857, 19 D. 700; Brock v. Hamilton, Jan. 27, 1852, 19 D. 701, note; Bryden v. Gibson, Feb. 4, 1837, 15 S. 486; Craig v. Fleming, March 14, 1863, 1 Macph. 612, 35 Scot. Jur. 367.

[2] Dixon v. Monkland Canal Company, and other cases quoted in Lord Ordinary's note.

No. 31.

Nov. 26, 1875.
Thom, et al. v. Macbeth, et al.

Lord Mackenzie having found that the pursuers had a title to insist in the action against the present reclaimer, after hearing parties and considering the record, before answer remitted to Mr Hugh Kirkwood to report whether the estate could, "with due regard to the rights and interests of the parties," be divided, or whether a sale thereof was necessary. The ability and accuracy of Mr Kirkwood are not challenged. The result of his report on the above remit is, that a division of the estate is impossible with due regard to the rights and interests of those concerned. The contention between the parties is as to whether there must be a specific division of the estate, or whether the party who is not bound and does not desire to remain in communion is entitled to insist on a sale and division of the price. Now, the deduction which I draw from the judgment of Lord Rutherfurd in the case of Brock is that when division is not reasonably practicable without sacrificing to an appreciable extent the interests of some or of all of the parties the only resort is a sale and division of the price.

I can quite well conceive that a division here would be prejudicial, and that to retain the estate together might be advantageous. But the proprietors who wish to realise are not bound to run the risk of the market. They are entitled to have their present interest realised. They want money, and a division of the estate would be clearly a pecuniary loss to them at present, to which the defender has no right to subject them. They are therefore entitled to insist for a sale.

But there is a remedy for the defender. The pursuers want to realise their interests. Mr Macbeth wants to keep the estate together, and take the risk and the benefit of its development.

There can be no difficulty in inserting a clause in the articles of roup reserving power to any who are interested to bid at the sale. I should think that quite reasonable. As to the effect of such a clause on Mr Macbeth's position I give no opinion.

Lord Ormidale.—I am of the same opinion. Two questions are raised by Mr Macbeth. The first regards the competency of the action, the second has reference to the expediency of the course adopted by the Lord Ordinary.

As to the competency of the action I can entertain no doubt. It is impossible, I think, to maintain, either on principle or authority, that a sale is not a competent remedy for joint proprietors to resort to, if they do not desire to remain in union. The second question, which relates to the mode in which the union is to be dissolved, may, according to circumstances, be attended with more or less difficulty. Ought the joint or common property to be divided, or ought it to be sold, and the realised price divided, is the practical question we have to determine in the present case. It was contended on the authorities that where division was physically possible there must be division. That is not, however, the conclusion which I arrive at on a consideration of the cases of Brock, and Anderson, and Craig v. Fleming. The expressions, "impossible" or "impracticable," as used in these cases, clearly mean impossible or impracticable having a due regard to the just rights of all the co-proprietors. If in this case it is impossible to divide without sacrificing a considerable portion of the value of the property then there ought to be a sale. Now, here, in the opinion of Mr Kirkwood, to whom, without objection on the part of the defender, a remit was made to examine and report, a division would entail a sacrifice of £4000 or thereby. It is not, in my opinion, reasonable that the pursuers should be subjected to their share of that loss merely to gratify what I cannot help characterising as the speculative and sentimental views of the defender. On the contrary, I think the pursuers are entitled to insist on a sale, a division being impossible or impracticable in the sense in which these expressions must be understood in such questions as the present. If Mr Macbeth really thinks it a desirable thing for him that the property should be preserved entire he may have an opportunity of purchasing it for himself at the sale.

No. 31.

Nov. 26, 1875.
Thom, et al. v. Macbeth, et al.

LORD GIFFORD.—If I were selecting words in which to frame a remit in this case, in reference to the question whether the subjects should be specifically divided, or whether they should be sold, I do not think that I could find any more apt words to express my view of what that remit should be than those used by Lord Mackenzie,—"Whether the said lands can, with due regard to the rights and interests of the parties specified in the conclusions of the summons, be divided," &c. Physically, almost everything, every subject, whether heritable or moveable, is divisible, if all considerations of expense of division and of deterioration or possible destruction of the value of the subject are to be disregarded. For example, it is physically possible to divide even a mansion-house, and to convert it into two or more dwellings. But considerations of expediency, of expense, and of deterioration cannot be left out of view, and in most cases it is just upon these considerations that the question depends whether a subject shall be specifically divided, or whether it shall be sold, and the price distributed.

Now, this question is in general, and certainly, in a case like the present, far better decided upon a remit to a person of skill and experience than by allowing the parties a general proof, and therefore the remit was quite properly made to Mr Kirkwood. I think that all parties are bound by that remit; but whether they are so or not, the remit is just the remit which the Court would now make. Very properly the Lord Ordinary made his remit before answer.

On Mr Kirkwood's report I agree in the result at which Mr Kirkwood has arrived. There seems to be the strongest expediency that the estate should not be broken up into parts, and as far as the Court can judge a better price will be realised for the whole as a whole than if the estate were divided in any way into lots.

Indeed, it rather appears that, apart from the risk or certainty of deterioration, it would be next to impossible to adjust the specific interests of the parties here without bringing the property or the lots to the test of the market value.

I am further of opinion that at the public sale each pro indiviso proprietor should be allowed to offer, and, if the highest offerer, to purchase. Indeed, I am disposed to think that this is the right of each pro indiviso proprietor, and this must be specially provided for in the articles of roup. This will exclude every allegation of possible hardship to any of the co-proprietors. I would wish to add, however, that as Mr Macbeth has a trust or fiduciary character, as well as his individual interest, it may be doubtful how far he has power, as trustee, to purchase for the beneficiaries, or to apply trust-funds for that purpose. Possibly, if he attempts to buy as trustee, he will do so at his own risk; if loss results from such a purchase, the loss will be the loss of the trustee; if there be gain, it will accrue to the beneficiaries. But this is rather a question between Mr Macbeth and those for whom he is trustee, which at present I desire to keep open.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

No. 31.

Nov. 26, 1875.
Thom, et al. v. Macbeth, et al.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of, and remit the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the same: Find the reclaimers liable in expenses since the date of the interlocutor complained of, and remit to the Auditor to tax," &c.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—J. & A. PEDDIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 32.

Nov. 27, 1875.
Clark v. Hamilton and Lee.

JOHN B. CLARK, Complainer.—J. C. Smith.
HAMILTON AND LEE, Respondents.—Trayner.

Diligence—Charge—Competency of second charge—Suspension.—A suspension of a charge was brought on the ground of irregularity in the messenger's execution. The chargers pleaded that the suspension was incompetent without a reduction of the messenger's execution. Thereafter the chargers, by letter, abandoned the charge, but insisted in the plea of incompetency in the suspension, and craved that the note should be refused, with expenses. The Court refused the suspension in so far as regarded the grounds and warrants of the charge, and, quoad ultra, sisted procedure pending an action of reduction of the messenger's execution at the instance of the suspender. The chargers then gave a second charge upon the same grounds and warrants. In a second suspension held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the first charge having been abandoned as a charge, and being only insisted in so far as the question of expenses in the first suspension was concerned, the second charge was competent.

Bill-Chamber. 2D DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. R.

IN April 1875 John B. Clark, having been imprisoned on a charge given him at the instance of Messrs Hamilton and Lee, presented a note of suspension and liberation.

The ground of suspension was that the messenger's execution of charge bore a manifestly wrong and impossible date, viz., 1st December 1875.

The respondents took the objection that it was incompetent to challenge a messenger's execution except in a reduction.

The complainer was liberated by the order of the respondents, and the note was subsequently passed.

On 29th April 1875 the agents for the respondents wrote to the agent for the suspender as follows :—"We have to intimate to you that, while denying your client's allegations in regard to the charge given him, our clients are not disposed to have a litigation on the subject, and therefore they pass from and abandon the charge complained of, and all that has followed upon it. But they maintain their plea against the competency of the suspension, and will crave that the note be refused, with expenses."

The suspender refused to abandon the suspension, which was accordingly proceeded with in ordinary form.

On 5th June, the chargers insisting in their objection above stated, the Court pronounced this interlocutor :—"In respect the suspender proposes to bring an action of reduction, sists further procedure in hoc statu."

Thereafter, while the reduction was pending, the Court, on 19th October 1875, on the motion of the respondents, pronounced this interlocutor :—"In respect there is no relevant statement on the record affecting the grounds and warrants of the charge libelled, refuse the suspension in so far as regards the grounds and warrants of the charge: Quoad ultra continues the cause."

The respondents on 21st October 1875 gave the complainer, Clark, a second charge proceeding upon the same grounds and warrants as the first.

Of this second charge the complainer brought a second suspension, on the ground that the first charge had not been set aside by the Court or otherwise finally disposed of, and that the suspension was still depending.

The note was presented without caution or consignation.

No. 32.

Nov. 27, 1875.
Clark v. Hamilton and Lee.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The chargers having previously given a charge for the same debt on the same grounds, and the validity of that charge being now the question in a process in dependence before the Court, the giving of a second charge was oppressive, and is incompetent. (2) Lis alibi pendens. (3) In respect of the dependence of the previous suspension, and the proceedings therein, it was and is incompetent for the chargers to proceed further with their diligence.

The Lord Ordinary refused the note.

The complainer reclaimed.[1]

LORD ORMIDALE.—This case has got into a position of apparent embarrassment. It is stated that the Lord Ordinary has found in the reduction of the messenger's execution that the first charge was invalid. His interlocutor, however, is still to be submitted to review. In the meantime, we are pressed for judgment in this suspension of a second charge, which proceeds upon the same warrants as did the first. But these warrants stand unimpeached; and the Court have expressly found, by a previous interlocutor, that the first suspension was not intended to affect the warrants of the charge at all. It has farther to be kept in view that prior to giving the new charge the respondents had unqualifiedly withdrawn and passed from the first, except in so far as it might be founded on and referred to in determining the matter of expenses of the first suspension.

I am of opinion that in these circumstances the second charge was and is quite competent, and that there is no good reason why it should be suspended. The cases cited in support of the opposite view appear all to have turned on the plea of lis alibi pendens, but here, where the first charge was distinctly withdrawn as a charge before the second was given, there is no room for the plea of lis alibi pendens. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that it would be very like a frustration or needless obstruction of justice were we now to pass this note of suspension, especially as it is offered without caution. The fact that the complainer is, as was stated by his counsel, unable to find caution, is a reason of itself why the chargers should lose no time in taking what steps they can to recover their debt.

I am very clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—The complainer's objection here is that there is a previous charge still insisted in to a certain extent, that is, to the effect of deciding the question of expenses, and he maintains that so long as this question of expenses is not finally decided no new charge can be given. I do not think that this objection is well founded. The objection is very technical, for the first charge itself has been abandoned unconditionally. Nothing whatever can now follow upon it, and it cannot be said that there are two inconsistent charges, the validity of both of which is maintained. It can only be said that the question

[1] Before the reclaiming note came before the Inner-House, the Lord Ordinary (Young) had pronounced an interlocutor in the reduction of the messenger's execution of the first charge giving decree of reduction in favour of the pursuer. It was intimated that a reclaiming note against his judgment was in course of being presented.

Authorities cited—Wilkie v. Yeaman, Jan. 24, 1828, 6 S. 421; M'Aulay v. Brown, Feb. 16, 1833, 11 S. 411, 5 Scot. Jur. 249; Beattie v. Stodart, March 9, 1838, 16 S. 906, 10 Scot. Jur. 347; M'Lennan v. Dewar and Orr, Dec. 23, 1843, 6 D. 353; Aitken v. Dick, July 7, 1863, 1 Macph. 1038, 35 Scot. Jur. 596.

No. 32.
Nov. 27, 1875.
Clark v. Hamilton and Lee.

of expenses in the first suspension still remains to be decided. I think it would be far too technical to hold that merely because the question of expenses in the first suspension has not been finally disposed of therefore a second charge cannot proceed. The first suspension stands refused so far as regards the grounds and warrants of the charge, in respect that no relevant ground affecting them had been stated, and after that, and the voluntary withdrawal of the charge by the chargers, I can see no objection to the second charge.

I can, indeed, imagine a case where there would be real lis alibi pendens, when the question raised under the first suspension, and undecided, would come up again as an objection to the second charge. In such a case an abandonment of the first charge, without the first suspension being disposed of, might not warrant a second charge. But that is not the case we have before us. The question who shall pay expenses in the first suspension has really no bearing whatever on the question whether the complainer is or is not bound to pay his admitted and constituted debt.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The original charge in this case was challenged on the ground that the messenger's execution bore to be dated on a day which had not then and has not even yet arrived. After hearing parties on that question we allowed the suspension to stand over till a reduction was brought calling the messenger. It was unfortunate that we should have been compelled to take that course when the charge itself was not to be insisted in. But as the matter of expenses remained to be decided we had no alternative.

We have now another charge on the same warrant, and another suspension of this second charge on the ground that the first suspension is still undisposed of. Matters are certainly not in a satisfactory position. My doubt is whether a charge can be said to be abandoned so long as it is insisted in to any effect whatever. The respondents refuse to pay the expenses of the first suspension though they have abandoned the charge as a charge. The suspension is therefore still in Court, and the charge insisted in to the effect of opposing decree for expenses.

I have great doubt upon the authorities whether it is competent to give a new charge while a suspension of a former charge on the same grounds and warrants is still undisposed of, but there has been too much procedure already in this matter, and I am prepared to acquiesce in the view of your Lordships.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"In respect the suspender does not offer caution, refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of: Find the suspender liable in additional expenses," &c.

JOHN MACMILLAN, S.S.C.—D. & W. SHIRESS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 33.
Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

THE NORTH BRITITH RAILWAY COMPANY, Suspenders.—D.-F. Watson—Balfour—Strachan.

DAVID SALMOND LINDSAY, Respondent.—Fraser—J. P. B. Robertson.

Railway—Lease—Right of Tenant to Compensation—Possession.—Notice by a railway company of their intention to take under their statutory powers a portion of a farm was served upon the agents of the proprietor about one o'clock on the day on which the landlord signed a lease of the farm (previously signed by the tenant), with entry at the ensuing term. There was no evidence as to the hour at which the landlord signed the lease. Held that a claim by the tenant against the railway company for compensation for loss of tenant's profits was excluded, upon the ground that he had failed to prove that there was a completed personal contract of lease between him and his landlord at the time when the notice to take was served, and that it was therefore unnecessary to determine whether possession under the lease was necessary to entitle the tenant to compensation.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

Assignatus utitur jure auctoris.—Observations (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) on the doctrine of tantum et tale and the nature of the right acquired by a company taking lands under statutory powers.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

MR D. S. LINDSAY was tenant of the farm of Wormit in Fife under a lease for nineteen years from Martinmas 1873, entered into between him and the proprietor, the late Mr Wedderburn of Wedderburn and Birkhill, bearing to be subscribed by Mr Lindsay on 10th and by Mr Wedderburn on 12th July 1873.

On 12th July 1873 the North British Railway Company served a notice upon Mr Wedderburn's agents, Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, Dundee, of their intention to take, for the purposes of their railway, 16·388 acres of the farm of Wormit.

On 1st August 1873 the railway company, whose compulsory powers expired on that day, served a similar notice upon Mr Lindsay, but under protest that they did not recognise any claim on the part of Mr Lindsay to compensation.

The company took possession of the said 16·388 acres on 3d October 1873, and Mr Lindsay entered upon possession of the remainder of the farm at the term of Martinmas 1873.

On 20th January 1875 Mr Lindsay served a notice upon the company claiming compensation as tenant of the farm in respect of being deprived of the crops on the ground taken by the company, and subsequently signified his desire to have his claim settled by arbitration, and named an arbiter to act on his behalf.

The company nominated an arbiter, but under a protest in similar terms to that contained in their original notice to Lindsay, and upon the 3d February 1875 they presented this note of suspension and interdict against Lindsay and the arbiters to stay proceedings in the arbitration.

The complainers averred that Lindsay's lease was not executed by the landlord and delivered when their notice to take was served upon the landlord's agents, and they alleged further, that, assuming the lease to have been executed and delivered before that date, both Lindsay and the landlord were aware, prior to the execution of the lease, that the complainers required, and were ready to take the land, and they averred that the landlord's agents, Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, had purposely delayed answering a letter from the complainers' solicitor, Mr Adam Johnstone, dated 7th July 1873, asking them if they would accept service of the notice to take on behalf of the landlord, to enable Lindsay to rear up a claim to compensation by getting his lease executed before the notice was served.

They pleaded;—1. The complainers are entitled to have suspension and interdict as craved, in respect that the respondent, Mr Lindsay, had not, and has not, any right or interest entitling him to compensation in connection with the land in question, either under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, or otherwise—(1) he not having been the tenant in possession of the said lands either at the time when the complainers' notice to take the same was served, or at the time when the complainers entered into possession; and (2) his lease not having been

No. 33.
Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

executed by the landlord and delivered when the complainers' notice to take was served. 2. Separatim, Assuming the said lease to have been executed and delivered when the complainers' notice was served, the respondent, Mr Lindsay, is not entitled to compensation, in respect that both he and the landlord were aware, prior to the execution of the lease, that the complainers required and were ready to take the said land, and that the delay in answering Mr Johnstone's said letter of 7th July was in mala fide, to enable the said respondent to rear up a claim by getting his lease executed before the complainers' notice should be served.

Mr Lindsay denied the averments of the complainers, and pleaded, inter alia;—2. The complainers having taken the specified portions of the said farm, the respondent, in virtue of the said lease, has right to compensation as claimed from the complainers, and he is entitled to proceed to arbitration in terms of the statutes. 3. There having been, at and prior to the notice of the complainers' intention to take the ground, a concluded contract for a lease of the said farm for a full rent in favour of the respondent, he is entitled to insist in his claim for compensation.

The Lord Ordinary passed the note of suspension and interdict, and allowed a proof, from which the following facts appeared:—

The North British Railway Company were by the Tay Bridge and Railways Act, 1870, authorised to construct a bridge across the Tay with connecting railways, the southern end of the bridge being on the farm of Wormit, of which the late John Blair was then tenant under a lease for nineteen years from Martinmas 1863.

In May 1871 the company served upon Mr Wedderburn as proprietor, and Mr Blair as tenant, notices of their intention to take 1·540 acres of the farm. They afterwards entered into possession of the land, and settled the tenant's claim to compensation, but as more land was expected to be taken, the settlement of the proprietor's claim was by arrangement postponed in order that the whole claims might be settled together.

Mr Blair died in 1872, and his trustees, although desirous of renouncing the lease, were informed by the landlord that no renunciation would be accepted unless and until a suitable incoming tenant could be found. The trustees accordingly executed provisionally a renunciation of the lease to take effect at Martinmas 1872, if then accepted by the landlord, or at any subsequent date at which the same should be accepted.

The farm was thereafter repeatedly advertised to be let, but great difficulty was experienced in getting a suitable tenant. Among the offerers were Mr Lindsay, and a Mr Stewart, and during the months of May and June 1873 negotiations were being carried on with both by Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, the landlord's agents.

It was known that the North British Railway would probably take some part of the land, for which they had obtained statutory powers, but it was uncertain how much would be taken, or at what date the land would be required. A circular addressed by Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane to offerers for the farm contained the following conditions:—"3. There is land required by the same railway company for the line leading from the bridge to Leuchars, passing to the westward of the farm steading. The tenant will be entitled for this land to the full damages claimable from the company—that is, for the value of land taken, and for severance or sectional damages to all the fields passed through. . . . . 9. Until the lease be adjusted and signed there will be no binding agreement between the landlord and any offerer."

On 30th June 1873 Mr John Macfarlane, one of the partners of Kerr and Macfarlane, wrote to Mr Wedderburn that he hoped to be able to write the next day of a concluded arrangement with Lindsay.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

About that date a lease was adjusted with Mr Lindsay, extended, and sent to him for signature on 2d July 1873. Mr Lindsay, however, took some objections to the lease as extended, and, in particular, he objected that it contained no reservation of right to him to claim compensation from the railway company, in the event of their taking part of the farm, although Mr Macfarlane assured him that such a clause was unnecessary. After considerable negotiation Mr Macfarlane agreed to a declaration being added at the beginning of the testing-clause to the effect "that as respects any land which may hereafter be taken for the line of railway from Wormit to Leuchars the tenant shall be entitled to make claim against the company for whatever compensation the law may entitle him as tenant of the land."

The lease was then signed by Lindsay on 10th July, and was on the same day sent to Birkhill for execution by Mr Wedderburn, accompanied by the following letter:—"Dundee 10th July 1873.—Dear Mr Wedderburn,—It is only to day that I am in a position to write as to Wormit. We have had much trouble and anxiety in connection with it. We differed with Stewart on some details. He was bearing, or seeking to bear, too hard upon us, and we communicated with Lindsay, and the lease which is sent herewith is the result. You will see that he is to pay £345, and is to get £300 of repairs, which is an improvement on his old terms, and better than Stewart was latterly proposing. All the details of the lease have been as carefully as possible prepared, and the general terms are the best we could arrange. It will be good to have the lease signed at once, and I hope you will see nothing in it to delay this being done. . . . I remain, &c., JOHN MACFARLANE."

The lease was signed by Mr Wedderburn at Birkhill on the 12th July (Saturday). No evidence was led by either party in regard to the hour at which it was signed. Mr Wedderburn returned the lease, with a letter dated 12th July, to Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, who received the same on Monday, 14th July.

Meanwhile, on 7th July 1873, Mr Johnstone, the company's solicitor, wrote to Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, intimating his intention to serve the notice for the 16·388 acres in question, and asking them whether they desired the notices for the proprietor to be sent to them or to Birkhill. The letter was received in Dundee on 8th July.

On 10th July the company served the requisite notice on Blair's trustees as tenants in possession of the farm.

No answer was received from Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane to Mr Johnstone's letter of 7th July up to the evening of the 11th, and Mr Alexander Law, the clerk entrusted with the duty of serving the notices, resolved to go to Fife the following day and serve the notices at Birkhill. On his way to the train on the morning of the 12th he received a letter from Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane to Mr Johnstone, dated 11th July, intimating "that they would be happy to hold as served any notice for Mr Wedderburn." Law proceeded to Dundee, and reached Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane's office about one o'clock.

Law's evidence as to what passed was as follows:—"On arriving in Dundee I immediately went to Kerr and Macfarlane's office, saw Mr Macfarlane, and handed the notice to him. Mr Macfarlane asked if I had served a notice for the same extent of land on Blair's trustees. I said we had. 'Because,' he said, 'they have renounced their lease in favour of the landlord,' which was to take place at Martinmas first. He also said he had relet the farm to a new tenant for nineteen years from Martinmas. I said to him, I presumed he had reserved from the lease the remaining land required for the railway. He said he had not, and that he would not obtain a suitable tenant with such a reservation, and that he must let the farm as a whole, and allow the tenant to treat with the company. I told him I did not think the railway company would recognise the claim of the new tenant, but that I would consult with Mr Johnstone. He then said—'If you don't recognise this new tenant we will get Blair's trustees to assign what remained of Blair's lease to the new tenant.' That was the first time I had been made aware of any change in the tenancy, for up to that time I understood that Blair's trustees were the tenants, and had dealt with them as such."

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875. North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

Neither Mr Law nor Mr Macfarlane were specially asked whether the latter gave the information as to the new lease before or after the notice was put into his hand.*

Law reported the conversation to Mr Johnstone, who acted upon it by serving notice upon Lindsay as tenant, as before-mentioned, under protest.

The notice for Mr Wedderburn was not formally accepted by Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane on 12th July, but they sent a written acceptance of service to Mr Johnstone on 15th July 1873 in reply to a letter from him asking them to do so, dated 13th July.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the reasons of suspension: Recalls the interim interdict: Refuses the suspension, and decerns: Finds the complainers liable in expenses," &c.†

* The statement of the complainers upon record, which was admitted by the respondent, was—(Cond. 6) "The company accordingly served upon Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane at their office in Dundee, on the following day (July 12, 1873), a notice, addressed to Mr Wedderburn, of the company's intention to purchase and take 16 acres and 388 decimal parts of an acre of land forming parts of the said farm. When the said notice was so delivered the person who delivered it on behalf of the company was informed by Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane that Mr John Blair's trustees (Mr Blair having died sometime in the autumn of 1872) had executed a renunciation of their rights under the lease above-mentioned to and in favour of Mr Wedderburn, the proprietor, to take effect at the term of Martinmas 1873, and that the farm had been relet for nineteen years from that term to Mr David Salmond Lindsay."

† Note.—(After a narrative of the facts)—"The first plea in law for the complainers raises a novel and important question under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. In the first branch of that plea the complainers maintain that the arbitration should not be allowed to go on, in respect that Mr Lindsay had not and has not any right or interest entitling him to compensation, 'he not having been the tenant in possession of the said lands, either at the time when the complainers' notice to take the same was served, or at the time when the complainers entered into possession.' If the complainers had been voluntary purchasers who had bought the property after the date of the lease, but before the tenant entered into possession, the general rule under which such a lease is held not to be binding upon a singular successor might have been applicable. But it has never yet been decided, and apparently the question has never yet been raised, whether a public company, taking land compulsorily under their own private Act and the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, is in the same position with regard to leases as a voluntary purchaser. Mr Deas, in his valuable treatise on the Law of Railways, says, 'It is thought that to entitle a tenant to compensation possession must have taken place upon the lease before the date of the company's notice.' With great deference, however, to an opinion so justly entitled to weight as that of Mr Deas, I am inclined to think that it is not quite clear that under the clauses of the statutes which deal with lands subject to leases (secs. 112 to 115), possession is required as a title to compensation in the case of a tenant for a term of years unexpired, or in the case of any tenant, except one for a year or less. In the view, however, which I take of the facts of the case it is not necessary to decide this question, because the general rule as to the necessity of possession does not hold in the case of a

The railway company reclaimed. No. 33.

Argued for them;—(1) Service upon the landlord of the notice to take

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

singular successor who, at the time of his purchase, is made aware of the existence of a lease which, though executed, has not been followed by possession—(Richards v. Lindsay, M. 15,217). Now, in the present case, the complainers were made aware, at or before the time when the notices were served—i.e., when the contract of sale was concluded between them and the proprietor—that the old lease had been renounced, and that the farm had been let on a new nineteen years' lease to the present respondent. The first branch, therefore, of the complainers' first plea in law is untenable, and must be repelled.

"The second branch of that plea is to the effect that the respondent's claim for compensation is bad, because the lease had not been executed by the landlord, and delivered when the notices were served. The evidence shews that the lease was executed by the tenant on the 10th and by the landlord on the 12th July, on which day the notices were served, and that both parties considered it a binding lease. It does not appear to have been executed in duplicate; and, as is generally the case, the deed remained in the hands of the landlord or his agents for behoof of both parties. This plea also is, in my opinion, untenable, and must be repelled.

"It is necessary now to notice the second plea in law for the complainers, to the effect that they were prevented from serving the notices before the execution of the lease through the mala fides of the proprietor's agents. In the record, throughout the proof, and at the debate, the complainers maintained strenuously that Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane acted in mala fide in reference to the notices, inasmuch as, having been informed by Mr Johnstone's letter of 7th July that the complainers were about to serve the notices for the land required by them from Mr Wedderburn, whereby the company would become the purchasers of the land, these agents, in bad faith, delayed answering that letter, for the purpose and with the effect of having the new lease to Lindsay completed and executed before the notices could be served, and of enabling Lindsay to make a claim for tenant's profits to which he would not otherwise have been entitled. This plea, of course, assumes that the completion of the lease before the notices would entitle Lindsay to make such a claim without possession having followed upon the lease. Now, it may be that Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, seeing that the company, after two years' delay, were now proceeding in earnest with the notices, may have pressed on the completion of the lease, but I do not see that they can be charged with bad faith to the company in doing so. It may have been uncourteous in them to delay answering Mr Johnstone's letter of the 7th July, but I do not think it was dishonest. The matter of the lease had long been the subject of negotiation with Lindsay, and Mr Wedderburn was in bad health at the time, and it was desirable to have the farm let to a suitable tenant, so as to relieve Blair's trustees from farther connection with the farm: And the lease would have been signed on 2d July, several days before the date of Mr Johnstone's letter, had not the tenant unexpectedly raised some objection to the terms of the document.

"But even if the landlord's agents had improperly taken advantage of the delay which they thus caused in the service of the notices, I do not see how Mr Lindsay, the tenant, can be thereby affected. Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane were not his agents. He knew nothing about the contemplated service of the notices; he was not taking any advantage of the railway company, nor was he unduly hastening the execution of the lease. On the contrary, he delayed the execution for several days, because the terms of the lease, as prepared by the landlord's agents, were, in his opinion, insufficient. And the complainers do not accuse him of any bad faith in the matter. On this branch of the case I am of opinion that the complainers' allegations of mala fides are unfounded, and that, even if well founded, they are not relevant as in a question with Lindsay, the respondent.

"On the whole matter, therefore, my opinion is that the suspension must be refused, and that the arbitration must be allowed to proceed."

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875. North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

constituted a completed contract of sale. Possession, therefore, at the date of the service of the notice was requisite to give the tenant a title to compensation.[1] (2) There was no intimation to the railway company of the existence of Lindsay's lease before the notice was served. It had not even been proved that Mr Macfarlane gave the information to the clerk before the notice was handed to him, and in any view intimation to a clerk charged with the specific duty of serving the notice could not be held to bring home knowledge of the lease to the company. (3) Even if the company had notice of the lease, it was intimation of a mere personal contract, which they knew was ineffectual against a singular successor, and were therefore entitled to disregard. The case of Richards v. Lindsay relied on by the Lord Ordinary related to the prorogation of a tack, and its authority had been questioned.[2] (4) It had not been proved that even the personal contract of lease was executed before the service of the notice. The company had proved the hour at which their notice was served, and it lay upon Mr Lindsay to prove that the lease upon which his claim rested had been previously signed by the landlord. After the service of the notice the landlord could create no new right against the railway company.[3] (5) The conduct of the landlord's agents in delaying to answer Mr Johnstone's letter disentitled Mr Lindsay to plead equity.

Argued for Mr Lindsay;—The railway company were not entitled to assume that the rights and interests which they were bound to compensate were limited to those which were good against a voluntary purchaser. In the ordinary case the right of a tenant was to hold possession against the singular successor. In the case of a railway company the tenant's right was limited to a claim for compensation. It was thus to be expected that the class of persons entitled to the more limited right should be larger than the class entitled to the more extensive right. This view was borne out by the words of the 17th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act,[4] which shewed that all "interests," a very wide word, were to be compensated. The obligation imposed upon the promoters to make "diligent inquiry" was entirely inconsistent with the notion that the only rights with which they had to deal were those patent on the face of records, or, in the case of leasehold rights, made public by possession. In short, a railway company was not in the position of an onerous disponee of a special subject, but rather in the position of a trustee in bankruptcy, or an adjudger, who (notwithstanding some old decisions to a contrary effect), it was now settled, took the right tantum et tale as it stood in his author.[5] In other words, a [1] Statute 1449, c. 17 (18 in Glendook); Stair, i. 15, 4, iii. 2, 6; Erskine, ii. 6, 23-25; Bell on Leases, vol. i., pp. 52, &c.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, vol. i. pp. 440, &c., also pp. 472, &c., and cases there cited; Deas, Law of Railways, p. 161.

[2] Lord Cranston's Creditors v. Scott, Jan. 4, 1757, M. 15,218; Douglas' Creditors v. Carlyles, July 2, 1757, M. 15,219.

[3] City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. M'Ewen and Co., March 18, 1870, 8 Macph. 747, 42 Scot. Jur. 385.

[4] 8 Vict. c. 19, sec. 17.—"When the promoters of the undertaking shall require to purchase any of the lands which by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, they are authorised to purchase or take, they shall give notice thereof to all the parties interested in such lands, or to the parties enabled by this or the special Act to sell and convey the same, or their rights and interests therein, or such of the said parties as shall, after diligent inquiry, be known to the promoters of the undertaking; . . . ."

[5] Fleeming v. Howden, July 16, 1868, 6 Macph., H. L. 113, 40 Scot. Jur. 616, L. R., 1 Sc. App. 368.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

railway took the land, subject to all equities pleadable against the landlord.[1] (2) Moreover, the service of the notice to take did not by itself constitute a completed contract of sale,[2] unless followed by farther procedure. (3) There was here knowledge on the part of the railway company of the existence of Mr Lindsay's lease, which, even assuming them to be in the position of a voluntary purchaser, disentitled them from pleading want of possession under the lease. It was said that it had not been cleared up whether Mr Macfarlane intimated that the farm had been let before or after the notice had been put into his hands. But this was of little consequence. It must be remembered that the company did not serve the notice in the way prescribed by the statute. According to the 18th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act the notice must be served personally upon the owner of the lands to be taken, and it was only when he was out of the kingdom or could not be found that service upon his agent was allowed as an equivalent. Mr Macfarlane would have been perfectly entitled to have said to the clerk who served the notice that if the company did not agree to recognise the existence of Lindsay's lease he would do nothing to prejudice any rights, and to have insisted upon the notice being served on the landlord personally; and this was in substance what Mr Macfarlane did. (4) There was no presumption in favour of the railway company that their notice was served before the lease was signed by Mr Wedderburn. Even if the signature was later than the service of the notice they were not entitled to take advantage of this circumstance, inasmuch as acceptance of service by Mr Macfarlane was qualified by his intimation of the lease. (5) The contract of lease was complete and binding upon the landlord and tenant from the moment of the landlord's signature. Being a mutual deed the lease required no delivery. (6) There was no mala fides on the part of the landlord's agents, and in any view Mr Lindsay, a party to a highly onerous contract, could not be held to be responsible for their conduct.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a suspension brought at the instance of the North British Railway Company of certain proceedings taken by the respondent for the purpose of having an alleged claim of compensation settled by arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act. The land in respect of which compensation is claimed by the respondent consists of sixteen acres of the farm of Wormit, belonging to Mr Wedderburn of Wedderburn, of which farm the respondent is the tenant; and the interest on which he claims is founded on a lease of the farm bearing date the 12th of July 1873, with possession at the Martinmas following. It is alleged for the suspenders that this lease gives the respondent no interest under the statute to demand compensation, because their notice to take the land was given on the 12th of July 1873, and the lease in question not having been followed by possession at that date, is not available against the suspenders, who are singular successors.

The respondent pleads in reply,—1st, That the complainers having had notice

---

[1] Carter v. Great Eastern Railway Co., April 25, 1863, 9 (English) Jurist, N. S. 618, 8 Law Times, N. S., 197; Rex v. Hungerford Market Co., 1832, 4 Barn. and Ad. 596; Bogg v. Midland Railway Co., 36 L. J., N. S. Chan. p. 440; Sweetman v. Metropolitan Railway Co., Jan. 13, 1864, 1 Hem. and Mil. 543.

[2] Richmond v. North London Railway Co., Feb. 8, 1858, L. R., 5 Eq. 352 (per Lord Romilly, M. R. p. 358), aff. July 15, 1868, L. R., 3 Chan. App. p. 679; Haynes v. Haynes, March 23, 1861, 30 L. J., N. S. Chan. p. 578.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875. North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

of the lease before the completion of their right it is effectual against them without possession; and, 2dly, he maintains that a railway company taking land under their compulsory powers are not singular successors, and acquire no higher right than a trustee under the bankrupt statute, who takes tantum et tale, as the bankrupt held the lands.

I am not moved by either of these considerations. It is no doubt true that no one is entitled to grant double conveyances of the same subject to two different disponees, and that if the second disponee accepts the conveyance in the knowledge of the first conveyance his right is liable to be set aside, although it may have been the first completed. But whether a purchaser under a title entirely unchallengeable, or even an adjudger or inhibiting creditor, is bound to give effect to inchoate or incomplete rights, in respect of previous knowledge of their existence, is a very different question. As in the present case, however, it would rather appear that the complainers had not, and could not have had notice of this contract, as I shall afterwards explain, it is not necessary to pursue this question farther.

As regards the contention so strongly urged from the bar, founded on the doctrine of tantum et tale, I think the argument involved some misapprehension as to the past history and present position of this branch of the law. It seemed to be assumed, quite erroneously as I think, that our modern jurisprudence gives greater effect to latent equities in the transmission of land than our older law. But this is not so. Until the case of Redfearn,[1] decided in the House of Lords in 1813, the rule assignatus utitur jure cedentis was very largely applied. In that case, in which it was for the first time found that a special assignee was not bound by a latent trust which qualified the right of his cedent, it was conceded that the previous rule of the law of Scotland was otherwise, and the judgment proceeded on views of expediency which prevailed in the law of England. The short report of the import of the judgment in the case of Gordon v. Cheyne (2 Shaw, p. 675) brings this out very clearly. It represents the Court as holding "that the general rules of law, founded on by Gordon, embraced purchasers and general assignees prior to the case of Redfearn, but that on proper views of equity and expediency the House of Lords had found that they could not be subject to latent equities," and (with the exception of Lord Gillies) as holding "that the principle of that decision could not apply to the case of a general body of creditors under a sequestration, who took the rights of the bankrupt tantum et tale as they stood in his person." The case of Fleeming v. Howden proceeded on this ground, and Lord Colonsay was careful to guard the judgment as far as related to the diligence of individual creditors, as to which he entirely reserved his opinion. Whatever, therefore, may be the authority of the older decisions in which the Court preferred a compriser to a tenant under a tack without possession,[2] they were pronounced at a period of the law when the Court gave more weight to latent equities than could be extended to them now. But we have here a very different case to deal with. It would be difficult to reduce the title of the complainers below that of a special assignee. But while I could not follow Mr Fraser to the point at which he wished us to arrive, I so far agree with him as to think that the position of a statutory company, taking land under their compulsory powers, is not that of a

[1] Redfearn v. Sommervails, June 1, 1813, 5 Pat. 707.

[2] See cases cited in Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, vol. i. 442, and vol. ii. 539.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

voluntary purchaser in all respects. On one hand, the title they acquire is not subject to be qualified by equities of any kind, latent or patent, as far as regards their right to and possession of the land acquired. Their right and use is only qualified by the purposes of their undertaking, and they cannot be impeded in so applying it. There can be no question as to good faith in its acquisition, for the seller has no choice in the matter, and the purchaser, within the limits assigned to him, may buy when he pleases. The fee itself is transferred, and the value of the subject and all the rights affecting it are merged in a general obligation on the part of the purchaser to make full compensation to those having an interest in the lands. But, on the other hand, the obligation on the purchaser is one of compensation or indemnity, and the right to demand it arises entirely from the provisions of the statute, and must be determined by them. It does not follow that the interests affected by the exercise of powers of compulsory purchase must necessarily be those which would affect a voluntary purchaser under a contract in which the seller may make what conditions he thinks fit. I say no more on this head, excepting that this seems to me a very large and important question, and that if the case depended on it I should have desired an opportunity of considering it very deliberately, as I think it deserves more thorough investigation than it has hitherto received.

Before, however, we can reach this question, there are two prejudicial points to be determined. First, was there a completed contract of lease when the complainers gave their notice? and secondly, if there was not, could a contract completed after that date affect the complainers' rights and obligations?

As to the first of these questions, in order to its solution it is necessary to attend in some detail to the history of this matter. In 1871 a person of the name of Blair was tenant of these lands, under a lease which at that time had eleven or twelve years to run. The railway company gave notice to take 1·540 acres of the farm, and settled the tenant's compensation at that time. In June 1873 more land was required. Mr Blair had died previously, and Mr Wedderburn, the proprietor, was in negotiation with his trustees for a renunciation of the current lease, and with the respondent for a new lease for nineteen years from Martinmas 1873. The compulsory powers of the railway expired on the 1st of August 1873. On the 7th of July Mr Law, who is a clerk to the solicitor of the North British Railway Company, wrote a letter to Kerr and Macfarlane, who had acted as Mr Wedderburn's agents in Dundee, asking to know if they would accept service of the statutory notice on behalf of the railway company. From some cause, which has not been satisfactorily explained to my mind, this letter was not answered by Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane until the 11th, a delay all the more to be regretted from its bearing on the negotiations then in progress with the new tenant. Mr Law, not having received an answer, resolved to go personally to Dundee on the 12th, and did go, although the answer arrived that morning. He arrived at Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane's office, and served the notice, he says, before one o'clock. Mr Macfarlane says that he reached the office about two o'clock, which may be assumed as the latest date on which the notice was served.

Meantime the negotiation for a lease of the farm stood thus: In the month of November 1872 the landlord had issued a general circular to offerers, stating the terms and conditions on which the farm would be let. Those conditions contain some clauses of importance. The second, third, and fourth articles of the conditions refer to land taken or to be taken by the railway, and to the tenant's interest therein; and the ninth condition is, "until the lease be adjusted

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

and signed there will be no binding agreement between the landlord and any offerer." In the month of May 1873 the respondent went over the farm, and on the 13th of May he wrote asking whether the damages done by the railway are to be compensated to the incoming tenant. Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane answered that the claims would remain with the landlord, a reply which brought from the respondent an offer for the farm, dated 31st May 1873, "stipulating that all compensation for damages caused by forming the new line of railway on the farm will be left in the hands of the tenant." This offer was not at once accepted, and the negotiations go on until as late as the 10th of July, when Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane wrote to Mr Wedderburn in the following terms: —"It is only to-day that I am in a position to write as to Wormit. We have had much trouble and anxiety in connection with it. We differed with Stewart on some details. He was bearing or seeking to bear too hard upon us, and we communicated with Lindsay, and the lease which is sent herewith is the result. You will see that he is to pay £345, and is to get £300 of repairs, which is an improvement on his own terms, and better than Stewart was latterly proposing." It is therefore certain that until Mr Wedderburn received the letter of the 10th of July there not only was no concluded bargain with the respondent, but it was doubtful whether Stewart might not have been preferred.

The extended lease was returned, signed by Mr Wedderburn, along with a letter bearing date on Saturday the 12th, and received on Monday the 14th of July. In these circumstances, the question is whether there was any concluded bargain prior to the notice. I am very clearly of opinion that no such bargain has been proved. There is and can be no presumption whatever that the lease was signed before the service of the notice on the 12th of July, the date of which is fixed; and the presumption rather is, when one date is fixed and the other left uncertain, the uncertainty must fall on the party who has failed to render it certain. I think it right to observe, also, that when Mr Macfarlane wrote to Mr Wedderburn on the 10th, and when Mr Wedderburn signed the lease on the 12th, Mr Macfarlane was perfectly aware that these lands never could be the subject of the lease, because he (Mr Macfarlane) had notice on the 8th that the remaining lands scheduled were to be taken forthwith by the railway company, and that the only effect of the lease, as regarded this part of the farm, was to attempt to constitute a claim of compensation for lands which never could come into the possession of the tenant.

I am, therefore, of opinion that on the facts it is not proved that when the notice in question was served there was any concluded agreement between the respondent and Mr Wedderburn.

The only remaining question, therefore, is, what is the effect of an agreement concluded after the date of the notice, and this raises the question as to the legal effect of a notice to treat for lands to be taken compulsorily.

It has been usual to describe the nature of such a notice, by saying that the Act of Parliament empowering the company to take the land compulsorily is equivalent to an offer to sell, and that the notice is the acceptance of that offer on the part of the purchaser. Perhaps this formula may be somewhat too absolute for the real relation of the parties, for if after the notice the company do not follow it up by proceeding to take possession, and to settle the compensation to be paid under the statute, I am not prepared to say that the proprietor may not proceed in the administration of his estate as before, and create rights in the course of that administration which the company may ultimately be obliged to respect. If the company had not proceeded to take possession and had allowed the respondent to enter to the lands at Martinmas, 1873, the case might have assumed a different aspect. I think, however, it admits of no doubt that the notice to take the land constitutes a completed contract to this effect, that neither party is entitled to resile, and that either party is entitled to enforce it; and that no right can be created by the seller to the prejudice of the purchaser after the date of the notice, unless with the consent or tacit acquiescence of the purchaser. I do not doubt that the effect of such a notice may be entirely obliterated by the inaction of the company which gives it. But we have no such case here. The company proceeded immediately to take the necessary steps under their contract and took possession of the sixteen acres on the 3d of October, after consigning in bank sums to meet the claims of Mr Wedderburn and the former tenant. I am of opinion, therefore, that the whole case fails on the fact, and that the questions of law which have been argued do not arise.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875. North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The respondent, Mr Lindsay, on the assumption that he was entitled to compensation from the defenders for about sixteen acres of the farm of Wormit, which he said he held under lease from the proprietor, Mr Wedderburn, made a claim for the same upon the suspenders, on the ground that they had taken these sixteen acres for the purposes of their railway. The suspenders in consequence of the claim so made, and to prevent their being foreclosed as to its amount, adopted, provisionally and under protest, the proceedings necessary under the Lands Clauses Act for having its amount ascertained. They, however, at the same time, presented the present suspension and interdict, in which they maintain that these proceedings ought to be suspended and interdicted as being, in the circumstances, unnecessary, in respect that, as the respondent had no lease and was not in possession of the lands when they were taken, he is not entitled to any compensation. That the course thus adopted by the railway company is a perfectly competent one has not been, and could not well be, disputed.

On the other hand, and in answer to the suspension and interdict, Mr Lindsay, the respondent, has produced a lease bearing to have been granted on the 12th of July 1873, the day the notice to take the lands by the suspenders was served on the landlord's agents; and the respondent avers and maintains that the lease had been duly executed, not only on the same day, but in point of time before the notice was served. And the respondent also maintains and avers that although he was not then in possession of the farm, or any part of it, his entry to it not being till Martinmas thereafter, the suspenders had been made aware of the lease before their notice was served, and are, therefore, bound to compensate him as tenant of the lands taken by them.

The parties having been allowed and having adduced a proof in support of their respective averments, the Lord Ordinary, on advising that proof, has decided in favour of the respondent, and the Court has now to dispose of a reclaiming note at the instance of the suspenders against that judgment.

It is obvious that the leading, if not the only question for the determination of the Court now, is, whether the lease founded on by the respondent had been duly completed, and existed at or before the time when the suspenders' notice to take the lands was served on the landlord or his authorised agents, for if the respondent held no completed lease at that time the suspenders cannot be burdened or affected by a lease subsequently obtained. This principle was given effect to by this Court in the case of the City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. M'Ewen and Co., 8 Macph. p. 747, (42 Scot. Jur., 385), and by the Master of the Rolls in

No. 33.
Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

England in re Marylebone (Stings Lane) Improvement Act ex parte Edwards (Law Reports, 12 Equity, p. 389), and it has been also repeatedly determined, as exemplified by the cases referred to in Mr Deas' work on railways (pp. 144-5-6), that by a notice on the proprietor to take lands the acquisition or purchase of them is effected. It is true that, as prescribed by the Lands Clauses Act, further proceedings are necessary for ascertaining and settling the price or compensation to be given for the lands so purchased or acquired, as well as other collateral matters, but their purchase or acquisition is not thereby altered. After delivery of their notice to Mr Wedderburn or his authorised agents, the suspenders, on the one hand, could not resile from their obligation to take the lands, and, on the other hand, neither was it in the power of Mr Wedderburn to deal with the lands so taken, by granting a lease of them, or otherwise burdening or affecting them. The cases referred to by Mr Deas make this very clear.

When, then, did the suspenders, the railway company, acquire the lands in question from the proprietor, Mr Wedderburn, by serving on him or his agent, in terms of the Lands Clauses Act, a notice to take them, and had the lease founded on by the respondent been previously completed in his favour? That the notice was served or delivered in Dundee to Mr Macfarlane of Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, the proprietor, Mr Wedderburn's agents, on Saturday the 12th of July 1873 at one o'clock, or, at latest, between that hour and two o'clock, by Mr Law, a clerk in the office of Mr Johnstone, the railway company's solicitor, seems on the evidence to be indisputable; and that Mr Macfarlane on the same day informed Mr Law that the respondent had obtained a lease of the farm of Wormit, is admitted by the suspenders in the 6th article of their condescendence. But the parties are at issue as to whether the lease had been executed by the proprietor before or after the lands in dispute had been taken by the suspenders' service of notice. In regard to this all-important question there can be no doubt, I think, that the onus lies on the respondent, Mr Lindsay. It is he who founds on the lease, and the existence of it prior to the service of the suspenders' notice is essential to his case. It does not, however, appear to me that Mr Lindsay has established that his lease had been duly completed prior to the service of the suspenders' notice. That it had been under consideration by him and the landlord, or their agents, is true, and that it had been sent in an extended form, with Mr Lindsay's own signature to it, by Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane to Mr Wedderburn, the landlord, for his signature, two days before the service of the suspenders' notice to take the lands, may be also true. But it is manifest from the terms of Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane's letter of 10th July,[1] sending the lease to Mr Wedderburn, that he had not previously known or approved of all its terms, and therefore he might, if he had pleased, have declined to execute it. That it was in his power to have done so is, indeed, clear from the circular,[2] subject to the terms of which the respondent must, according to the testimony of Mr Macfarlane, have offered for the lease, and which by its 9th head expressly declares that "until the lease be adjusted and signed, there will be no binding agreement between the landlord and any offerer." Mr Wedderburn, however, appears to have signed the lease and returned it to Mr Macfarlane by letter dated the 12th of July, and it also appears to have been received by Mr Macfarlane at Dundee on the 14th of that month; but at what hour on the 12th of July, whether before or after one or two o'clock, by which time the suspenders' notice had been delivered, does not appear.

[1] Quoted, p. 171.

[2] Partially quoted, p. 170.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875. North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

Nor do I think that the evidence as to what took place at the interview between Mr Law, who delivered the suspenders' notice to Mr Macfarlane, and the latter gentleman, materially affects the matter. This evidence is contained in the 6th article of the suspenders' condescendence, and in the testimony of Mr Law and Mr Macfarlane. In the article referred to of the suspenders' condescendence it is merely said "that when the said notice was delivered the person who delivered it on behalf of the company was informed by Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane that the former tenants (Blair's trustees) had executed a renunciation of the lease, and that the farm had been relet for nineteen years from Martinmas 1873 to the respondent." Mr Law, again, the person who served the suspenders' notice on 12th July, says that on arriving in Dundee he went immediately to Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane's office, saw Mr Macfarlane, and handed the notice to him; and again, "when I saw Mr Macfarlane I was told by him that the farm had been let to a new tenant. He did not give the name of the new tenant that day, and I did not ask for it." He then goes on to explain that it was not till some days afterwards that the name of the new tenant was obtained, and in this Mr Law is corroborated by the letters in process. And although Mr Macfarlane was examined as a witness after Mr Law, he does not appear to have been asked any question at all for the purpose of shewing whether his communication to Mr Law about the new tenant was made before or after the suspenders' notice had been delivered. Mr Macfarlane, indeed, could not possibly have stated to Mr Law, on the 12th of July, that the new lease had then been completed and executed by Mr Wedderburn, the landlord, for, as has been already explained, it was only sent to Mr Wedderburn for execution on the 10th, and did not come back from him executed till the 14th.

In this state of the matter it appears to me that it must be held that the notice was served before any reliable information was or could have been furnished as to the new lease or tenant; and, at any rate, that it has not been proved that the new lease had been executed by Mr Wedderburn prior to the service or delivery of the suspenders' notice. And if this be so, it is unnecessary, and would be idle, to inquire whether knowledge had reached the suspenders, prior to the service of their notice, that a lease was being executed, for, if de facto, the existence then of a duly completed lease has not been proved, there is an end of the matter.

In the view I take of the case as now explained, the question dealt with by the Lord Ordinary, whether a lease on which there has been no possession could affect the suspenders, does not arise. I must decline, therefore, to deal with that question as one which, however important in itself, could have no practical interest in the present case, and I must reserve my opinion regarding that question and the argument of the respondent in support of his view of it.

The result is, that, for the reasons I have stated, I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and suspension and interdict granted as craved. What claim (if any) the respondent may have against his landlord in respect that a portion of the farm let to him has been taken by the suspenders is not for the Court to determine in this process. But I may remark that, if the respondent should encounter any difficulty in regard to the matter, it would appear from the correspondence that it has been very much of his own creating.

LORD GIFFORD.—In this case various questions of nicety and difficulty have

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

been argued at the bar, but I have come to be of opinion that the case may be safely disposed of on the first question of fact raised between the parties, and that it is unnecessary to give any opinion on the more difficult questions of law raised by the suspenders.

The question of fact which, I think, suffices for the determination of the case is the question, whether the lease granted by Mr Wedderburn of Wedderburn and Birkhill in favour of the respondent, Mr Lindsay, was granted before or after the statutory notice served by the North British Railway Company upon Mr Wedderburn or his agents on 12th July 1873? I am of opinion, upon the evidence before us, that the contract of lease between Mr Wedderburn and Mr Lindsay was not completed until after the railway company had served the statutory notice of 12th July 1873 upon Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, Mr Wedderburn's agents, it having been previously agreed in writing that service upon them should be the same as service upon Mr Wedderburn himself.

I think it is quite fixed in law that a statutory notice under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act has the effect of a completed contract of sale between the landowner and the railway company, binding upon both parties, and from which neither party can resile without mutual consent. It is true, as argued by Mr Fraser, that in certain circumstances this contract may be departed from, or may be held as departed from by the conduct of both parties, particularly in cases of long delay of both parties to carry out or enforce the contract, but none of the cases and authorities quoted interfere in the least with the doctrine that the statutory notice when served is a completed contract from which the railway company cannot resile, and which can only be altered by the joint consent of both parties. There is no question in the present case, and there can be none, about presumed abandonment.

I think it is also well fixed in point of law, and the rule is in entire accordance with equity and common sense, that after a landlord has received the statutory notice from a railway company, purchasing from him a precise and definite piece of land, he cannot thereafter let that land to some third party. He may assign his own rights and claims for price or for compensation, but the moment the railway company's notice is served he can do no more. In particular he can then introduce or create no new rights or claims.

This principle has been recognised both in Scotland and in England—in Scotland in the case of the City of Glasgow Railway Company v. M'Ewen, 18th March 1870, 8 Macph. 747; in England in the case Marylebone Improvement Act, 1871, Law Reports, 12 Equity, 389, and other cases; but I do not think it needs authority to shew that a party who has sold his land to another, though by a mere personal contract, cannot thereafter create new burdens upon it so as to impose a higher price or greater compensation against the purchaser.

In the present case the question of priority of notice or of lease is a very narrow one. Both are dated the same day, 12th July 1873, and had there been no evidence in the case there would have been no presumption that the one was prior to the other. But when the circumstances disclosed in evidence are taken into account, I have come to the conclusion that the purchase by the railway company, by means of their statutory notice, must be held to have been completed before any right of tenancy was conferred by the landlord upon the present respondent, Mr Lindsay. No doubt it is unpleasant to have the two contracts running so close upon each other, but even this unpleasantness is somewhat removed, for I think it plain that, but for the delay in Mr Wedderburn or his

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875. North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

agents answering the letters for the railway company the statutory notice would have been sooner served. I am also of opinion that there is no real hardship against the respondent, who knew that some land was to be taken by the railway company, and who is entitled, as in right of his landlord, to make all claims of compensation which the landlord could make, so as to vindicate his rights against the landlord under his lease, but he is not entitled to found upon the lease to the effect of getting a greater compensation than the landlord, his author, would have been entitled to.

The facts bearing upon the question of priority may be very shortly stated.

It was known to the whole neighbourhood, and, in particular, to the respondent, that the North British Railway Company would require to take part of the farm of Wormit for their undertaking, although the precise extent and boundaries of the land required were not known. On 7th July 1873 the notices were ready, and the agent for the railway company wrote the agents for the landlord inquiring, on 7th July, whether they would accept service, or whether it should be made on Mr Wedderburn himself. They had previously accepted services of former notices for Mr Wedderburn. This letter was not answered till 11th July, and the answer did not reach the railway's agents till the 12th July, although it appears that, in the interval, the landlord's agents were hurrying on the proposed lease to the respondent. On 12th July 1873 a clerk acting for the railway company was sent to Dundee to serve the notices on Messrs Kerr and Macfarlane, the landlord's agents, they having consented, by their letter of 11th, to receive service. The clerk, Mr Law, proves that he served the notices on Mr Macfarlane, the landlord's agent, on Saturday the 12th July, about one o'clock. Mr Macfarlane, who received the service, says it might be two o'clock, but nothing turns on this slight discrepancy. Admittedly the notices were served between one and two o'clock on Saturday 12th July, and from that moment the purchase was completed, and the railway company were proprietors of the lands in the notice.

The lease stands thus: It was signed by the tenant, the respondent, on 10th July, but the terms were not fully adjusted then, for the tenant, before signing it, insisted upon a new clause being inserted at the end relative to the compensation due by the railway company, and to this clause, as well as to the lease itself, the landlord's assent was necessary. The lease was sent to the landlord for signature that same day (the 10th), and he subscribed sometime on Saturday the 12th. There is no evidence as to the hour of subscription, although the respondent might have called the instrumentary witnesses, who would have proved at what time of day the signature was adhibited. In the absence of all evidence I am disposed to think that the presumption is against the respondent. The railway company have done all that they can in proving the hour of their service,—the other party have not chosen to prove the hour of Mr Wedderburn's signature, although they had the means of doing so; and I do not think it unfair to hold that they abstained because they could not bring the signature to an earlier hour than the service of the notice. But probably much does not depend on the mere hour, for the signed lease remained in the landlord's power and under his control. It was sent by him to his own agent, whom it did not reach till Monday the 14th July. Now, on Monday 14th July, it was the duty of Mr Wedderburn's agent to have withheld the delivery of the lease from the tenant, excepting on the condition that the tenant took his chance of the effect of the railway company's notice. The landlord, no doubt, signed the lease in good faith, not knowing of the company's notice; but he took care to send it to his own agent, who knew before he got it that the company's notice was an impediment which prevented its completion. The landlord and his agent would have been quite entitled and were bound to tell the respondent that the notice had been served, if it were prior, and to refuse to deliver the lease except under reservation of its effects. Sometimes, indeed, a mutual contract is completed by mere signature, but this is only in cases where no impediment to the contract has arisen before actual completion.

No. 33.

Nov. 30, 1875.
North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

On the whole, therefore, although the point is a very narrow one, I am of opinion that the company's notice must be held to have been prior to the actual completion of the contract of lease. I reach this conclusion the more willingly that it is proved the landlord's agents knew the railway notices were coming, and, whether intentionally or accidentally, delayed their service. The result is that the respondent here must claim compensation only through his landlord or as in right of his landlord. He cannot found upon his lease, which is subsequent to the notice, and can give no broader right against the company than the landlord himself had.

It is said, and has been held by the Lord Ordinary, that "at or before the time when the notices were served," the railway company had been made aware of the respondent's lease. I do not think that this is proved, but the contrary. The utmost that is proved is that immediately after the notices were served,—that is, after Mr Macfarlane took them from Law's hand, he said to Law that the farm had been relet, but plainly this is not before service but after it. Besides, I do not think that Law, a mere clerk and messenger serving the notices, was the party to whom such intimation should be given; and even if Macfarlane's statement had preceded the service—that is, preceded the delivery of the notices—it would not legally have stopped service. The messenger had nothing to do but to deliver formal notices, and any statement made to him could not go beyond a mere protest or reservation of rights. Besides, Mr Macfarlane had no right to say on Saturday the 12th that the farm had been relet. The signed lease did not come back to him till Monday the 14th; and even then, if I am right in the view I have taken, it was in the landlord's power, and ought only to have been conditionally given to the tenant.

The view which I have now taken supersedes the much larger and much more important questions, whether, to enable a tenant to claim under the statutes, he must not be in possession of the lands under his lease; and whether, if the railway company obtain possession not only before the tenant does but before the tenant's term of entry under his lease arrives, they will be liable to him, as tenant, under the statutes. These questions do not seem to have been settled by any decided case, or by any authority of which I am aware, and I desire to reserve my opinion. I think the questions are attended with great difficulty.

Probably it may be proper, in the interlocutor about to be pronounced, to make it clear, that while the respondent is not entitled to go to arbitration or to claim as tenant under his lease, his whole claims as assignee, or implied assignee of his landlord, are reserved entire. The nomination of the arbiters is in general terms, and a simple suspension and interdict might possibly be held to exclude him altogether, which of course is not intended.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor complained of; sustain the reasons of suspension; suspend, prohibit, interdict, and discharge, in terms of the note of suspension and interdict: Find the reclaimers entitled to expenses," &c. No. 33. Nov. 30, 1875. North British Railway Co. v. Lindsay.

DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

DONALD BEITH, Suspender.—Fraser—Balfour—Moody Stuart. KENNETH MACKENZIE AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Asher—Hunter—Rankine. No. 34. Nov. 30, 1875. Beith v. Mackenzie.

Trust—Indefinite Payments.—Where a trustee, holding two different funds for the same beneficiary, makes indefinite payments to the beneficiary, without fixing at the time from which fund the payments come, the incidence and legal effect of the payments are not to be determined by the arbitrary choice of the trustee, but the payments must be equitably apportioned between the two funds according to legal rules, if the trustee has a balance in his hands from both, or, if not, they must be held to have been made from that fund in which he had a balance in hand at the time.

Executor—Bona fides.—Observations on the defence of bona fide payment to beneficiaries as stated by an executor against creditors who have not given notice of their claims within six months.

THIS was a suspension of a charge directed against Mr D. Beith, W.S., as sole surviving trustee under the settlement of the deceased Hugh Mackenzie of Dundonell, by Kenneth Mackenzie of Dundonell and others as trustees under the settlement of the said Hugh Mackenzie's father, Murdo Mackenzie, or as heirs in mobilibus of Murdo's widow, Mrs Christian Ross or Mackenzie. 2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

The charge was for payment of the sum of £3002, 6s. 1d. with interest, under deduction of a sum of £500, as decerned for by the Court on 2d July 1873.[1] The complainer did not dispute that this sum was due by Hugh Mackenzie's trust-estate, nor that the claim therefor was intimated to him on 4th July 1871 in the course of another inquiry referring to the same estate; but he alleged that at the said date he had no funds in his hands belonging to the trust, these having been exhausted by his payments in bona fide to the sole beneficiary, Mrs Catton, daughter of Hugh Mackenzie. An accounting was entered into, in which the accountant presented an interim report asking the Court's guidance on certain points of difficulty, and the present question arose on a discussion of this report.

The following is taken from Lord Gifford's opinion:—"The accounting with Mr Beith is rendered difficult, and in some respects perplexing, from the circumstance that Mr Beith, or rather his firm of Murray, Beith, and Murray, acted as law agents and cashiers not only for Hugh Mackenzie's trustees, of whom Mr Beith is now sole survivor, but also for the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Catton, and for Mr and Mrs Catton as individuals. Mrs Catton was the daughter and residuary legatee of Hugh Mackenzie.

"Only one cash account was kept by Messrs Murray, Beith, and Murray for all these parties, that is, for Hugh Mackenzie's trustees, for Mr and Mrs Catton's marriage-contract trustees, and for Mr and Mrs Catton as individuals, and it contains entries of the whole cash transactions relating to all these different parties. It is opened in the name of 'A. R. Catton, Esq., and Mrs Catton,' and it continues throughout under the same heading. The explanation of this is that Messrs Murray, Beith, and [1] Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, June 12, 1873, 11 Macph. 681, 45 Scot. Jur. 433.

No. 34.
Nov. 30, 1875.
Beith v. Mackenzie.

Murray were originally employed by Mr and Mrs Catton as individuals, and when they afterwards became agents for the marriage-contract trustees, and for the trustees of Hugh Mackenzie, no new cash account was opened, but all payments and receipts on account of any of the trusts or parties were entered indiscriminately, in the order of their dates, in the general account which stood in name of Mr and Mrs Catton. Still farther, the entries are made for the most part in general and indefinite terms, so that it does not appear on the face of the entries or of most of them to which account they belong. In order to ascertain this, the nature of each entry must be ascertained by a reference to the vouchers by which it is instructed, so that if separate accounts are now to be made up it really involves an inquiry into the nature of each receipt and of each payment

"But farther still, a very large number of the entries, particularly the entries of payments, are indefinite not only on the face of the account, but also on the face of the vouchers, that is, the vouchers are also indefinite, and it cannot be discovered from them from what source or on what account the payments were made. In particular, this is the case with the whole or almost the whole of the very large payments made by Messrs Murray, Beith, and Murray to or for behoof of Mr and Mrs Catton. These payments, including law accounts incurred to Messrs Murray, Beith, and Murray, amount to upwards of £4000, and it is really upon them that the whole question turns.

"From time to time Messrs Murray, Beith, and Murray made indefinite payments to Mr and Mrs Catton, amounting, previous to 4th July 1871, when the charger's claim became known, to £2257, 3s. 11d.; and the question is, from what funds shall these payments be held to have been made. On the face of the payments they are indefinite, and they may have been made to Mrs Catton or her husband, either as individuals, as beneficiaries under Hugh Mackenzie's trust, or as beneficiaries under the marriage-contract, or in two or more of these characters combined. It is not necessary to distinguish between Mr and Mrs Catton as individuals. Mr Catton acted throughout for his wife."

The Lord Ordinary found "that the complainer, as trustee acting under the settlement of the deceased Hugh Mackenzie of Dundonell, is not in possession of any trust-estate to answer the debt charged for, and that there are no grounds by reason of improper payments by him or otherwise for subjecting him in personal liability: Therefore suspends the charge," &c.

The respondents reclaimed.

On the defence, in so far as depending on bona fide payment to beneficiaries, the following observations were made by

Lord Gifford.—I think it is quite fixed in law, and the rule is in entire conformity with the plainest equity, that a trustee or trustee and executor, after reasonable time has elapsed and after reasonable inquiry has been made, is entitled and is in safety to pay away the free trust or executry funds in his hands, either to legatees for pecuniary or specific legacies, or to residuary legatees, or ultimate beneficiaries, provided he does so in bona fide and without knowledge that there are outstanding claims due by the estate, and that he will not be liable in repayment or in double payment to creditors whose claims were not intimated and not known at the time when such bona fide payment was made. The case of Stewart v. Evans[1] is a strong example of the application of this rule, for there the trustee was held free and justified in having parted with the estate

[1] June 9, 1871, 9 Macph. p. 810.

No. 34.
Nov. 30, 1875.
Beith v. Mackenzie.

although he knew of the claim, because he believed it to be effectually discharged by a deed which, however, was afterwards found to be null in law. It seems to follow a fortiori that the trustee would have been free if he had never known of the claim at all. The principle is recognised in other cases, and indeed on no other footing would a trustee ever be safe to wind up a trust and part with the trust-funds until perhaps the lapse of forty years—the long prescription. After six months, and in a question with creditors, the trustee or executor may pay in bona fide primo venienti, that is, he may pay off in full the creditors who have appeared, without being answerable to creditors who may afterwards turn up; and so after six months, and after due and reasonable inquiry, he will be quite in safety to pay the free residue to legatees or beneficiaries, and if after that creditors for the first time come forward, they must look for payment not to the trustee who has honestly and in good faith handed over the funds to the beneficiaries, but only to the beneficiaries or legatees who have actually received the funds themselves. . . .

(His Lordship then referred to the accounting as in the narrative quoted above) —Now, in reference to all these indefinite payments, and to other payments in a similar position, which appear in the combined or general current account, the suspender, Mr Beith, after the present question arose, claimed right to remodel the accounts and to impute these indefinite payments as payments out of Hugh Mackenzie's trust-estate, none of them or few of them being admitted to be payments out of the marriage-contract trust-funds or payments on the individual credit of Mr and Mrs Catton. In this way, in the account of charge and discharge now founded on by Mr Beith, he shews a very large balance—upwards of £3000—due by Hugh Mackenzie's trust, while, on the other hand, there is a sum nearly of the same amount due by the firm to the marriage-contract trustees.

Now, I am of opinion that no such remodelling of the accounts is now permissible. The suspender cannot now impute payments which at the time were indefinite to one account more than to another. These indefinite payments must now be imputed and their incidence and legal effect must be determined in terms of law and in conformity with legal rules, and not according to the will or choice of the complainer or his firm. In particular, I am of opinion that the suspender cannot now be allowed to say, "I made these indefinite payments to Mr and Mrs Catton solely as beneficiaries under Hugh Mackenzie's trust, while at the same time I was retaining and accumulating for their behoof the whole income which was arising under the marriage-contract trust, to which income Mrs Catton was undoubtedly from time to time entitled." This is the practical result of the suspender's claim to remodel the accounts, and I think the claim and its results are quite inadmissible.

On the other hand, it seems to me equally clear that the respondents are not entitled to insist that these indefinite payments must have been made solely on account of the marriage-contract funds, the result of which would be to make Messrs Murray, Beith, and Murray advance, as on marriage-contract trust-account, sums greatly larger than they ever received on that account, and this in order to make them debtors under Hugh Mackenzie's trust.

The equitable rule seems to be that where a cashier or trustee holds two different funds for the same beneficiary and makes indefinite payments to the beneficiary without fixing at the time from which fund the payments come, then these indefinite payments must, whenever occasion arises, be equitably apportioned between the two trusts, if the trustee or cashier held funds belonging to both, or must be held to have been made from that fund or trust of which the cashier or trustee at the time had a balance in his hands, and not from any other trust of which at the time the cashier or trustee had no balance in his hands from which the payment could be made. In short, the trustee or cashier shall not be held to advance or lend to the beneficiary so long as he has any funds in his hands belonging to the beneficiary and from which the payment might be made. In other words, a trustee intromitting with two funds, and making indefinite payments to the common beneficiary of both, shall always be held to make these payments from funds in his hands, and not in expectation of getting funds on another account which he has not yet received.

No. 34. Nov. 30, 1875. Beith v. Mackenzie.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is the opinion of the Court.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—A. P. PURVES, W.S.—SKENE, WEBSTER, & PEACOCK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 35. Dec. 2, 1875. Lord Advocate v. Brown.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. P. B. Robertson. THOMAS BROWN (Inspector of Liff and Benvie), Defender.—Fraser—Thoms.

Process—Relevancy—Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 118), secs. 14, 35, 38.—The 38th section of the Industrial Schools Act enacts that where a child sent to an industrial school under the Act is chargeable to any parish the parochial board and inspector of the poor "shall . . . be liable to repay to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury all expenses incurred in maintaining him."

A boy, chargeable to a parish, having been committed to an industrial school under a warrant ex facie regular, the Lord Advocate raised an action against the inspector for the expenses of his maintenance.

Held that it was not a relevant defence for the inspector to plead that the proceedings before the magistrate were irregular, and that the warrant had been illegally granted.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. M.

THIS was an action by the Lord Advocate against the inspector of poor for Liff and Benvie, concluding for declarator that the defender was "liable for the expense of maintaining, at a rate not exceeding five shillings sterling per week, James Mackay, presently detained in the Dundee Industrial Schools, from the date of his commitment to said schools, under warrant dated 8th May 1871, until he be discharged therefrom, all in terms of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866." There were also conclusions for payment of £31, 10s. already incurred, and for relief for the future.

It was not disputed that James Mackay was committed under an order in these terms:—"Burgh of Dundee.—Be it remembered that on the 8th day of May 1871, in pursuance of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, I, one of the Magistrates of the said burgh of Dundee, do order that James Mackay, now or lately residing in Perth Road, Dundee, apparently of the age of eleven years (whose religious persuasion appears to me, after inquiry, to be Protestant), being a child subject to the provisions of section 14th of the said Act, be sent to the Dundee Industrial School, and that he be detained there until he attain the age of fifteen years.—GEORGE T. GRAHAM, Magistrate."*

* The 14th section of the Act 29 and 30 Vict. c. 118, is in these terms:—"Any person may bring before two Justices, or a Magistrate, any child appar-

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Brown.

The pursuer pleaded (as the record was amended in the Inner-House); —3. The said James Mackay having been within the meaning of sections 35 and 38 * of the statute libelled, sent to, and detained in a certified industrial school, the pursuer is entitled, whether the warrant for the said James Mackay's detention be valid or invalid, to recover from the defender the sums contributed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury towards his custody and maintenance. 4. No relevant defence having been stated to the present action, the pursuer is entitled to decree, with expenses.

The defender, besides disputing the chargeability of the boy, and the correctness of the rate and amount of the expense, averred that the procedure was irregular in several respects, and stated, inter alia, the following pleas:—1. The declaratory conclusions of the action are incompetent, and the petitory conclusion being dependent on the declaratory, the action should be dismissed. 2. The order of detention here founded on cannot support the claim here attempted to be enforced against the defender's board, in respect that—(1) The provisions alike of the common law and of the Summary Procedure Act, as condescended on, were not respected or conformed to; (2) there was no good instance in the applicant, and no qualifications in the boy asked to be detained; (3) the order was ultra vires of the Magistrate who pronounced it; (4) it was granted without evidence of necessary grounds; (5) it does not state which of the alternative facts set out in the 14th section of the Act was found proved; and (6) is, as regards the defender and his board, res inter alios acta. 3. The Magistrate acted illegally in not sending the said James Mackay to a poorhouse, as allowed by the 19th section, with a view to inquiries being made as to his antecedents. 4. The order was illegal, in respect that the defender was not called as a party to the proceedings before the Magistrate.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the defender's first plea, and appointed the case to be enrolled for further procedure. The defender having then raised a reduction of the order of committal, the Lord Ordinary, on 18th June 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of the dependence of an action at the instance of the present defender against the present pursuer for reduction of the Magistrate's order referred to in the present action, sists further procedure in hoc statu: Grants to the pursuer leave to reclaim."

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this action the Lord Advocate concludes for declarator against the inspector of poor of Liff and Benvie, that the defender, as representing the parochial board of the said parish, "is liable for the expense of maintaining, at a rate not exceeding 5s. sterling per week, James Mackay, presently

---

ently under the age of fourteen years, that comes within any of the following descriptions, namely: That is found begging or receiving alms (whether actually or under the pretext of selling or offering for sale anything), or being in any street or public place for the purpose of so begging or receiving alms: That is found wandering and not having any home or settled place of abode, or proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence: That is found destitute, either being an orphan, or having a surviving parent who is undergoing penal servitude or imprisonment: That frequents the company of reputed thieves; the Justices or Magistrates before whom a child is brought, as coming within one of these descriptions, if satisfied on inquiry of that fact, and that it is expedient to deal with him under this Act, may order him to be sent to a certified industrial school."

* Quoted in the opinion of the Lord President, p. 190.

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Brown.

detained in the Dundee Industrial Schools, from the date of his commitment to said schools under warrant dated 8th May 1871 until he be discharged therefrom, all in terms of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866," and farther for payment of £31, 10s. as the amount of his maintenance till 17th January 1874.

It appears that the boy, when about eleven years of age, was sent to the Dundee Industrial School on the 8th of May 1871, as being within the provisions of the 14th section of the Industrial Schools Act, and the warrant for his committal was admittedly ex facie regular. It specifies his age, states that he is subject to the provisions of the 14th section, and orders that he is to be detained until he attains the age of fifteen years. All that is precisely in terms of the schedule of the statute, and one of the clauses of the statute provides that when an order of commitment is made in terms of that schedule it shall be deemed sufficient.

The boy has been educated at the school, and recently, although he has not been discharged, he has been allowed to work out of doors, and must now have attained the age of fifteen.

The authority for the Treasury advancing money for the support of children committed to industrial schools is contained in the 35th section of the statute, which is as follows :—"The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury may from time to time contribute, out of money provided by Parliament for the purpose, such sums as the Secretary of State from time to time thinks fit to recommend towards the custody and maintenance of children detained in certified industrial schools, provided that such contribution shall not exceed 2s. per head per week for children detained on the application of their parents, step parents, or guardians." Then the 38th section provides that "where a child sent to a certified industrial school under this Act is, at the time of his being so sent, or within three months then last past, has been chargeable to any parish, the parochial board and inspector of the poor of the parish of the settlement of such child, if the settlement of the child is in any parish in Scotland, shall, as long as he continues so chargeable, be liable to repay to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury all expenses incurred in maintaining him at school under this Act, to an amount not exceeding five shillings per week."

On that section this action is laid, and there is no dispute that Liff and Benvie was the parish of the boy's settlement if he was chargeable at the time, and has continued to be so during the period in which the money has been expended. There may be a question whether he was chargeable during the whole of that time, but there can be no question that he was chargeable at the time when he was sent to the school, because his father was dead, and he lived with his mother who was in receipt of parochial relief, chiefly on account of her being burdened with several children.

The case is so far perfectly clear. All the conditions of the statute are fulfilled. We have the facts that the boy was sent to the school by a magistrate under a formal and ex facie valid order, that money was advanced by the Treasury, that the parochial board who are called as defenders are the parochial board of the boy's parish of settlement, and that he was chargeable.

But a number of defences have been stated, founded on objections to the validity of the warrant, but none of them appearing on the face of it. Now, I think the school directors on receiving the warrant, when they found that it appeared to be all correct, were entitled to act upon it, and, in like manner, the Treasury, finding that the boy was in the school under a warrant ex facie

No. 35.
Dec. 2, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Brown.

regular, were entitled to advance money on the faith of these facts, and consequently, under section 38, were entitled to recover their advances, provided they could bring the case within the conditions of that section.

I look upon all defences founded on objections not appearing on the face of the warrant as utterly irrelevant, and, above all, the objection stated by the parochial board, that they were not made parties to the application, appears to me entirely unfounded. When an application for the committal of a child is made by the procurator-fiscal or any one else for the public interest, it is, no doubt, indispensable that some one should be called as respondent if it is intended to make any one directly or immediately answerable for the expense of maintenance, and the proper person is usually the parent or guardian. In this case the mother herself appears to have been present, but she was quite unable to contribute to the child's support, and I do not see that anybody else was a necessary party.

The parochial board say, "We should have been cited, or, if we had known even shortly afterwards, we might have got the child out on the grounds now alleged." Now, it appears to me that the inspector of a parish must know how the paupers on his roll live, and here was a pauper with several children receiving relief from the parish, and that at variable rates, according to the circumstances of her condition. These circumstances were proper to be considered by the board in making her an allowance, and it was only their duty not to expend the public funds entrusted to them except on full knowledge and consideration of the circumstances of each pauper. Therefore, it is in vain to say that the child could have been sent to school without the fact being known to the board. That was just one of the circumstances on which they were entitled to vary, and did vary, the mother's allowance. Therefore their knowledge put them in the position, if they had any objection to the order, to apply for its recall or suspension. But they omitted to do so, and if they were allowed to do so now the machinery by which this money is advanced by the Treasury would be thrown out of gear and made unworkable.

Therefore the defences, so far as stated against the validity of the warrant are, in my opinion, irrelevant.

But there still remains a question. The boy's mother was a pauper when he was sent to the school, but she ceased to receive relief from 4th July 1871. Now if, after that date, she was in a condition to maintain herself and family, including the boy, she was no longer a pauper in any sense, and the boy was no longer chargeable, and therefore the expense of his maintenance would not be recoverable from the parochial board. We must have the facts ascertained before we can dispose of this part of the case.

LORD DEAS.—The warrant is not said to be otherwise than regular and legal on its face, and that being so, I think that both the managers of the school and the Treasury were entitled to act on it.

It does not follow that nobody had a right to inquire into the validity of the warrant. That was the right and the business of the party who was to be ultimately liable—namely, the inspector of the parochial board. He was entitled to ask that the warrant should be quashed if it was invalid. True, he could not do so unless he knew of it. I think there is strong ground for believing that he got express intimation. But apart from that, and without determining that an inspector is bound to know all about the different families of paupers in receipt of relief, I think that what passed between the inspector and the mother immediately after the boy was sent to the school shews that, in this case, the inspector either knew, or was bound to have known, where the boy was, and how he was being maintained. I do not understand the Crown to admit that there is anything wrong with this warrant. But I do not think the Crown can be required to go into that question.

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Lord Advocate v. Brown.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

The parties adjusted a joint minute, agreeing "that the defender's first four pleas be repelled, and that the pursuer should obtain decree restricted to the period from 8th May 1871, the date of commitment, to 16th April 1873, the day of James Mackay's beginning to earn wages, and to the rate of 2s. 6d. per week."

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the Lord Advocate against Lord Curriehill's interlocutor, dated 18th June 1875, recall the said interlocutor: Find that the second, third, and fourth pleas stated in defence are irrelevant: Find that the defender, as representing the parochial board of the parish of Liff and Benvie, is liable for the expense of maintaining James Mackay, mentioned in the summons, in the Dundee Industrial School, from 8th May 1871 till 16th April 1873, and in respect of the joint minute for the parties, No. 19 of process, decern against the defender for payment to the pursuer on behalf of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury of £12, 12s. 6d. sterling, being the amount of such expenses, with interest from the date of citation: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender, and decern: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

CROWN AGENT—DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—Agents.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

ALLAN GILMOUR AND OTHERS (Steuart's Trustees), Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Trayner—D. Crichton, THOMAS HART, Defender.—Balfour—R. V. Campbell.

Contract—Reduction—Essential Error.—A proprietor sold part of his ground for £75, believing it to be burdened with the cumulo feu-duty of £9, 15s. The purchaser knew that the portion effeiring to it was only 3s., and was aware of the seller's mistake. The disposition was revised by the seller's agent. The purchaser took possession and laid out several hundred pounds on the property. In an action by the seller for reduction of the disposition and restitution, or alternatively for decree that the purchaser was bound to relieve the seller of the feu-duty of £9, 15s., and that that sum should be declared to be a real burden on the part sold, and that warrant should be granted to record decree to that effect in the register of sasines, the Lord Ordinary decerned in terms of the second alternative conclusions. Held that it was incompetent so to reform the contract, but decree of reduction and restitution granted on condition that the pursuer reimbursed the defender for his outlay on permanent additions to or improvements of the subjects.

Contract—Proof—Parole.—When a contract has been embodied in a formal deed it is not competent to modify its terms by parole evidence that the intention of the parties was different from that set forth in the deed.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
M.

THE testamentary trustees of John Steuart, writer in Pollokshaws, advertised for sale a plot of ground in Cogan Street, Pollokshaws. The feu-duty was stated in the advertisement to be £9, 15s. Thomas Hart, mill-manager, Pollokshaws, at first made an offer of £50 for the subjects. His agent wrote,—"We have no doubt you may consider this offer a very small one, but . . . . . the feu-duty for which the subjects are liable

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875. Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

being about £37, 10s. an acre, you may perhaps deem it worthy of consideration." He subsequently offered £75, on condition that the duplication of the feu-duty should not be payable for seven years. This offer was accepted, and a disposition of the property was prepared by Hart's agent, revised by the sellers' agents, and duly executed. It was in ordinary terms with an a me vel de me holding, and no reddendo expressed.

When the first term's feu-duty became payable Hart refused to pay more than a few shillings, and on examination of the titles it appeared that the duty of £9, 15s. was payable for the whole of the Printfield Lands, belonging to the pursuers, of which the Cogan Street property only formed a small part, so that the proprietor of the Cogan Street property, though liable to the superior for £9, 15s., had relief against the rest of the lands except to the extent of about 3s.

Steuart's trustees then raised this action against Hart, concluding for reduction of the disposition, and restitution in integrum, or alternatively that Hart was bound to relieve the trustees of the sum of £9, 15s. of feu-duty, with corresponding casualties, and that the said sum and casualties were real liens and preferable burdens on the subjects, and that warrant should be granted to have decree to that effect in the pursuers' favour recorded in the Register of Sasines.

The pursuers averred that it escaped the notice of their agents that the title did not contain any sub-division or allocation of the feu-duty; that their chief object in selling the property, which was ruinous and yielding no income, was to get quit of the payment of £9, 15s.; that of this the defender's agent was well aware; that it was of the essence of the contract that the defender should relieve them of the payment, and that he all along knew this. They further averred in Cond. 10, as amended in the Inner-House, that they were willing, and offered, on the said subjects being restored to them, to repay the price, and to reimburse to the defender his expenditure in permanent additions to or improvements of the said subjects, as the same should be judicially ascertained.

They pleaded;—(1) It having been part of the treaty between the pursuers and defender for the sale of the property in question that it was effectually burdened with a feu-duty of £9, 15s., and as the defender refuses to give effect to this, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the reductive conclusions of the libel. (2) At all events, as the pursuers were labouring under essential error, and were known at the time by the defender to be so doing, in accepting of his offer, upon any other footing than that of being wholly relieved from the said feu-duty, and were under essential error in subscribing and delivering the disposition without inserting therein a clause to that effect, they are entitled to have the transaction set aside, as concluded for. (3) In any view, the pursuers are entitled, if the transaction is not set aside, to decree against the defender as concluded for, for payment of the yearly sum of £9, 15s., and for warrant to record the decree in the Register of Sasines.

The defender averred that "it was not in the contemplation of either party to the transaction to impose on the subjects in question any additional feu-duty to that which was imposed on them by the titles. At all events, this was not in the contemplation of the defender; and if the pursuers had such in contemplation, they did not disclose it to the defender." "The defender has expended on a brassfoundry on the ground about £220, exclusive of fixed machinery, which cost upwards of £200; and on the workmen's houses he has expended about £450."

He pleaded;—(3) The transaction in question having been concluded by formal deed, it is not competent to modify or contradict the same by extrinsic evidence.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875. Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

The Lord Ordinary, on 22d February 1875, repelled the defender's third plea, and allowed a proof.*

The evidence shewed that the defender knew, when he offered for the property, that it was only burdened with a feu-duty of a few shillings, and that he knew that the pursuers believed it to be burdened with £9, 15s. The evidence as to the value of the subjects was conflicting, but, on the whole, it went to shew that but for the supposed burden the value would have been considerably more than £75. It was proved that the defender had laid out several hundred pounds on new buildings upon the ground.

The Lord Ordinary, on 5th April 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that at the date of the sale of the Cogan Street property mentioned on record by the pursuers to the defender, the pursuers were proprietors of twelve acres or thereby of land, called the Printfield Lands, of which the Cogan Street property formed part, and which were held of the same superior for payment of a cumulo annual feu-duty of £9, 14s. 11½d.: Finds that at that time the pursuers' agents, who had charge of the negotiations and sale, were under the belief that the amount of this feu-duty had been allocated on the Cogan Street property, and that thereby the remaining parts of the Printfield Lands belonging to them, including parts thereof which had been sub-feued, had been freed and re-

---

* NOTE.— . . . . . "As to the competency of allowing parole proof, it appears to me that the pursuers are not precluded, as the defender pleads, from referring to anything beyond the letters of 4th and 12th December. In the first place, these formed only part of the correspondence, and I think that for the purpose of shewing what was the real contract between the parties in regard to the feu-duty or burden in question, the capitalised value of which is more than three times the price paid for the property, the pursuers are entitled to have the whole correspondence before the Court, and the advertisements to which the letter of 4th December refers, as well as to prove the circumstances in which the letters were written, and the knowledge which Mr Brown, the defender's agent, had, and the representations made to and by him in the course of the transaction. The Court, in order to reach the true intention of the parties, and the real transaction between them, has repeatedly refused to sustain a plea such as that now stated by the defender in seeking to limit the pursuers to the letters of 4th and 12th December—Scottish Union Insurance Company v. Marquis of Queensberry, 1842, 1 D. 1203, affirmed 1 Bell's App. 183; Carricks v. Saunders, 1850, 12 D. 812; Lindsay v. Barmcotte, February 19, 1851, 13 D. 718. In the first of these cases Lord Cottenham observed, in language which is, I think, quite applicable to this case,—'If it were not competent for a Court of Equity to give effect to a transaction different from what the deeds executed represented to be the character of it, one of the most important branches of its jurisdiction would be cut off, and a security would be afforded to frauds which are now easily detected and defeated.' 'The only question is the intention of parties.' 'In ascertaining such intention it is competent for the Court to form its judgment upon the whole of the transaction, and upon evidence dehors the deed, such evidence being used not for the purpose of putting a construction upon the deed, but of superadding an equity controlling the estate and interest given by the deed.' And in the case of Carricks v. Saunders parole evidence was admitted for the purpose of ascertaining the real nature of the transaction and intention of the parties, although letters had passed between them recording the terms of the order or instructions given, and of the execution of the order or instructions by the pursuer of the action. In the case of Russell v. Freen, 13 S. p. 752, the Court, in ascertaining the true contract between the parties, proceeded, to some extent, on an advertisement, which was not even referred to in the writings which passed between them, and the opinion of Lord Corehouse especially appears to me to be of value in the present question."

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

lieved of any part of said feu-duty, while in point of fact no such allocation had been made: Finds that in fixing the upset price of said property, when it was offered for sale in terms of the advertisements mentioned on record, and in accepting the price of £75 offered by the defender, the pursuers acted in the belief that the property was burdened with the whole of said feu-duty, and that the purchaser would undertake the sole liability therefor, and have no claim to be relieved of any part thereof against them as proprietors of the remaining Printfield Lands, and that they were induced to accept the price of £75 under that belief, while if they had understood that the property was ultimately liable to a feu-duty of 3s. only, with a right of relief against the Printfield Lands belonging to them for the remainder of the cumulo feu-duty, they would not have sold the property without providing for the allocation of the whole feu-duty thereon, or otherwise obtaining a price of £285 or thereby, which was in their view the value of the property if burdened with a nominal feu-duty only: Finds that the defender and his agent, at the time of the negotiations for the purchase and the agreement to purchase, were fully aware of the essential error under which the pursuers' agents were acting, and concluded the contract with the intention of taking advantage of that error: Finds that the disposition granted by the pursuers in fulfilment of the contract of sale was so granted under the same error on their part, and in the knowledge on the part of the defender and his agent that they were acting under that error: Finds that the defender, in the same knowledge, made considerable alterations and expenditure on the property, and that consequently restitutio in integrum cannot now be given by him: Finds in point of law that the contract of sale, and disposition following thereon, having been respectively entered into and granted under error in essentialibus as aforesaid, the pursuers would have been entitled to reduce the said contract and disposition, and to be restored against the same if matters had remained entire and restitution had been practicable; and as the defender, in the knowledge of said error, has by his actings made restitution impracticable, he is bound to implement the contract on the footing on which it was entered into by the pursuers, and the pursuers are entitled to have the said cumulo feu-duty made an exclusive burden on the said property: Therefore finds, decerns, and declares, under the second alternative conclusions of the summons, that the defender is bound to free and relieve the pursuers of the sum of £9, 14s. 11½d. sterling, payable from the said subjects and other parts of said Printfield Lands to Sir William Stirling-Maxwell, Baronet, of Pollockshaws, the superior of the same, with corresponding casualties, and that the said sum of £9, 14s. 11½d. sterling, and corresponding casualties, are real liens and preferable burdens on the said subjects sold to the defender as aforesaid, and decerns and ordains the defender to free and relieve the pursuers of the same accordingly as from the term of Martinmas 1873 inclusive, and for all time coming thereafter, and grants warrant to the pursuers to record this decree in the appropriate Register of Sasines for publication, or for publication and preservation: Finds the defender liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—It is, I think, impossible to read the proof in this case without coming to the conclusion that the defender is seeking to obtain an unfair advantage in the transaction which he entered into with the pursuers for the purchase of the Cogan Street property. It is plain that the pursuers' agents were under the erroneous belief that the cumulo feu-duty payable from the Printfield Lands which belonged to the late Mr Steuart had been imposed exclusively on the Cogan Street property, with the effect of relieving the remainder of the lands of any part of it. The belief arose from information which had been com-

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The price was not unfair. Besides, the disposition contained the deliberate contract of the parties, municated after Mr Steuart's death, which occurred in the beginning of 1871, by Mr Brown, afterwards and now the defender's agent, who had been Mr Steuart's managing clerk for some time. A valuation of Mr Steuart's heritable estate was required for Government purposes, and Mr Brown, in communicating the réntal and burdens of Mr Steuart's properties to Mr Binnie, the valuator, for the purpose of his valuation, entered the feu-duty, which may be called £9, 15s., as a burden on the Cogan Street property, while the other Printfield Lands were entered as free from any part of it, and it was on this footing that Mr Binnie valued the property at £111, 18s. 4d. In doing so he deducted the value of the feu-duty at twenty-one years' purchase, being £204, 15s. If the feu-duty had been merely nominal, his valuation, which was a guide to the trustees in exposing the property for sale, would have been £315 instead of £111, or nearly three times the amount fixed.

"It is further, I think, clear, that the defender and his agent Mr Brown were both aware of the serious error under which the pursuers' agents laboured. It is painful to read their evidence on this subject as to the communications which took place between them in reference to the purchase when the negotiations were going on, for they not only contradict each other, but each of them contradicts himself in the course of the testimony he gave. But of the result there appears to be no doubt. Both of them knew that the sellers, or their agents who represented them in the transaction, were under the erroneous belief, contrary to the fact, that the whole feu-duty had been allocated on the Cogan Street property, and both of them knew that, if this were not really so, the burden of the great part, if not the whole of the feu-duty, must be borne by the remaining lands belonging to the pursuers. It is, I think, also proved beyond question that the case is not one of mutual error. The defender states distinctly that he believed the feu-duty to be almost nominal, and that the sellers were acting under error, but he thinks it was no duty of his to enlighten them as to their mistake, and that he did nothing wrong in taking advantage of their error if he could. He distinctly states that at the very outset of the negotiations he knew the sellers understood the subjects to be burdened with the gross feu-duty as an exclusive burden on them, but that he had been informed by Mr Brown, his agent, that he would have a right of relief of all except two or three shillings. Mr Brown gives a different account of this. At one part of his evidence he states he knew there was a substantial claim of relief for a large part of the feu-duty, while at another he states that his letters to the sellers' agents were written in the belief that the whole feu-duty was exigible from the Cogan Street subjects without a right of relief. The impression, however, produced on my mind by the evidence, as a whole, is that the first of these statements is the correct one.

"Both parties, that is, the defender and his agent, are agreed, however, that before the disposition was drafted by Mr Brown and sent to the sellers' agents for revisal they were aware that under the titles the proprietor of the Cogan Street property was entitled to relief of all the feu-duty except 3s., and that the claim of relief for the whole or the greater part of the feu-duty was a claim against the pursuers. It is thus not even disputed that before the transaction was completed by the granting of the conveyance the defender and his agent knew positively the true state of matters, as well as the fact that the sellers had acted under error.

"The first question that arises in these circumstances is, What were the pursuers' rights if they had discovered the error under which they acted before granting the conveyance to the defender? On that question I am of opinion that they were entitled to resist implement of the contract of sale, and if necessary to set aside the transaction by reduction. If either party to a contract has entered into it under essential error, so that in fact there has never been that consensus in idem which is essential to a concluded agreement, the contract cannot be enforced. Essential error may exist with reference to the subject, the price or

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875.

Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

and was the only competent evidence of the contract. Although there was no specific reddendo mentioned, the tenendas clause had a statutory consideration, or in some cases the person with whom the contract is made. In the present case the error, which was a material one, had reference to the price.

"If the converse of the actual circumstances be assumed, I think this becomes clear. Had the sale been entered into by missives specifying a fixed price, and without any reference to feu-duty, but in the belief on the part of the buyer in consequence of what occurred during the negotiations that the feu-duty was nominal, whereas the fact was there was really a feu-duty of £10 payable, say, without relief, I cannot doubt that the error would have been in essentialibus, and the purchaser would not have been bound to go on with the transaction. Feu-duty is really price, and so much so that in many cases it is the sole price stipulated for. The consideration which in selling the property in question the pursuers had in their minds was, as stated to the defender, that the defender should undertake an annual payment of £9, 15s., and pay down a sum of £75. The undertaking for an annual payment was the more important part of the consideration, for the feu-duty of £9, 15s., at the ordinary rate of twenty-one years' purchase, amounts to £204, 15s.

"It is unnecessary to consider whether such an error would have been sufficient to render the contract void if the defender had been entirely in ignorance of the pursuers' real intention and state of mind. The sound rule, when the error is not mutual, necessarily destroying the contract, appears to be that laid down by Lord Wensleydale in Freeman v. Cook, 2 Exchequer, 654, 'that whatever a man's real intention may be, if he manifests an intention to another party so as to induce that other party to act upon it, he will be estopped in denying that the intention, as manifested, was his real intention'—Benjamin on Sale, p. 326. In the case supposed everything might turn upon what had taken place to manifest the real intention of the sellers; and if the real intention manifested had been to sell the property subject to the feu-duty, without any reference to its amount, as it stood in the titles, it may be they would have had no remedy against that error. In the present case the real intention was not only manifest but was known to the other contracting party. It was not even a case of mutual error, in which also the contract would have been void.

"Holding, therefore, that the pursuers might have declined to grant the conveyance to the defender, if they had been aware of their error, are they precluded from the remedy which justice requires they should obtain because of having granted that deed, or because the defender has expended a considerable sum of money on the property since his purchase? This question must, I think, be answered in the negative, because the defender obtained the disposition in the knowledge of the essential error under which the sellers sold the property and granted that very deed in his favour. He knew that there never had been that consensus in idem which alone can make a binding contract; but knowing this, and being aware that he had no true right to enforce the contract, he obtained the conveyance without informing the pursuers of their mistake. I think he was not entitled to demand and take implement of a contract which he knew had no real existence, because the parties had never agreed as to the price, the pursuers not having intended to take £75 as the full consideration for the subjects.

"If restitution were still practicable the pursuers would, I think, be entitled to have the disposition cancelled, and to take back the property on repayment of the sum of £75 paid by the defender. This cannot be, because the defender has changed the nature of the property. But, again, this change was made in the knowledge of the pursuers' error, and it must be assumed in the knowledge also that the pursuers were entitled to be restored against the contract. Restitution cannot be obtained, and as the defender is the party responsible for this he must bear the consequences. In many circumstances this would infer a payment of damages or compensation for loss, which is usually the alternative when restitution cannot be given. In the present case such a claim might, I think, be insisted in for payment of a sum of money, but it appears to me that as there is no difficulty in enforcing the contract in the very sense in which the defender

No. 36. Dec. 2, 1875. Stenart's Trustees v. Hart.

meaning, which fixed the feu-duty. The disponee was either put in the place of the disponer, or he held under him at a blench duty, with an obligation to relieve the disponer of feu-duty. There was no allegation of fraud, and the disposition being the conclusive evidence of the contract, there was no reason for setting it aside on the ground of essential error. But even if there had otherwise been a case for reduction on that head, the remedy was inapplicable under the circumstances, because reduction on the head of essential error must proceed on the footing of restitution in integrum. But here restitution was impossible, owing to the great expenditure which the defender had made on the subjects.[1] knew that the pursuers understood it, and entered into it, there is no reason why this remedy should not be given, and I have therefore given decree against the defender, ordaining him to relieve the pursuers of the whole feu-duty of £9, 15s., and making that amount a real burden on the property.

---

"In the view which I have thus taken it has been unnecessary to enter on the question whether the contract may not be truly represented as having been procured by fraud on the part of the defender or his agent, for I am of opinion that, taking the case as one of essential error only—but such error known to the other contracting party—the law gives the remedy which the pursuers ask. If it were necessary, however, that fraud should be established in order to give the pursuers that remedy, I am disposed to think there is enough in the case to entitle the pursuers to succeed.

"It may be true that the purchaser was not under a legal obligation to inform the sellers of the mistake under which they were acting, although I think it is equally true that he was not entitled to take the benefit he has endeavoured to obtain by acting on the contract which he knew was void. But although the purchaser is in some cases entitled to take advantage of the seller's manifest ignorance—that is, where the error is not in essentialibus—he is not entitled in the negotiations for the purchase, by his statements and expressions, to create or confirm the error, or to induce a seller to forbear making such inquiries as for his security he might otherwise have made. Lord Eldon, in the case of Turner v. Harvey, Jacob, 178, observed in such a case, that if the least word be dropped by the purchaser to mislead the vendor, the latter will be relieved; and in the case of Vernon v. Keys, 12 East, 631, Lord Ellenborough states that a similar effect will be given to statements by a seller which may induce the buyer to forbear making the inquiries which, for his own security and advantage, he would otherwise have made, and I do not doubt that these statements embody a sound legal principle.

"The letters by the defender's agent of 8th October and 4th December 1872 contain, I think, representations which were calculated, and which, in the light of the general evidence, appear to have been intended to mislead the sellers and to prevent their making any investigation into the titles to satisfy themselves that the feu-duty had been imposed exclusively on the property which was the subject of the negotiations and sale. In the former of these letters the feu-duty is expressly stated at £9, 15s., which is put forward as the larger part of the consideration to be paid annually in perpetuity by the purchaser for the property, and the same feu-duty is plainly referred to in the subsequent letter, in which the obligation for duplication of the feu-duty is made the subject of anxious stipulation. These were misleading statements calculated to create a feeling of security in the mind of the sellers as to the fixed nature of the feu-duty, and to lead them to refrain from making inquiries or investigations into the titles to satisfy themselves on the subject, and as such entitle the pursuers to say the contract was procured by fraud; and if this be so, the pursuers are on this ground entitled to the decree they ask."

[1] Defender's Authorities.—Oliver v. Suttie, Feb. 1, 1840, 2 D. 514; Gillespie v. Russell, Feb. 28, 1856, 18 D. 677, June 26, 1857, 19 D. 897, H. L. July 22, 1859, 3 Macq. 757.

Pursuers' Authorities.—Squire v. Ford, 20 L. J. Ch. 308; York Buildings Co. v. Mackenzie, 3 Pat. App. 378; Fernie v. Robertson, Jan. 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 437; Rutherford v. Rankine, M. 13,422; Bell's Prin. 538.

At advising,— No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875. Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of reduction on the head of essential error, but it contains other conclusions, to the effect that the defender is bound to free and relieve the pursuers of the sum of £9, 15s. of cumulo feu-duties, with corresponding casualties, and that the said sum of £9, 15s. and corresponding casualties are real liens and preferable burdens on the subjects sold to the defender, and that warrant should be granted to the pursuers to have the decree pronounced in their favour recorded in the Register of Sasines; and the Lord Ordinary has given effect to these latter conclusions. The dispute arose out of a transaction of sale in 1872. Some property, called the Cogan Street property, was sold by the pursuers to the defender at the small price of £75. From the description it appears to have been covered to a large extent with ruinous buildings, and not to have been of very great value except from its situation. There was a great deal of communing between the parties, but in the end a disposition was granted, containing all the usual clauses in the short form now in use, and, among other things, stating, as the sole consideration, a price of £75. It provided that the subjects should be held a me vel de me, which, of course, means, according to the statutory interpretation, that the subjects were to be held of the sellers' superior on the same terms as the sellers held them, or by a base holding of the sellers at a blench duty. The disposition contained no other stipulation in regard to feu-duties. But the pursuers allege that during the whole of the communings they had it in view to impose on this subject a feu-duty of £9, 15s., then payable by them, not in respect of this subject only, but of another also. Their object was to relieve the other subject altogether, and they say that they believed that that would be the effect of the transaction, and that the disposition was granted on that footing. They allege, farther, that the defender and his agent were aware of their intention and belief. In short, the allegation is, that the sellers were acting under essential error, and that the purchaser knew that and took advantage of it.

That case certainly presents an appearance of relevancy, and I think it is fairly established by the evidence. It appears to me that the property was advertised as being burdened with a feu-duty of £9, 15s., and that it was very distinctly announced in various other ways that it was to be so burdened. The defender's attention and that of his agent were called to that condition of the sale very precisely. It is also apparent that the pursuers were acting in the belief that, by some means or other, they had secured this object. It is not very clear how they could imagine that they had done so by this disposition, but that is not of much consequence. It is abundantly evident that they were acting under this error, and as clear that the defender and his agent, while they knew of the pursuers' intention to impose the burden, and belief that it had been imposed, were aware that it had not really been done.

So far, therefore, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in his findings in fact. And I am not prepared to say that this is a wrong without a remedy. But it is very clear that the remedy given by the Lord Ordinary is not the right one, and indeed, is not a competent remedy at all. What he does is this. He does not reduce the sale, but alters its conditions, and not only so, but alters the defender's title and inserts new clauses constituting real burdens, which are all apparently to enter the Register of Sasines. This is a startling proceeding. I never saw anything like it. I am humbly of opinion that it is not competent to reform

No. 36.
Dec. 2, 1875.
Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

the contract of parties in the way which has been done by the Lord Ordinary. It is not in the power of any Court to alter the contract of parties, or the terms of a conveyance in implement of a contract of sale. We must, therefore, recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I think the pursuers are entitled to reduce the sale on the ground of essential error known to the purchaser and taken advantage of by him, and therefore the remedy I propose is under the reductive conclusion of the summons.

But then a sale of this kind cannot be set aside except on conditions. The feudal title is in the defender. He has entered into possession and expended money on the property, and there can be no reduction on such a ground as this, except on the footing that the sellers are not only to repay the price, but all the money which the purchaser has spent in permanent alterations or additions to the subject. The record as it stood originally did not contain a relevant averment or offer sufficient in terms of the reductive conclusion, but as it is now amended, I think the pursuers are entitled to prevail, on the conditions set forth in the 10th article of their condescendence.

LORD DEAS.—This subject was sold at the price of £75. It is clear that that price was fixed upon the footing that the property was burdened with a feu-duty of £9, 15s. If that had not been so understood, the price would have been at least double. I can have no doubt, therefore, that there was an essential error on the part of those acting for the sellers. Then, I think with your Lordship that the purchaser's agent knew of the error, and intended to take advantage of it. I need hardly add that the purchaser is not fairly entitled to take advantage of such an error, and that the sellers must be entitled to some remedy.

I agree with your Lordship that where a regular and formal disposition has been executed and delivered it is incompetent, by our law and practice, to interfere, as the Lord Ordinary has substantially done, in the way of reforming the contract. There are many decisions refusing such a remedy. But it is just as clear that redress may be obtained by reduction coupled with restitutio in integrum. There is no difficulty here in giving that sort of redress. It is a mere question of money. The property is not said to have been conveyed away to any bona fide singular successor. The only room for dispute is whether the actual sums expended are to be repaid or only so far as these have been beneficial. A tender has been made in the record, as amended, which may be held to be a tender of restitutio in integrum, whatever that may be found to be. I have a strong impression that it cannot be anything short of the actual expenditure. But whatever it is, I think that it is the remedy which now falls to be given. I can have no doubt that, subject to the above conditions, so gross an error, known to the other party, entitles the sellers to reduction.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have a strong conviction that the justice of this case is with the pursuers, and I am not the least surprised that the Lord Ordinary should have desired to give a legal remedy for what, I think, was certainly a wrong. But the remedy which he has given is inappropriate. Accordingly, I agree with your Lordships that we cannot adhere to his interlocutor. The remedy sought and given is not the right one. The introduction of a new clause into a disposition of heritage, for the purpose of creating, and having recorded, a real burden on land, and the effecting that by importing something into the contract which is gathered from prior correspondence and parole evidence, appears to me to be an

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

inappropriate and incompetent remedy. However much we may regret it, we must refuse that remedy. Then there is no conclusion for damages.

But there is another remedy still—namely, restitution. The pursuers were labouring under an excusable and essential error. The defender, the purchaser, knew that the pursuers were in error, and having that knowledge he dealt with the pursuers, and entered into a transaction which was injurious to the pursuers. For this wrong some remedy should be given.

I do not think that the parole proof can be excluded from consideration, when viewed as adduced, not in support of the introduction of new obligations into the disposition, but for the purpose of proving the essential error, and proving that the error was excusable, and was known to the defender.

I think that restitution is the appropriate remedy. How restitution can be suitably and equitably given may depend on the ascertainment of facts not yet known.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion; and I concur with Lord Ardmillan as to the competency of the evidence; for I am very doubtful whether, in such a case as the present, parole evidence would have been competent except for the particular purpose of proving essential error.

As to the import of the evidence, I am quite satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's findings in fact; but I cannot concur as to the remedy which his Lordship has given; and I think the proper remedy is by reduction and restitution in integrum, as proposed by your Lordship in the chair.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think it right to add that the parole evidence was competent and admissible for the purpose of proving essential error, and the fact that the defender was in the knowledge of the error. These are questions which would be sent to a jury under an issue, and may therefore be competently proved by parole. But if this proof was allowed or led for the purpose of proving the terms of the contract, I think it was entirely inadmissible. The Lord Ordinary repels the defender's third plea, which is that "the transaction in question having been concluded by formal deed, it is not competent to modify or contradict the same by extrinsic evidence." I think that plea was well founded and ought not to have been repelled, and if the proof had related to the subject-matter of that plea it would not have been competent. But the proof actually led related to the matter of essential error, with regard to which it was perfectly competent.

LORD DEAS.—I think it right to say that I intended to make the same observation. The parole proof was not only competent, but necessary, in regard to the error in essentialibus, although as to the contract itself it would have been quite incompetent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the pursuers, in concluding the contract of sale to the defender of the Cogan Street property mentioned on record, and in granting the disposition thereof sought to be reduced, were acting under the essential error that the said subjects were burdened with a feu-duty of £9, 15s., to the effect of relieving certain other subjects belonging to the pursuers of said feu-duty: Find that the defender throughout the negotiations for the said sale, and in con-

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1875. Steuart's Trustees v. Hart.

cluding the contract and accepting of the said disposition, was well aware that the pursuers were acting under the essential error foresaid, and took advantage of that error to obtain from the pursuers a disposition of the said subjects without the burden of the said feu-duty: Find that in these circumstances the pursuers are entitled to reduce the said sale and disposition, and to have the subjects restored to them, with the whole rents and profits thereof received by the defender since the date of his entry thereto, but on condition of repaying to the defender the price of the said subjects, with interest thereof, at five per cent since the payment thereof, and of reimbursing the defender in his whole expenditure since the term of entry, on permanent additions to, or improvements of, the said subjects, with interest at five per cent on the sum so expended: Appoint the defender, within eight days, to lodge a state, with vouchers, shewing the amount due to him in terms of the above findings: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in the Outer-House to the extent of four-fifths of the taxed amount thereof, and remit to the Auditor to tax the amount of the said Outer-House expenses, and report: Find no expenses due to either party since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against."

DEWAR & DEAS, W.S.—WILSON & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

No. 37.

Dec. 2, 1875. Johnston and Sons v. Dove.

JOSEPH JOHNSTON AND SONS, Pursuers and Respondents.—Balfour—Mackintosh.

JOHN FYFFE DOVE, Defender and Appellant.—D.-F. Watson—Trayner.

Carrier—Reparation—Notice—Judicial Inspection.—Where a consignee of goods, which have been damaged in transit, breaks bulk without notice to the carrier, or judicial inspection, he does not thereby bar his claim for damages, although the want of such precaution to preserve evidence may be an element in the proof.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire. I.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Dundee by the respondents, Joseph Johnston and Sons, to recover from the appellant, John Fyffe Dove, the freight from Riga to Dundee of certain hemp consigned to him.

The appellant admitted his liability for the freight, but stated a counter claim of damages, in respect that the cargo had been damaged with wet stow-wood, and that the bales of hemp which had been in contact with the stow-wood were thereby damaged.

It appeared from the proof which was led that delivery of the hemp was given on 28th, 29th, and 30th August, and 3d September 1873; that on 29th August the appellant wrote to the captain of the vessel as follows:—"I beg to intimate to you that I hold yourself and owners liable for damage to hemp under my charge on board your vessel, ... said damage having been caused by wet dunnage-wood having been used in stowing this hemp;" that on 30th August the captain replied—"I beg to state that your hemp is damaged by sweat, for which cause I am not liable;" that on 29th August the appellant caused the bales which were still on board the vessel to be examined by men of skill in the presence of the captain, but without notice to him or to the respondents; that on 1st September the appellant caused the damaged bales to be opened in his own warehouse and the damage valued by the same men of skill without notice to the respondents.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds

No. 37.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Johnston and Sons v. Dove.

that the only dispute between the parties is as to the claim made by the defender in respect a portion of the parcel in question was, as he alleges, damaged during the voyage by wet or green stow-wood: Finds in fact, as regards this claim, that the defender cut up and picked the bales alleged to have been damaged without giving any intimation to the pursuers or their agents of his intention to do so, or applying for a judicial inspection: Finds in law (1) that it is the duty of a consignee receiving goods which appear to be damaged to do nothing to change their condition without obtaining a judicial inspection, or at least without giving previous intimation to the carrier or his agents; and (2) that the defender's failure in this duty bars him from maintaining his claim of damages; and having regard to the whole of the foregoing findings, repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the libel: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

The Sheriff (Maitland-Heriot) adhered.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff have decided this case on what appeared to them to be a point of law, but I cannot accept the grounds on which they have based their judgments.

The action is one for freight. The Sheriffs have found that, though the defenders have a counter claim for damage to their goods during transit, they are

* "NOTE.—Had the Sheriff-substitute seen his way to take up the defender's counter claim on its merits he would, as the evidence stands, have been inclined to find that the defender had made out that the stow-wood was the cause of the damage complained of; but holding, as he does, that the defender's conduct has barred him from insisting in his claim, however well founded it may be, he does not require to express any decided opinion upon the merits. The principle upon which he has proceeded in deciding the case, and which is stated in his first finding in law, is, he humbly thinks, an important one; and though he has not been able to discover any direct authority for it, it seems to him so consonant with justice and common sense, that, acted upon as it undoubtedly is in practice, he has no hesitation in applying it. The importance of the rule no doubt lies partly in this, that without some such check a wide door would be thrown open to fraud; but its chief rationale is, that a carrier ought not to be prejudiced by the consignee's conduct in his defence to a claim of damages, as must in most instances be the case if the rule is not observed. In the present case it is hardly necessary to say that there is no suspicion of fraud, but the Sheriff-substitute cannot help seeing that the pursuers have been prejudiced, and possibly seriously prejudiced, in their defence to the claim of damages by the way in which the defender dealt with the damaged bales. Looking to the grounds upon which the defender's witnesses base their opinion, that wet stow-wood, and nothing else, was the cause of the damage, it was most important that the pursuers should have had an opportunity of inspecting the damaged bales in the condition in which they left the ship—i.e., before they were cut up. Such an opportunity, however, it is clear, was never offered them, for the bales had been cut up and picked before Messrs Philip and Jack went, on 10th September, to inspect them on the pursuers' behalf; and it is not pretended that any intimation that they were to be so dealt with had been given to the pursuers or to Messrs Banks and Mitchell, who acted as agents for the ship. The defender's agent conceded that the general practice was to apply for a judicial inspection, and stated that the smallness of the claim was the reason why his client did not follow the usual course. That, however, is no excuse for the defender's failure to give some notice to the pursuers before cutting up the bales; and in refusing, on account of this failure, to enter on the merits of the claim of damages, the Sheriff-substitute believes that he is pronouncing a salutary as well as a sound decision."

No. 37.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Johnston and Sons v. Dove.

barred from asserting it in consequence of the way in which they have dealt with the goods carried since delivery. In coming to this result the Sheriffs have, I think, confused the case of goods received by a consignee from a carrier after being damaged during transit with that of goods received by a purchaser and found to be disconform to contract. The effect of breaking bulk in the two cases is, I conceive, very different. In the present case, it, of course, weakens the evidence as to the state of the goods on delivery that the defender broke bulk without giving the pursuers a proper opportunity of being present and examining them. And if a deduction from the appearance of the goods on bulk being broken were essential to the decision of the case, and the defender had by his acts prevented any such deduction being fairly and legitimately drawn, we should have been compelled to follow the Sheriffs' judgment.

I do not by any means lay aside such evidence as we have of the state of the goods when opened up; but that is only one branch of the evidence here, and I find quite sufficient besides to warrant me in coming to the conclusion that the goods were not damaged, as the Sheriffs have thought, by wet stow-wood, but by being shipped when themselves damp, and by the sweating which consequently ensued.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The discussion in this case has turned exclusively upon the defender's counter claim of damages. The Sheriffs, in refusing that claim, have proceeded on the ground that it cannot be sustained, because the defender did not obtain a judicial inspection of the goods, or at least did not give previous intimation to the pursuers that he was going to break bulk before he did so, in order that they might have an opportunity of judging for themselves as to the true condition of the goods. It is impossible, I think, to maintain, as a valid and sufficient ground of judgment, that the defender was bound to obtain a judicial inspection of the goods. It may be a usual and proper thing in certain circumstances, as, for example, when one of the parties chiefly interested is absent, to apply to the Judge Ordinary for such inspection; but I do not see that there was any necessity for it in the present case. What is the effect of a judicial inspection? The inspectors report—not on oath—and their report is retained, and produced in the event of an action and proof. At the proof they are examined as to the truth and accuracy of their report; but their report and their evidence together should have no more weight than the evidence of any similarly skilled persons who have had an opportunity of forming an opinion. The want of a judicial inspection is, I think, at any rate in the present case, matter to be considered in weighing the whole evidence, and ought not to constitute, as the Sheriffs appear to have held, a bar to inquiry.

It is only fair, however, to the learned Sheriffs to add that, as an alternative to a judicial inspection, they suggest that there should at least be intimation to the carrier or his agents. That may be a fair and proper step in most cases, but it is not always indispensable. The true way of considering the conduct of parties in reference to such a matter is to deal with it in judging of the whole evidence. In the present case, a proper jury question was raised, and, on the whole evidence, I concur with your Lordship in finding for the pursuers.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

No. 37.

Dec. 2, 1875.
Johnston and Sons v. Dove.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the appellants have failed to prove that the injury of the hemp libelled was caused by the use of green or unseasoned wood: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment appealed against, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses," &c.

HENRY BUCHAN, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 38.

Dec. 3, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

ANDREW JAMES SYMINGTON, Petitioner.—Fraser—Scott.
MRS MARY SANDERSON EDMONSTON OR SYMINGTON, Respondent.—Asher—Mackintosh.

Diligence—Future Debt—Inhibition—Arrestment—Husband and Wife.—Where a wife had used inhibition and arrestment on the dependence of an action of separation and aliment, and had afterwards used arrestments in execution of a decree of separation and aliment, held that after payment by the husband of all debts secured by the diligence, except sums to become due for future aliment, he was entitled to have the arrestments and inhibition recalled.

Expenses—Husband and Wife.—In the above case held that the wife was entitled to her expenses incurred in opposing the petition for recall (taxed as between party and party).

Process—Diligence—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, sec. 16.—Where a pursuer seeks to use arrestments in security of a future debt upon the dependence of an action he should proceed by bill setting forth that the debtor is vergens ad inopiam, or other ground for the diligence, so as to enable the defender to answer the allegation.

Diligence—Arrestment.—It is not competent to use diligence in security of a future debt unless upon the ground that the debtor is vergens ad inopiam, or on similar grounds.

(Ante, vol. i. p. 871, and p. 1006; vol. ii. H. L. p. 41; and ante, vol. ii. p. 974.) 1ST DIVISION. B.

This was a petition at the instance of Andrew James Symington praying for recall of certain inhibitions and arrestments used on the dependence of an action of separation and aliment at the instance of Mrs Symington against the petitioner upon a warrant contained in the summons, and of arrestments in execution of the decree for aliment obtained by the pursuer in that action on 20th March 1874.

The petitioner had paid the whole sums of aliment due to his wife in advance up to the term of Martinmas 1875, and had paid all the expenses of process, with the exception of the expenses incurred in the House of Lords. He had found caution for these expenses. He alleged that all his funds were locked up by the inhibition and arrestments, and that that was the reason why he had not paid the expenses incurred in the House of Lords. In the course of the discussion in the Inner-House he paid the House of Lords expenses. The only question thus came to be the validity of the diligences for security of future payments of aliment.

The petitioner argued;—A creditor is not entitled to use diligence for debts not due unless on an allegation that the debtor is vergens ad inopiam.[1]

---

[1] Macgregor v. Macgregor, Feb. 25, 1837, 15 S. 681, 9 Scot. Jur. 334; Meres and Ainsworth v. York Buildings Company, Feb. 17, 1728, M. 800, May 24, 1728, 1 Pat. App. 10; Bennett v. Fraser, June 21, 1834, 12 S. 760, 6 Scot. Jur. 432; Erskine's Inst. iii. 6, 10; Bell's Com. ii. (5th ed. 144), M'Laren's ed. 136; Lockhart v. Sharp, Nov. 13, 1828, 7 S. 1.

No. 38.

Dec. 3, 1875. Symington v. Symington.

The respondent argued;—She was entitled to security for future payments of aliment to a reasonable extent.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I understand that all the questions raised in the action have been disposed of, except the validity of the two diligences of arrestment and inhibition for security of future aliment.

By our interlocutor of 20th March 1874 we found the petitioner in the present case liable in payment to the present respondent in the sum of £100 of yearly aliment, payable half-yearly in advance, under deduction of such sums of aliment as she had received since the term of Whitsunday 1873; and in regard to the children, we found that the respondent was entitled to their custody during their respective pupillarities, so long as no other or different order might be made by the Court. We further found the petitioner liable to the respondent in aliment at the rate of £25 a-year for each of the children, so long as they should remain in her custody. The only variation which the House of Lords made in our judgment on appeal was in regard to the custody of two of the children. But in all other respects the interlocutor stands. The husband is liable to pay £100 per annum to his wife so long as she lives apart from him, and £25 for each of the children who remain with her. The question now is, whether the diligences ought to stand as security for the sums of aliment which are to become due in the future. This is undoubtedly an important question, and I do not think it has ever been expressly decided. The case of Macdonald and Elder v. Macleod was not a decision on the point, although the question was raised, and the Court then were equally divided.

One of the general principles of our law is, that diligence cannot be used for security of a future debt unless upon the allegation that the debtor is vergens ad inopiam.

The pursuer in the action of separation and aliment has not alleged that the defender is vergens ad inopiam. She had no opportunity of making such an allegation, because her warrant for diligence is contained in the summons, and she did not adopt the course of applying by bill. It rather appears to me that if such diligence is to be used on the dependence of an action in security of a debt not then due the creditor must proceed by a bill, so as to give the defender an opportunity of answering the allegation that he is vergens ad inopiam, instead of proceeding to use diligence simply by warrant obtained on the summons.

But there being no such allegation here, we must proceed on the assumption that the debtor is not vergens ad inopiam. When we pronounced our decision we gave the pursuer all the remedies to which we thought she was entitled, and if she had thought that she was entitled to more, that was the time for her to apply for them. If we had thought that she was entitled to security we should have given her security. That is not an uncommon practice in special circumstances, where the defender has only one source of income. It is not uncommon

---

[1] Bell's Com., M'Laren's ed. i. 354 (5th ed. 338); Macdonald and Elder v. Macleod, Jan. 15, 1811, F.C.; Dove v. Henderson, Jan. 11, 1865, 3 Macph. 339, 37 Scot. Jur. 161; 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, secs. 1 and 16; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 18; Balfour's Practicks, 476; Bell's Com. M'Laren's ed. ii. 70 (5th ed. p. 73).

No. 38.

Dec. 3, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

for the Court to order assignation for a wife's aliment of a portion of an annuity or pension on which the husband has to depend for his living. If he had an annuity, we might require him to secure part of it for his wife's aliment. But there is nothing of the kind in the present case. If the diligence is to stand as a security for the whole future aliment of his wife it must follow that the pursuer of such an action is entitled to create for herself a security which the Court held not to be necessary when they adjusted the rights of the parties at the separation. The opinion I hold is opposed to this view.

I think that a lady who is separated from her husband, as she does not thereby cease to be his wife, must still follow his fortunes; and if he should by unforeseen occurrences fall into poverty, that is the misfortune of the whole family. I should be very slow to hold that, because a wife is separated from her husband, she is entitled to have her aliment secured, so as to give her a preference for life over all her husband's creditors. That would be a very anomalous consequence of diligence used upon the dependence of an action of this kind. But still more anomalous consequences would follow if the arrestment was to cover future aliment. The debtors in whose hands the arrestments were used would require to keep the money in their hands during the whole time of the wife's life, and to pay her yearly and termly the amount of her aliment. By what means would she enforce her rights? In the present case she would require to bring a furthcoming at Whitsunday and Martinmas yearly; it may be for the next twenty years. This would be a proceeding of an extraordinary character, never seen before, and entirely inconsistent with legal principle. I do not think that a creditor can, by arresting money in the hands of his debtor's debtor, convert him into a trustee for his interest. Arrestments are often used in the hands of persons, such as bankers, who would make very good trustees. But are bankers, against their will, to be converted into trustees? If the arrestments were used in the hands of traders or mercantile companies, are they to continue to act as custodiers, and remain for a lifetime in the position of debtors to the husband? Are they to be called upon to pay at every Whitsunday and Martinmas when the wife brings a furthcoming? That would place them in a most extraordinary position. I do not think that they are to be turned into trustees without their own consent. It would interfere with the whole business of life, and the consequences of sustaining this diligence are so anomalous and monstrous that I do not see how we can uphold it. For all that is due and bygone the diligence is competent, but for future debts I think we cannot lay it down too distinctly that the diligence is incompetent unless the debtor is vergens ad inopiam, or there be other circumstances of a parallel kind. I can quite conceive circumstances in which the diligence would be fairly used, as if the defender in an action of separation were in meditatione fugæ, although quite solvent. He might intend to remove his effects beyond the power of his creditors, but there is no case of that kind here, and I think, therefore, that, on the grounds I have stated, the diligence ought to be recalled.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

The respondent moved for expenses, on the ground that she was justified in appearing to oppose the petition, and that caution had only been offered at the close of the discussion.

The petitioner answered;—The Court had laid down in the case of

No. 38.
Dec. 3, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

Donald v. Donald, 30th March 1863, 1 Macph. 741, 35 Scot. Jur. 434, that there was no general rule in such matters, and each case must be decided on its own merits. The wife was here seeking to maintain a diligence against her husband in very unusual circumstances. It was only on the ground of necessity that in actions between husband and wife the Court compelled the husband to bear his wife's expenses. Here there had been no such necessity.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect all the debts secured by the diligence used on the dependence of the action of separation and aliment have been paid, with the exception of sums of aliment to become due in the future, recall the inhibition and arrestments used by the respondent on the dependence of the said action, and also the arrestments used by her in execution of the decree pronounced in said action," and granted warrant for marking the inhibition as discharged in the Register of Inhibitions, and found the respondent entitled to expenses, taxed as between party and party.

JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 39.
Dec. 3, 1875.
Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

JAMES ALEXANDER MOLLESON (Cormack's Trustee), Pursuer and Nominal Raiser.
MITCHELL AND BAXTER (Assignees of Charles R. M'Millan), Claimants.—Guthrie Smith—Sir W. Simpson.
JOHN DAVIES AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Fraser—J. C. Lorimer.

Foreign—Domicile—Succession—Testament.—Held that in the construction of a testamentary deed the presumption that the testator intended his deed to be interpreted in accordance with the law of his domicile may be overcome by evidence of a contrary intention derived from the deed and the circumstances.

Succession—Domicile.—A woman of Scotch origin, wife of a domiciled Englishman, conveyed to trustees (a majority residing in Scotland to be a quorum) a fund, which she was entitled to dispose of under the settlement of a Scotch testator, secured over heritage in Scotland. She directed her trustees to realise the security after her husband's death, and divide the proceeds among her children. The trust-deed was prepared in Scotch form by a Scotch conveyancer, and executed in Scotland. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand) that the deed must be interpreted according to the law of Scotland, that being evidently the intention of the testatrix.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
B.

IN 1830 Mrs Alexander R. Forbes or M'Millan, wife of Peter M'Millan, mariner, residing in Liverpool, had right to a provision under the settlement of Charles Rowatt, surgeon in Campbelton, who died in 1826.

By deeds dated in 1830 and 1835 Mrs M'Millan, with consent of her husband, conveyed this fund to her husband and two persons residing in Scotland as trustees, a majority residing in Scotland being declared to be a quorum, with directions to divide the fund after the death of her husband among the children of the marriage, share and share alike, or the survivor of them upon their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one.

Mrs M'Millan died in 1860, and was survived by her husband, who died in 1872.

She was also survived by two children, a daughter, Mrs Davies, who predeceased her father leaving four children, and a son, Charles R. M'Millan, who survived both his parents.

No. 39.

Dec. 3, 1875.
Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

On Peter M'Millan's death an action of multiplepoinding was raised by Charles R. M'Millan in name of J. A. Molleson, a judicial factor in whose hands the trust-funds then were, all Mrs M'Millan's trustees being dead.

Charles R. M'Millan (and afterwards his assignees, Messrs Mitchell and Baxter, W.S.), claimed the whole fund, on the ground that he was the only child of his mother at the date of his father's death.

He pleaded;—(1) The trust-disposition and settlement having been executed by the husband in England, he being a domiciled Englishman, it and the relative deed of alteration must be construed according to English law. (2) The succession under the trust-disposition and settlement and relative deed of alteration did not vest until the death of the husband. The parties having been domiciled in England at the date of the execution of the said deeds, and up to the time of their death, the succession must be ruled by English law.

Edward Davies and others, Mrs Davies's four children, claimed one half of the fund, and pleaded;—(1) The trust-disposition and settlement and relative deed of alteration executed by Mr and Mrs M'Millan fall to be construed according to the law of Scotland. (2) The claimants being the whole children of the late Mrs Mary M'Millan or Davies, one of the two children of Mr and Mrs M'Millan, are entitled under the deeds before mentioned to one-half of the fund in medio in equal shares. (3) Even on the assumption that the said deeds fall to be construed according to the law of England, the present claimants are entitled to one-half of the fund in medio.

In regard to the question thus raised between the competing claimants, whether Mrs M'Millan's deeds were to be construed according to the law of Scotland or the law of England, the following were the material circumstances:—Mrs M'Millan was born in Scotland. Her deed of 1830 was prepared in the office in Edinburgh of Edward M'Millan, S.S.C., one of the trustees (the others being her husband and a clergyman in Campbelton), and was signed by Mrs M'Millan at Edinburgh, and by her husband at Liverpool, where he was described in the deed as residing. By the deed of alteration in 1835 Mrs M'Millan, who was therein described as presently residing in Campbelton, spouse of Peter M'Millan, presently mate on board the "Magdalene" of Greenock, with his consent, of new conveyed to the same trustees the sum of £500 "contained" in the bond and disposition in security aftermentioned. The trustees were appointed upon Mrs M'Millan's death to realise the security, and invest the fund in their own names, to apply the interest to the education and maintenance of the children of the marriage till the youngest should attain majority, thereafter to pay the interest to Peter M'Millan till his death or second marriage, and upon either of these events happening to divide the money "among the children to be procreated of the marriage between us, share and share alike, or survivor of them, upon their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years." This deed was also prepared in Edward M'Millan's office, and was subscribed by Mrs M'Millan at Edinburgh, and by Peter M'Millan at Campbelton.

The nature of the provision assigned by Mrs M'Millan was as follows:—Dr Rowatt, a surgeon in Campbelton, by his settlement above referred to, directed his grandson and general disponee to "pay to the heirs, executors, or assignees of Mary M'Millan or Forbes, and Miss Alexander Rowatt Forbes [afterwards Mrs M'Millan] or the longest liver of them, the sum of £500." He further appointed his grandson to grant heritable security over the whole or such part of any heritable subject thereby conveyed and disponed to him as the testator's testamentary trustees should think reasonable for securing the provisions "at whatever time he may be called on to do so."

No. 39.

Dec. 3, 1875. Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

Mary M'Millan or Forbes predeceased the testator. In 1827 the heirs of the grandson (who had also predeceased) having been called on by Alex. R. Forbes, then Mrs M'Millan, granted a bond and disposition in security of certain heritable subjects for the £500 in favour of three trustees (one of whom was Peter M'Millan, husband of Mrs M'Millan) for behoof of the heirs, executors, and assignees of Mrs M'Millan, upon which the trustees were infeft.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the deceased Mrs Alexander Rowatt Forbes or M'Millan having been a domiciled Englishwoman from the date of her marriage to the now deceased Peter M'Millan in 1826 till her death, the effect of the provisions contained in the trust-disposition and settlement, and relative deed of alteration by her, dated in 1830 and 1835 respectively, bearing on the rights of the respective claimants to the fund in medio, must be determined according to the law of England; and directs the case to be enrolled for further procedure, reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses; and grants leave to the said claimant, Edward Davies, to reclaim," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—Messrs Mitchell and Baxter claim the whole fund, as representing the sole survivor. The other claimants maintain that, on a sound construction of the deed, it was an implied condition of the bequest that in case a child should not survive the period of division, but should have issue, the children of such child should take their parent's share, and accordingly they claim the one-half of the fund to which their mother would have had right had she survived her father.

"If the effect of the testator's deeds were to be determined by the law of Scotland the fund would be divisible as the claimants Davies and others contend. The parties differ as to the legal construction of the deed according to the law of England; for while Messrs Mitchell and Baxter, as representing Charles M'Millan, allege that the deed must receive effect, according to its literal interpretation, as a gift of the whole fund in favour of the survivor, the other claimants maintain that, according to English law, there is an implied condition in their favour, which gives them right to the share their mother would have taken by survivance of their grandfather. They maintain, however, in the first place, that the deed must be construed according to the law of Scotland.

"I am of opinion that this contention is not well founded. It is admitted that the testator was domiciled in England, and some special ground must be established for the view that her settlements are now to be interpreted by the law of this country, with the effect of introducing as part of their provisions the conditio si sine liberis decesserit, an implied condition which is not expressed in the language used, and no such ground appears to me to exist. The deeds, though drawn in the Scotch form, and executed by the testator during temporary visits to this country, are not expressed in technical language which can only be properly understood or construed by a Scotch Court. It was no doubt thought advisable to have the deeds prepared in this country, for they related to a fund secured in Scotland, and the right to which was vested in trustees, the majority of whom resided there; but the testamentary effect was simply to dispose mortis causa of estate, with which the testator, a domiciled Englishwoman, was entitled to deal, and that not by the use of any technical legal phraseology peculiar to this country, but in language of plain ordinary signification. If the parties were agreed that the language used—which is of this character, and certainly not technical, at least in regard to the truster's directions as to the disposal of the fund in question—should be interpreted literally, and so receive its literal effect according to the law of England, it would follow, according to the rule settled in the case of Thomson's Trustees, 14 D. 217, that this Court should

No. 39.

Dec. 3, 1875. Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

Edward Davies and others reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The fund was heritable, and therefore must be distributed according to the law of Scotland. (2) Although the domicile of a testator may afford a presumption that he intends his succession to be regulated by the law of his domicile, that presumption may be overcome by pregnant indications of a different intention.[1] Here there were such circumstances. The fund was secured over heritage in Scotland. The testatrix had entrusted it to trustees resident in Scotland, and the deeds were prepared according to the Scotch form, and executed in Scotland.

Messrs Mitchell and Baxter argued;—The question whether the fund was heritable or moveable must be determined by the terms of the original deed of gift, Dr Rowatt's will, where this was plainly a bequest of a sum of £500, and there was no absolute direction to invest in heritable security. In a settlement of moveable estate the domicile of the testator rules the succession[2] unless there is something on the face of the deed to shew that the testator intended otherwise. The Court may construe a deed, as in the case of Thomson's Trustees, where there is only a question of grammatical construction. But this was not a question of construction, but a question of law,—whether the words si sine liberis decesserit should be engrafted into the deed. The law of Scotland said yes, the law of England no.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The fund in medio is a sum of £500 settled by the testamentary disposition of the deceased Charles Rowatt, surgeon in Campbelton. The dispute between the parties depends on the construction of certain deeds executed by a Mrs M'Millan, by which she, in exercise of a power of disposal given to her by Rowatt's settlement, provided that the £500 should be divided in a particular way, and the question immediately before us is, whether Mrs M'Millan's deeds are to be construed by the law of England or the law of Scotland.

The Lord Ordinary has found that Mrs M'Millan, "having been a domiciled Englishwoman," the effect of the provisions of her settlement must be determined according to the law of England. I think that interlocutor is not satisfactory on the face of it, because it deals with the question as if the domicile of the maker of these deeds was absolutely conclusive. I do not think it is so. The real question, as in every testamentary deed, is what was the intention of the testator? In solving that question it no doubt becomes necessary to inquire what system of jurisprudence the testator had in view in making his settlement. But it does not follow of necessity that that must be the law of his domicile. It might be his intention that his settlement should be construed by the law of a different country, and that intention might be expressed in his will. If so, now settle the interpretation of the deed; but the parties differ as to this, for while Messrs Mitchell and Baxter allege that according to the law of England the provisions of the deed must be interpreted in accordance with the language used, the other claimants maintain that according to English law a condition in their favour is implied, though not expressed, similar to the conditio si sine liberis decesserit of the Scotch law. It is thus necessary to ascertain the sound construction of the deeds according to the law of England."

---

[1] Rainsford v. Maxwell, Feb. 6, 1852, 14 D. 450, 24 Scot. Jur. 221; Ferguson v. Marjoribanks, April 1, 1853, 15 D. 637, 25 Scot. Jur. 376; Thomson's Trustee v. Alexander, Dec. 18, 1851, 14 D. 217, 24 Scot. Jur. 101.

[2] Durie v. Coutts, Nov. 30, 1791, M. 4624.

No. 39.

Dec. 3, 1875. Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

the law of that country would regulate the construction, and if from other circumstances it can be shewn that he had in view the law of a particular country, although that may not be the law of his domicile, it must govern the construction of his settlement.

Now, what are the circumstances of this case? Rowatt the elder made his settlement in 1821. He settled £500 in liferent on Mary M'Millan and her daughter Alexander, afterwards Mrs M'Millan, giving the fee to the heirs, executors, or assignees of the longest liver of these two; and he appointed his heir to give security over his heritable estate for payment of this sum if the mother or daughter should ask for it. After his death a demand for security was made, and Flora Rowatt, the heir, did, in 1827, grant a bond and disposition in security over the heritable estate. The bond is conceived in favour of three trustees for behoof of the heirs, executors, or assignees of Alexander M'Millan, her mother having predeceased. These trustees were infeft, and, as I understand, the bond is still undischarged, or, at least, was so at the death of Mrs M'Millan. Mrs M'Millan, by her first deed, conveyed this bond to her testamentary trustees, and by her second deed she provided that the principal sum in the bond should be divided among the children procreated of her marriage, or the survivor of them. These deeds executed by Mrs M'Millan are testamentary. They were prepared by a Scotch conveyancer, and are expressed in the language of Scotch conveyancing. Mrs M'Millan herself was of Scotch birth, though her legal domicile might be in England, as the wife of Peter M'Millan, who is designed in the first deed as residing in Liverpool, but in this second deed is called the mate of the "Magdalene" of Greenock. Both deeds were executed by the testatrix in Scotland. One was signed by her husband at Liverpool, but the second was signed by him at Campbelton. The subject conveyed was a heritable bond and disposition in security, and the object of the deeds was to dispose of the sum secured by that bond. Now, it appears to me that in these circumstances Mrs M'Millan and her husband could scarcely have had in view any other law than that of Scotland. The sum to be disposed of had been left by the settlement of a Scotchman, and was secured upon heritable property in Scotland, and they evidently imagined, and I think rightly, that this fund could not well be disposed of except by a Scotch deed. If there were any technicalities in these deeds I could not conceive that they should be construed by any law but the Scotch, and if so, there can be no necessity to resort to any other law.

But the argument has been pressed upon us that this is not so much a question of construction as one of succession,—whether the succession is to be regulated by the one law or the other. It is said that according to the Scotch law of succession the claimants Davies are entitled to get a share, although their mother predeceased her father, whose death was the period of distribution, but that according to the law of England they would not be entitled to any share under an English deed expressed in the same way as this. But, in truth, this is not a question on the law of succession, but a question on the construction of a deed. It may be that the one law gives a meaning to the words which the other law does not. The law of Scotland reads into the deed a condition which is not expressed. The law of England, we are told, does not do so. But the meaning of this deed, according to the law of Scotland, is, that the sum is to be divided among the children of the marriage, with the proviso, that in the event of any one of the children dying and leaving issue, such issue shall take the share of their deceasing parent. Whether the deed is to be so read or not is a question of construction. And it is clear that the maker of the deed contemplated that it would be construed by the law of Scotland.

No. 39.

Dec. 3, 1875.
Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

LORD DEAS.—We have no occasion to resort to the law of England for the solution of this question. The bequest originated in a deed of settlement by Charles Rowatt (the first), a Scotchman residing in Campbelton, and practising as a surgeon there. That deed was prepared by a Scotch conveyancer in the Scotch form, and was executed at Campbelton 21st July 1821. It bore to convey the general means and estate of the granter to his grandson, Charles Rowatt (the second), under the burden, inter alia, of a sum of £500 to be paid to "the heirs, executors, and assignees" of the survivor of two ladies, of whom the one who is designed in the record as "Mrs M'Millan" became the survivor, and had consequently the £500 at her disposal. Mr Charles Rowatt's deed of settlement stipulated that his grandson should grant heritable security for, inter alia, this £500, at whatever time he might be called upon to do so. Accordingly, the grandson's heir and successor, Flora Rowatt, executed at Edinburgh, on 2d September 1827, a bond and disposition in security in the usual Scotch form for the £500 over the heritable subjects conveyed to her predecessor by the deed of 21st July 1821. The bond was taken in favour of trustees for behoof of the heirs, executors, or assignees of Mrs M'Millan, and was followed by infeftment (duly recorded) in October 1827.

In 1830 Mrs M'Millan, with consent of her then husband, executed a deed of settlement, prepared by a Scotch solicitor in the Scotch form, disposing of the £500. The deed contained a consent to registration in the books of Council and Session for preservation and execution, and described the parties as residing in Liverpool, and was executed by the husband there, but by the wife at Edinburgh, where it was judicially ratified by her before a Scotch Justice of the Peace. This deed, however, became immaterial, being superseded by a deed of alteration, likewise prepared by a Scotch solicitor in the Scotch form, executed by the parties respectively in Scotland on 11th April 1834 and 28th January 1835, and ratified in Scotland by Mrs M'Millan before a Scotch Justice of the Peace. It designed Mrs M'Millan as residing in Campbelton, and her husband as then mate on board the "Magdalene" of Greenock; and it contained a consent to registration in the books of Council and Session for preservation. This is the operative deed by which the £500, under certain specified deductions, is provided to the children of the marriage between Mr and Mrs M'Millan, of whom there were two—a son, who is still alive, and a daughter, who survived her mother but predeceased her father leaving issue; and the question upon the merits is, whether the daughter's issue are or are not to participate in the succession. The present question, however, simply is, whether the deed of alteration is to be construed according to the law of Scotland or according to the law of England, where Mr M'Millan, and consequently also his wife, is said to have been domiciled. I cannot doubt that, apart altogether from the effect of the investment on heritable security in Scotland, the destination in the deed must be construed according to the law of Scotland. Mrs M'Millan was the principal party, and she was residing in Campbelton. Her husband was only a consenter, and he is described as mate of a ship belonging to Greenock. This deed is also in the Scotch form.

I agree with your Lordship that the question is entirely one as to the intention of Mrs M'Millan. She was the principal party, her husband, as I have said, being a mere consenter. At the date of the deed she was residing in Campbelton. Her husband was a seafaring man, who had at the time no particular residence; but assuming his domicile to have been in England, the facts I have narrated, and need not repeat, as to this deed and the deeds which preceded it, are of great importance as bearing upon the question what was the intention of the testatrix, Mrs M'Millan. There are no technicalities in the deeds, and, if there were, they would necessarily be technicalities of Scotch law and not of English law. It is a fallacy to attempt to rear out of these facts a question of legal succession, instead of a question of intention.

No. 39.

Dec. 3, 1875. Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

The question is one of intention merely; and if anything were awanting to warrant us in discovering that intention, for ourselves, in the terms of the deeds, it might be found in this, that the heritable security, which still stands good, was and is a security to the beneficiaries. Trustees were appointed for their behoof, but the heritable security inures to the beneficiaries, and this, perhaps, even more directly than if it had been granted to Mrs M'Millan herself.

I am of opinion, in every view, that it is not necessary to have recourse to the law of England.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—By the elder Rowatt's settlement Mrs M'Millan became entitled to dispose of this fund, which, under the will of the testator himself, was secured by a heritable bond. In this view I am inclined to think that the subject was truly heritable, which would be sufficient to dispose of the question.

But, apart from that, the deeds were executed in Scotland, and prepared by a Scotch conveyancer, and were to be administered in Scotland according to Scotch law and practice, and therefore I think they must be construed by the law of Scotland. That a deed must be read in the light of the law of the place where it is made is a general rule. It is true that the domicile of the maker was English. But your Lordship made some most important observations, in which I concur, in considering the effect of the domicile of a party, where that is out of the country where his deed is executed. The intention of the party must then be considered. It is plain that this woman and her husband deliberately chose Scotland as the place of execution of the deeds, because they wished to have the fund administered in Scotland. Therefore, if this is a pure question of construction, there can be no doubt that the law of Scotland applies.

I think it a nice point which was raised in the latter part of the argument, whether this is a question of construction or one of succession. But though I have felt some difficulty, I have come to the same result as your Lordship. This is not a question of intestate succession. It cannot be solved without reading the deeds. It must be determined by ascertaining the intention of the maker. The real question is, what is the meaning of the deeds, reading them in the light of the law of the place where they were made. The law of Scotland reads the deeds as meaning that the child of a child shall take if the child dies. Another way of stating the same thing is that the rule si sine liberis is to apply. But in a question of construction we do not now proceed upon it as a rule of succession apart from the deed but as a result arising out of the meaning which the law of Scotland puts upon the words of the deed.

LORD MURE.—I think the rule that such a question as this must be decided by the law of the domicile of the maker of the deed has been pressed in argument in too absolute a sense. That may be the rule in intestate succession, and it is an important element in questions of testate succession, but it is not conclusive, for there are other elements bearing on the intention of the testator, such as the place where the deed was made, and the local situation of the fund, and the place where it is intended to be administered, which must be kept in view in dealing with cases of testate succession. Now, in the present case, the deeds were made in Scotland. They relate to Scotch estate, apparently heritable, and they are to be carried out in Scotland by trustees, the majority of whom reside there. In these circumstances, the evidence of the maker's intention is very strong, to the effect that the disposition which has been made of the estate is to be regulated by the law of this country. If the domicile and the place where the will is made are the same, that will probably, in the ordinary case, lead to the result that the deed is to be construed by the law of that place. But even then, if there are no technical expressions, it may sometimes be right that a deed should be construed by the law of the country where the question arises. That was done in the case of Thomson's Trustees, referred to by the Lord Ordinary. The precedent was followed in the case of Ferguson (15 D. p. 637), and the same course appears to have been adopted in the older case of Mackay, 22d July 1760, M. 4610. I do not, therefore, think it is necessary in this case that the will should be construed by the law of England.

No. 39.

Dec. 3, 1875.
Mitchell and Baxter v. Davies.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the question raised in the competition upon the construction and effect of the deeds executed by Mrs M'Millan and her husband in 1830 and 1834-35, falls to be determined according to the law of Scotland, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly: Find the reclaimers, Davies and others, entitled to expenses since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against," &c.

MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—D. J. MACBRAIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

Poor AGNES HOBBS OR ADAMS, Pursuer.—R. Johnstone—D. Crichton.
THE GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Balfour—Jameson.

Reparation—Culpa—Collaborateur—Railway—Process—Jury Trial.—Held (1) In accordance with Calder v. Caledonian Railway Company, 9 Macph. 833, that a railway company were liable for injuries caused by the fault of a stationmaster in their employment to a fireman on the train of another railway company using their line under running powers; and (2) that the claim was not barred by contributory negligence on the part of the engine driver on the train and of another fellow-workman of the fireman.

Observations on the English cases of Thorogood v. Bryan, 1849, 8 Com. Bench Rep., 1st ser. 115, 18 L. J. C. P. 336; and Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, 1875, L. R. 10 Ex. 47.

Jury Trial.—Where a case of damages was withdrawn from a jury by a joint minute for the parties agreeing that the jury should assess the damages, leaving the question of legal liability to the Court on the record and notes of evidence, but the Judge's notes bore that at the request of the parties he had asked the jury their opinion on a particular question of fact in the case, held (diss. Lord Ormidale) that the Court was not bound by the jury's expression of opinion on that point.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

MRS AGNES HOBBS OR ADAMS brought this action against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company to recover damages for the death of her husband, James Adams, who, while a fireman in the employment

No. 40.
Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

of the Caledonian Railway Company was killed through a collision which occurred on 20th June 1874 on the defenders' Dumfries and Castle-Douglas line about a mile west of Dalbeattie.

The defenders were proprietors of the line from Dumfries to Castle-Douglas, which from Lochanhead to Castle-Douglas was a single line, worked on the train staff system. The Caledonian Company were lessees of the line from Castle-Douglas to Stranraer and Portpatrick, and, as such, under the Glasgow and South-Western Railway (Amalgamations) Act, 1865, had running powers over the defenders' Dumfries and Castle-Douglas line.*

On the 20th June 1874, about 11 o'clock forenoon, a ballast train of the defenders' was sent forward from Dalbeattie station towards Castle-Douglas, the driver of the ballast train having received the train staff from the stationmaster at Dalbeattie. The ballast train was timed to return to Dalbeattie in time to allow a Caledonian Company's goods train which was due at Dalbeattie at 12.17 P.M. to pass on its way to Stranraer and Portpatrick.

Under the train staff system it is not permissible to send forward a train from any train staff station unless the driver have received from the stationmaster or person in charge of the station the train staff, or else what is termed a train staff ticket.† Nor is it permissible to the stationmaster to give a train staff ticket unless he is at the time in possession of the train staff. In fact, it ought not to be possible for the stationmaster to give a train staff ticket without being in possession of the train staff, as the tickets should be kept in a locked box, the key to which is a part of the train staff itself. One train staff is appropriated to the portion of the line between each two train staff stations. The driver who has received from the stationmaster at one station the train staff appropriated to the portion of line over which he is going to run, delivers it to the stationmaster at the next station, who cannot despatch a train in the reverse direction until he has received it, the object being to secure that, as the line is only a single line, the trains running at any one time between two particular train staff stations shall, if more than one, always be running in the same direction.

James Adams was acting as fireman on the Caledonian goods train, which should have passed Dalbeattie at 12.17 P.M. on 20th June 1874. The train was four minutes before its time, but in passing slowly through

---

* Sec. 19 of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway (Amalgamations) Act, 1865, 28 and 29 Vict. cap ccxcviii. provides,—"The Caledonian Railway may run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description, the Castle-Douglas and Dumfries Railway, for the purpose of conveying Caledonian traffic, and the Caledonian Railway shall be entitled to the conveniences and privileges and be subject to the regulations and obligations hereinafter mentioned (that is to say), ... (5) The Caledonian Railway Company shall, in the use of the Castle-Douglas and Dumfries Railway, be subject to the bye-laws and regulations for the time in force of the company" (i.e. the Glasgow and South-Western Company).

† Form of Train Staff Ticket:—

"GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.
Train Ticket, Castle-Douglas to Dalbeattie.

(To be filled in with ink.)—Date, 187 Time, H. | M.
Train Staff following.
Signature,

The Train Staff will be shewn to the Engine Driver when giving him this Ticket, both being shewn to the Guard."

the station the driver, John Robb, received from William Douglas, clerk who was in charge, it being the stationmaster's usual hour of absence from the station, a train staff ticket, and was informed he might go on, as all was right. The stationmaster and all the other officials at Dalbeattie station were servants of the defenders. Neither the driver nor the guard of the Caledonian train asked to see the train staff, but went on, and about a mile from Dalbeattie the Caledonian goods train came into collision with the defenders' ballast train, which was returning to let the Caledonian goods train pass, and the driver of which was in possession of the train staff. In consequence of the collision Adams was killed.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer's husband having been killed by the fault of the defenders, she is entitled to reparation, as concluded for.

The defenders admitted the collision, and that Adams was, in consequence, killed on the spot. They also admitted the fault of their servant, William Douglas, the clerk who was in charge of Dalbeattie station at the time. But they stated, that according to sec. 19, sub-sec. 5, of their Act of 1865,[1] which conferred their running powers on the Caledonian Railway Company, that company were, in their use of the Dumfries and Castle-Douglas line, made subject to their (the defenders') bye-laws and regulations for the time in force; that rule 18 of the Caledonian Railway Company's rules for the guidance of their servants provided that when working over any part of the Glasgow and South-Western system of railways the rules of that company were to be observed, "and every Caledonian engineman, guard, and breakesman so working must have in his possession a copy of such rules and regulations;" that the driver of the Caledonian goods train, John Robb, and also the guard, William Robertson, were in possession of and familiar with the defenders' rules and regulations for the time in force,* and that according to these rules and regulations it was the duty of John Robb, the driver, not to have proceeded past Dalbeattie station without seeing the train staff with which the line was worked, in addition to receiving the ticket, and that it was also the duty of the guard, William Robertson, not to have allowed the train under his charge to start from Dalbeattie station without seeing the train staff; and that had he or the engine-driver complied with their duty in this respect, which both of them failed to do, the accident complained

[1] Vide, supra, p. 216, note.

* The following were amongst the rules and regulations of the defenders' company issued to the servants of the Caledonian Company working over their line:—"1st, No engine or train shall be permitted to leave any train staff station unless the train staff for the portion of the line over which it is to travel is then at the station." "3d, If other engines or trains are intended to follow before the staff can be returned a train ticket stating 'staff following' shall be given to the engine-driver, the staff being exhibited along with the ticket to both engine-driver and guard. This shall be done with all other trains till the last, when the staff itself shall be given to the engine-driver of the last train. After the staff has been sent away, no other engine or train can leave the station or junction, under any circumstances whatever, until its return." "9th, No engineman is to start with a train or engine from any train staff station until he has received the train staff or ticket." "11th, When a ballast train has to work on any portion of the line, the train staff will be given to the engine-driver. This will close that portion of the line whilst the ballast train is at work. The ballast train must proceed afterwards to one of the terminal stations of the staff to open the line before the ordinary traffic can be resumed." The following additional regulation had also been issued shortly before the accident, viz., "It shall also be the stationmaster's duty to have the 'staff or ticket' in readiness, and exhibit it to the guard, who shall not start the train until he sees the staff. The stationmaster will then hand it to the engine-driver."

No. 40.
Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

of would not have happened, as they could not have seen the staff till the return of the ballast train; that the accident was therefore due in whole or in part to neglect of duty on the part of the engine-driver and guard of the Caledonian goods train, or one or other of them, and that they were both fellow-servants of the deceased James Adams, in the employment of the Caledonian Railway Company. They also maintained that William Douglas, the clerk, and the other officials at Dalbeattie station, though in their (the defenders') employment, were fellow-workmen with the deceased James Adams in working the Caledonian traffic over the Dumfries and Castle-Douglas line, in accordance with the Act of Parliament of 1865, the practice following thereon, and the rules and regulations of the Caledonian and Glasgow and South-Western Railway Companies.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The collision complained of having been caused, or at least materially contributed to, by the fault of fellow-workmen of the deceased James Adams, the defenders are not liable in reparation to the pursuer. (3) The collision complained of having been caused, or at least materially contributed to, by the fault and negligence of the said John Robb and of the said William Robertson, who were fellow-workmen of the deceased, the defenders are not liable in reparation to the pursuer. (5) Separatim, assuming the said collision to have been caused by the fault of the said James Carmichael (the stationmaster), William Douglas (the clerk), and Thomas Hutton (a porter at Dalbeattie station), or any of them, the defenders are not liable in reparation, in respect that the said persons were at the time fellow-workmen of the deceased.

The case went to trial before Lord Young and a jury on the issue "Whether, on or about the 20th day of June 1874, near to Dalbeattie station, on the defenders' line of railway, the said James Adams was killed through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £500."

After the evidence was led a minute was adjusted and signed in these terms:—"The parties agree that the jury shall assess damages on the assumption of the defenders' liability, and that the Court shall enter a verdict for the pursuer for the damages which shall be so assessed, or for the defenders, according as they shall be of opinion on the record and notes of evidence that the defenders are or are not legally liable."

The Judge's notes of evidence also bore,—"Minute adjusted, to the effect that jury should assess damages on footing of liability, leaving legal question to Court on record and notes. At the request of the pursuer's counsel, assented to by counsel for defenders, I asked the jury their opinion on the question—Whether or not the engine-driver and guard (or either of them) of the goods train were in fault in passing the Dalbeattie station without seeing the train staff?

"The jury retired, and on their return, stated that they assessed the damages at £300, and, on the question put as above noted, that by a majority of ten to two they were of opinion that neither the engine-driver nor the guard of the goods train was in fault."*

Both parties moved the Court to enter a verdict for them.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) Admitting the fault of Douglas, the

* When the case came to be argued before the Court on the point of legal liability, a question arose as to the effect to be given to this expression of opinion by the jury. The defenders maintained that it was merely an expression of opinion, so that the Court might be informed as to what the jury thought on the point, but that it was nothing more, and that the Court were not bound by it. The pursuer maintained that it was as much part of the judicial contract between the parties that they should be bound by the jury's opinion on this point as by their assessment of damages.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

clerk in charge at the Dalbeattie station, still the deceased must be regarded as in law a fellow-workman with Douglas, and consequently the defenders were not liable to his representatives. Though not receiving his wages directly from the defenders, he was engaged to work over their line, and he was by statute and by the rules of his own company subject to their rules and regulations. At the time when the fault was committed which caused the accident he was engaged with Douglas, their clerk at Dalbeattie, in the common work of working a train over their line, and though the train was a Caledonian train they had an interest in it as they received by statute a mileage proportion of the traffic receipts. The two companies were practically amalgamated quoad this line.[1]

(2) Even if it were held that the deceased was not a fellow-workman of Douglas, the defenders' clerk at Dalbeattie, still he was a fellow-workman of Robb, the driver, and Robertson, the guard, in charge of his own train. They were undoubtedly guilty of fault in passing Dalbeattie, and accepting a train staff ticket without insisting on seeing the train staff. They were guilty of contributory negligence, without which the accident could not have happened, and their contributory negligence must be held to have attached to him, as a fellow-servant, so as to bar his representatives from recovering. It was one of the risks which he must be held to have undertaken in entering into his contract of service.

(3) If the doctrine of collaborateur were held not to extend to such a case, still he must be held as so identified with them that their contributory negligence was his contributory negligence. This had been held in England even in the case of a passenger.[2]

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) It could not be held that the deceased was a fellow-workman of the clerk in charge of the defenders' station at Dalbeattie. Both common work and common employment were necessary to make a case for the application of the doctrine of collaborateur. Here it might possibly be said that there was common work, but there certainly was no common employment. The doctrine of collaborateur was founded on the fiction that the servant had in respect of his wages contracted to run the risk of his fellow-workman's fault. The doctrine had already been stretched to its utmost limit, but the defenders' contention would carry it to a point where it would want the support even of the fiction on which it was founded, for there was no contract between the deceased and the defenders.[3]

(2) The defenders' argument, that the pursuer was barred from recovering because of the contributory negligence of the deceased's fellow-servants required for its support either the application of the doctrine of

---

[1] Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, June 17, 1858, 3 Macq. 266, 20 D. (H. of L.) 13, 30 Scot. Jur. 597; Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Macguire, June 17, 1858, 3 Macq. 300, 20 D. (H. of L.) 13, 30 Scot. Jur. 597; Degg v. Midland Railway Co. 1857, 1 Hurl. and Nor. 773, 26 L. J. Ex. 171; Waller v. South-Eastern Railway, 1863, 32 L. J. Ex. 205; Wiggett v. Fox, 1856, 25 L. J. Ex. 188.

[2] Thorogood v. Bryan, 1849, 8 Com. Bench Rep. 1st series, 115, and 18 L. J. C. P. 336; Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 1875, L. R. 10 Ex. 47; Waite v. North-Eastern Railway Company, 1859, 28 L. J. Q. B. 258; Bridge v. Grand Junction Railway Company, 1838, 3 Meeson and Welsby, 244.

[3] Gregory v. Hill, Dec. 14, 1869, 8 Macph. 282, 42 Scot. Jur. 132; Wyllie v. Caledonian Railway Company, Jan. 27, 1871, 9 Macph. 463, 43 Scot. Jur. 220; Calder v. Caledonian Railway Company, June 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 833, 43 Scot. Jur. 465; Warburton v. Great-Western Railway Company, 1866, L. R. 2 Ex. 30; Abraham v. Reynolds, 1860, 5 Wels. Hurl. and Gor. 143; Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (New York, 1870), p. 125.

No. 40.
Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

collaborateur in a still wider and more extravagant manner or the introduction of the principle of identification amongst those travelling by the same conveyance, which had never been accepted by the Courts of this country. It was certainly to be found in the English cases of Thorogood and Armstrong, relied upon by the defenders. But these decisions were not approved of by the legal profession in that country,[1] and had even been called in question on the bench,[2] and no rational principle could be adduced in support of them.[3]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has come before us upon the Judge's notes of evidence taken at the trial. Apparently the parties did not think it necessary to take a verdict from the jury at all, but they entered into a minute to the effect that "the parties agree," &c. (as quoted supra, p. 218), and therefore we are now to judge both of the facts as proved by evidence and also of the law of the case.

The nature of the case is this: It is an action brought by the widow of a man named Adams, who acted as a fireman on a goods train belonging to the Caledonian Railway Company, and running between Dumfries and Stranraer. The Caledonian Railway have running powers over the Glasgow and South-Western line, and in the course of going along that line on the morning of 20th June 1874 that train passed the Dalbeattie station about twelve o'clock. It seems that the train staff, as it is called, ought to have been exhibited, as the train was passing through that station, by the stationmaster of the South-Western line, and that the stationmaster was not entitled to allow the train to go on, or to give a ticket for that purpose, until he exhibited that train staff. He did not exhibit it, but he gave a ticket; the train went on, and a ballast train which had started in front of it, and was then returning, ran into it. There was a collision in which Adams was killed, and the present action is at the instance of his widow for reparation.

Now, in regard to the facts which I have stated, there is no doubt at all that the train staff was not exhibited. That it ought to have been exhibited, that the ticket was given without that exhibition, that, in point of fact, it could not have been exhibited, because it had gone with the ballast train, and therefore that there was fault on the part of the person in charge of the Glasgow and South-Western station is certain.

On the notes of the evidence three questions arise for consideration:—

1. Was the deceased a fellow-workman with the servants of the South-Western Company?

2. Did the servants of the Caledonian Company contribute to the injury of the deceased?

3. If they did, does their contributory fault limit or exclude the action?

On the first head it is unnecessary to resume the questions which have been so frequently discussed as to the law of reparation for injuries caused by the fault of fellow-workmen. I had occasion to state my views fully in the case of [1] Smith's Leading Cases, 6th ed. vol. i. p. 266; Addison on Torts, 4th ed. 388.

---

[2] "The Milan," 1831, 31 L. J. Prob. Mat. and Adm. 105 (Dr Lushington's Opinion).

[3] Rigby v. Hewett, 1850, 5 Wels. Hurl. and Gor. 240; Greenland v. Chaplin, 1850, 5 Wels. Hurl. and Gor. 243.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

Gregory v. Hill (8 Macph. 282), and I adhere to the views I then expressed. The ordinary rule of reparation may be stated in the words of the brocard, "culpa tenet suos auctores." In cases, however, in which the person who actually does the wrong is at the time engaged in work on the employment and under the orders of another, the law has given a wide interpretation to the term "author," and has held it to embrace the employer, on the corresponding maxim "qui facit per alium facit per se."

The Courts in England, chiefly since the passing of what is called Lord Campbell's Act, have introduced a practical limitation of the application of this last mentioned maxim in cases arising out of injuries inflicted by one fellow-servant on another, not by way of limiting the scope of the principle of liability, but by inferring an implied condition in the contract of service. It is held that the master on the one hand stipulates to be free of responsibility to the servant for injuries arising from the acts of his other servants, and the servant undertakes the risk of such acts occurring in the course of the common employment in consideration of the stipulated wages.

If the question were open it might perhaps be doubted whether any such condition can be legitimately deduced from the contract of service, and whether the supposed obligation does not partake more of the nature of a legal fiction than of that of a sound and just inference. The duty of a man to protect those whom he induces to enter his service is to the full as great as any he owes to the public. If it were thought that in the present condition of society, and the greater risks incurred in manufacture, the old doctrine of "qui facit per alium facit per se" has too wide a scope, it would have been a more convenient rule to have limited its operation to cases (whether with servants or the public) in which the master had been wanting in due and reasonable precaution. But it is too late to raise any such question. The fiction, if it be one, is firmly fixed in the law, and was found to be part of our own system by the House of Lords in the Bartonshill case (3 Macq. 266), and it is settled that a servant cannot make his master responsible for injury arising from the wrong of a fellow-servant, because, by his own contract with the master, he has barred himself from doing so. From this it follows that no one but the employer can plead the benefit of the contract, and the only question remaining on this head is whether the deceased was employed by the Glasgow and South-Western Company.

I am of opinion that the deceased was employed solely by the Caledonian Company, and that the fact that the latter had the right of running over the rails of the former, and was subject to the rules of the former in doing so, had no more effect in making the deceased the servant of that company than the use of a private wharf or pier, or a private road, would convert the persons using it into servants of the proprietor. It would be a hardship on railway companies to impose on them liability for the servants of all the companies or traders who use their line. But the case of Calder (9 Macph. 833), in which the running powers were precisely the same as in the present case, is conclusive on this point.

On the second point, I am of opinion that the engine-driver and the guard of the Caledonian train were guilty of negligence, which contributed to the death of the deceased. Understanding from Lord Young that the opinion of the jury was not intended to operate as a verdict, I have no hesitation in coming to an opposite conclusion. The engineman and the guard were both aware that it was the duty of the stationmaster to exhibit the train staff to them before giving them a ticket to proceed, and that he was not entitled to allow the train to proceed without doing so. The rules which are admitted to have been in their hands make that clear, and although the injunction on them to see the train staff before proceeding might have been more directly expressed, there could have been no reasonable doubt on their minds as to what their duty was. To hold otherwise would be to remove all security for the safety of the public.

No. 40
Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

3. On the third ground, two separate views were submitted. It was maintained, in the first place, that the contributory negligence of the fellow-servant is equivalent to the contributory negligence of the deceased himself; and secondly, that this would have been the case even if the deceased had been a passenger.

On the first view I am of opinion that it is entirely untenable. It proceeds on the idea that on some unexplained ground a servant is liable for the wrongful acts of his fellow-servant. But the doctrine I have been considering implies the reverse. The fact that a fellow-servant did, or contributed to do the wrong liberates the master; but it does not liberate the fellow-servant, who remains liable for his wrongful act, and still less can it liberate a stranger who participated in the wrong. But in no view which can be plausibly stated can the injured man be responsible for the acts of a fellow-servant, with whom he has no contract, nor can these free from responsibility a third party, with whom he had not only no contract, but no relations—culpa tenet suos auctores; and if this action had been directed against the stationmaster, he never could have been heard to maintain that he was not liable for his own wrong because a fellow-servant of the deceased was also liable. The second view must be carefully examined.

The proposition maintained by the defenders on this head, as I understand it, is the following,—That if in the execution of a contract of carriage between a public carrier and a passenger the passenger be injured through the joint fault of the carrier and a third party the passenger has no right of action against the third party, who is to escape altogether because the carrier and the passenger are in law identical, and are responsible for the acts of each other, and the passenger thus caused or contributed to his own injury.

On any principles or analogies with which we are familiar the mere enunciation of such a proposition would be sufficient to refute it; but we have been referred by the defenders to the case of Thorogood v. Bryan, in the English Common Law Courts (1849, 18 Law Journal, C. P. 336), and the recent case of Armstrong v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (1875, L. R. 10 Exch. 47), as giving it sanction. I have read these cases attentively, and certainly the opinions in the case of Thorogood affirm the proposition I have stated to its full extent. The case of Thorogood was this: It was an action by a passenger in one omnibus against the proprietors of another omnibus in order to obtain reparation for injury sustained through being run over by the latter omnibus while alighting from the former. It was pleaded for the proprietors of the latter omnibus—and the plea was sustained by the Common Law Court—that in respect that the driver of the omnibus from which the plaintiff was alighting had been in fault also, and that the plaintiff being a passenger was identified with the driver, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore could not obtain reparation. Now, that is the proposition which is given effect to in Thorogood's case, and is pleaded here, and I am far from saying that if we were to follow that precedent it is not directly applicable. But before we can be expected to follow the opinions of English Judges, entitled and certain to receive at our hands deserved respect, we must have something more than mere judicial asseveration for our guidance, some intelligible principle, some foundation in law and reason, in support of the rule. After carefully examining this case of Thorogood, I entirely sympathise with the surprise expressed by Dr Lushington (in the case of "The Milan," 31 Law Jour. Prob. Mat. and Adm. 105), at the judgment itself, and the inability which that great lawyer felt to comprehend the grounds on which it proceeded. It has not been received with favour by the profession in England, as the significant passage in Smith's Leading Cases (6th ed. i. 266) sufficiently shews; but as the Judges in the recent case of Armstrong certainly expressed approval of it (although their remarks were obiter), and the scope of the principle or rule is very wide, it may be right to examine the matter closely, and ascertain to what amount of authority the decision is entitled.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

The ground, such as it is, on which the judgment in Thorogood's case is defended by the Judges who pronounced it, as far as I can understand it, is the supposed identity in law between the carrier and the passenger, and I presume that identity holds in every contract of carriage, and makes the passenger or the customer liable for the wrongful acts of the carrier. No stronger expression could be used to imply mutual responsibility than identity. The persons, that is to say, are one and the same, and the acts of the one are the acts of the other, as if they had been master and servant, or principal and agent. But this is merely the rule of "qui facit per alium facit per se" in a very questionable, and, indeed, as with deference I think it, extravagant application of it. The very maxim which it taxed the ingenuity of Courts to abridge, when the effect was to shelter the master from responsibility for the acts of his servant, is now revived in this shape, with the effect of protecting the actual wrongdoer from the legitimate consequences of his own wrong.

If it be true that the wrongful act of the carrier is constructively and by imputation the wrongful act of the passenger, it necessarily follows that whenever a third party is injured in the course of the execution of the carrier's contract by rail, every passenger in the train is liable to make reparation to the person so injured, because, being identical with the carrier, and responsible for his wrongful acts, they did, or contributed to, the injury.

I am quite aware that the Judges in Thorogood's case had no intention of giving any countenance to such a demand. But I see not how it is to be avoided, excepting on the assumption, which is manifestly true, that the passenger is not identified with the carrier, and is not responsible for what he does. I can only infer that the identity spoken of is not to be understood of a complete legal identity, but that the term is used in a popular sense, sufficient to exclude the action, but not capable of being, nor intended to be carried out to all its other legitimate and logical results.

The question whether the passenger contributed to the injury is a matter of fact, which cannot be partially true, and partially false. But is there any ground for holding it to be true in any sense? It seems clear to me that the element which is essential to the application of the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se is entirely absent in the relation of carrier and passenger, namely, the element of authority and control. No man can be responsible for the acts of another who has no authority over him. The contract of carriage is a branch of the contract locatio operis, and has well known incidents and obligations. The carrier is bound to carry the passenger safely, and if he fails so to do he is guilty of a breach of contract. The passenger is bound to pay the fare contracted for, and there the legal relation ends. There is beyond this no more identity between them than exists between a Liverpool trader who commissions and the Clyde shipbuilder who builds a ship, or between an English railway company which orders and the manufacturer at Carron who constructs a boiler. They are independent parties to a contract, and neither has control or authority over the other.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

It was suggested in one of these cases that the carrier might be considered as the agent of the passenger. I do not think he can be so considered, unless in law he is the agent of the passenger, and he is not the agent of the passenger. There is no contract of principal and agent between the parties, and no such relation is implied in the contract of carriage. The carrier does not act on the passenger's authority, but on his own. He runs his public vehicle at his own pleasure, at such times, in such places, and in such manner as he thinks fit. If these things form part of his contract he must fulfil them, but he is in no respect subject to the passenger's orders or direction. It follows, therefore, that the carrier is not the agent of the passenger.

No doubt, although the contract of carriage does not imply any mutual responsibility for the acts of those who are parties to it, either may so act as to be participant in the wrongful acts of the other. The passenger may trust himself to a driver whom he knows to be intoxicated or incapable. He may sit beside the driver and take the reins. He may bribe the driver to drive at a dangerous pace, and in many other ways may contribute to his own injury, or that of another. But his liability for such acts will be direct, and will depend on his own delict. As long as he simply acts under his contract he has no responsibility for those who are employed to convey him.

It was suggested in the case of Thorogood that the passenger selected the vehicle in which he chose to travel, and therefore became responsible for the wrongful acts of the driver. I do not know what virtue there may be in the term "selected," but I suppose the same thing may be said of every man who uses a public conveyance. Selecting the vehicle only means that he used it, and how the use of a public conveyance by a passenger should be a wrongful act I am quite unable to understand.

I am therefore of opinion that our judgment must be for the pursuer, with the sum of £300 of damages, as found by the jury.

Lord Ormidale.—Accidents on railways and consequent actions of damages are unfortunately so frequent—perhaps unavoidably so—that it is right I should in the present case fully explain the grounds upon which I have formed my opinion.

The issue in this case which raised the question, whether the pursuer's deceased husband, who was in the service of the Caledonian Railway Company as fireman of a goods train, was killed through the fault of the defenders, in place of being left to be disposed of by the jury in the ordinary way was withdrawn from them in terms of a joint minute by which the parties agreed that "the jury shall assess damages," &c. (as quoted supra, p. 218).

The damages were assessed by the jury at £300; and the Judge's notes bear that,—"At the request of the pursuer's counsel," &c. (as quoted supra, p. 218).

Each of the parties claimed the verdict, and moved the Court accordingly.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

The defenders maintained they were not liable, in respect, 1st, That the pursuer's husband, and their servant who commited the fault, were at the time of the occurrence fellow-servants engaged in the same common work; and 2d, That, at any rate, the pursuer's husband was the fellow-servant of the driver and guard of the goods train of which he was fireman, and that the driver and guard were in fault in passing the Dalbeattie station without having the train staff exhibited, which, on the doctrine of contributory fault, disentitled the pursuer to recover, it being clear that without this fault on their part the collision which resulted in the death of the pursuer's husband could not have taken place.

1. In regard to the first of these propositions, it cannot be disputed, and, as I understood, was not disputed, that the defenders' servant in charge of the Dalbeattie Station was in fault in directing or allowing the goods train, of the engine of which the pursuer's husband was fireman, to pass at a time when the train staff neither was nor could have been exhibited. The defenders' argument proceeded upon this assumption. The only point, indeed, attempted to be made on the part of the defenders under this branch of their case was founded on the further assumption that their faulty servant and the deceased were fellow-servants engaged "in the same common work." The basis of the defenders' argument, as thus stated by themselves, is somewhat peculiar, and at once suggests the question, whether on their own shewing their contention can be sustained, for I take it to be clear that in order to constitute the relation of fellow-servants not only must they be engaged on the same work but also under the same employment. Waiving, however, this and any other criticism on the language used by the defenders, their case, on this branch of it, appears to me to be fatally defective, for the reason that their faulty servant and the pursuer's deceased husband cannot, in any reasonable or correct sense, be held on the evidence to have been on the occasion in question within the doctrine established and settled by the House of Lords in a series of consecutive judgments (Bartonshill-Coal Company, 3 M'Queen's House of Lords Cases, pp. 266 and 300, and Wilson v. Merry and Cunninghame, L. R. 1 Scotch App. 326), to the effect that where the injury caused by the negligence or unskilfulness of a servant is sustained not by the public, but by another servant acting in the same employment, under the same master or employer, the master or employer is not liable unless there be proof of general incompetency on the part of the servant causing the injury, or insufficiency or defectiveness in the machinery or other appliances furnished by the masters, the reason of this being that although a servant may be taken to have engaged to encounter all risks which are incident to the service he undertakes, he cannot be expected to anticipate those which may happen to him on occasions foreign to his employment. Applying the doctrine thus established to the present case, I think it is impossible to hold that the defenders, the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, were the masters or employers of the pursuer's deceased husband. There was no contract of service between them; he was not in their employment at all, but in a different service, and under different masters or employers altogether. The defenders' servant therefore by whose negligence or unskilfulness the fatal injury was caused to the pursuer's husband, and the latter, were not fellow-servants engaged in the same service, or under the same master or employment. And, if this be so, there is no room for the assumption that the pursuer's deceased husband when he entered the service of the Caledonian Company must have engaged to encounter not only all the risks incident

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875. Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

to that service, but also all the risks incident to the service of the defenders' company, in which he never was.

Not only does it appear that the rule, but also that the reason of the rule, established by the cases referred to is inapplicable to the present case.

Accordingly, in circumstances in all essential respects similar to those which occur here, it was in Calder v. The Caledonian Railway Company (9 Macph. 833) held unanimously by the Court that a railway company was liable in damages for injuries caused by the fault of a pointsman in their employment to the guard of a train belonging to another company while passing over a portion of the line of the former company; and this judgment is entitled to all the more weight that it followed on the case of Gregory v. Hill (8 Macph. 282), decided not two years before, on the same grounds, and to the same effect.

It is true that the Acts of Parliament regulating the running powers of the Caledonian Company, in whose employment the deceased was on the occasion in question a servant, were nominally different from those in the case of Calder v. The Caledonian Railway Company, but on the clauses in both, so far as they related to the matters in dispute, being examined in the course of the discussion in the present case, it was conceded that there was no substantial difference in their terms.

In the words, therefore, of the Lord President, who delivered the judgment of the Court in Calder's case, it appears to me that the Caledonian Company, and the deceased, one of their servants, are to be considered as strangers to the defenders' company, and their servant who committed the fault. And, if I am right in this, the first ground on which the defenders maintain their case entirely fails.

2. The other and only other ground on which the defenders rely is to this effect, that the pursuer's husband was, if not the fellow-servant of the individual in the employment of the defenders who committed the fault, the fellow-servant of the driver and guard of the goods train of which he was fireman, and that as the guard and driver were in fault in passing the Dalbeattie Station without having the train staff exhibited to them, the pursuer is, on the principle of contributory negligence, debarred from recovering damages. This proposition involves different considerations from those which have been already noticed, and may, in consequence of the English decisions which were cited in the course of the argument, be held to be attended with some difficulty.

Clear, however, it is, that if the Court is to be guided by the opinion of the jury as stated in the notes, neither the engine-driver nor the guard of the goods train,—the only fellow-servants of the deceased who are said to be implicated,—was in fault, and if so all room for the defenders' contention under this branch of their case is excluded. But it was strenuously urged that although both parties are stated in the notes to have assented to the opinion of the jury being taken on the question of fault, it was not intended that they should be bound by it. Now, I must own my reluctance to accede to this view, which necessarily assumes that the parties meant nothing by consenting to the opinion of the jury being taken, and that neither was to be bound by it. I cannot understand how this could be, and, for myself, I cannot help thinking that the correct course would be for the Court now to hold both parties bound by the opinion of the jury obtained as it was of mutual consent.

If this course, however, is not to be adopted, and assuming that the Court is entitled to determine for itself, on a consideration of the evidence, whether the

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

deceased's fellow-servants, the engine-driver and guard of the goods train, of which he was fireman, were, on the occasion in question, in fault, as well as the defenders' servant, I would be disposed to hold that they were. Without entering into details, it appears to me that it was the duty, as enjoined by the rules of the service, of the engine-driver and guard not to have passed, on the occasion in question, Dalbeattie Station without seeing the train staff, and that they were in fault in doing so. The question of law is thus raised, whether the fault of the deceased's fellow-servants—for it is not said the deceased was in fault himself—excludes the pursuer's right to recover damages on the ground that their fault must be held to have been contributory fault on the part of the deceased.

So far as I am aware, this question has not been the subject of direct decision in Scotland; and I cannot help thinking that a decision now in the affirmative of it would be inconsistent alike with sound principle and the reasoning on which the House of Lords proceeded in the cases which have been referred to, viz., that in order to support the defence of an employer to an action at the instance of a servant for injury sustained in the course of his employment, it is necessary for the master to shew that it was not he who was in fault, but a fellow-workman of the sufferer engaged in the same employment, and this because it must be presumed that the sufferer, in entering the service, undertook all the risks of that service arising from the fault of his fellow-workmen engaged in the same employment. This doctrine may perhaps be thought, and I believe has been thought by many, to go far enough adversely to workmen, but to extend it still farther and to say, not only that a workman who has sustained injury in the course of his service through the fault of a fellow-workman cannot maintain action for reparation against his employer, but also to say that he cannot do so against another party altogether, for an injury sustained through the fault, not of a fellow-workman in the same employment, or at the same work with himself, but in the employment and at the work of that other party, between whom and the sufferer there was no contract of service whatever, would, I think, be altogether inconsistent with sound principle and good sense. To take the present case as an illustration of what I mean, let me ask how is it possible to suppose that the deceased when he entered into the employment of the Caledonian Company can be presumed to have undertaken not only all the risks of that employment including the risk of injury caused by his fellow-workmen engaged in the same service, but also all the risks of service with the defenders' into which he never entered, and of whose workmen he knew nothing, and between whom and himself there never was, in any correct sense, any community of work or interest whatever? It is surely more consistent with reason and with established law to hold in such a case that the defenders must on the principles involved in the maxims qui facit per alium, and respondeat superior, be answerable for the consequences of the death of the pursuer's husband, caused by the fault of one of their servants who was not a fellow-servant of the deceased.

But the defender maintained in reference to various English cases—none of them, however, decided in the House of Lords—that the question is no longer open, but must be held to be conclusively settled against the pursuer. The decisions of the English Courts and the opinions of the English Judges are always received in this Court with the greatest respect. It so happens, however, that the English decisions bearing on the present question were shewn at the discussion not to be uniform, and as none of them appear as yet to have been under the consideration, or to have received the approval of the House of Lords, they cannot be held as conclusive. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the English cases, or at least such of them as the defenders seemed chiefly to rely upon, viz., the cases of Thorogood v. Bryan (18 Law Journal, Com. Pleas, p. 336), and Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (Law Reports, 10 Ex. p. 47). In the former the action for reparation was at the instance of a passenger by one omnibus, who, after he had got out and was standing on the road, was knocked over and injured by the pole of another omnibus, and the Court of Exchequer appear to have held that if the accident was caused by the fault not only of the passenger himself but of the driver of the omnibus in which he had been a passenger he would be disentitled to recover. The precise principle, however, on which this was held is not easily discoverable from the report of the case. Mr Justice Coltman, who gave the leading opinion, seems to have held that a passenger in a public omnibus is so identified with the driver of it as to make the fault of the former the fault of the latter; and in the case of Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company where a passenger by one of two railway trains belonging to different companies was injured in consequence of the fault of both companies, the Judges of the Court of Exchequer seem to have expressed an approval of or perhaps I should rather say stated that they did not dissent from the decision in Thorogood's case. But only two Judges, Barons Bramwell and Pollock, composed the Court in deciding Armstrong's case, and they do not appear to have been agreed either in their understanding of the principle upon which Thorogood's case was decided, or of the principle on which they proceeded themselves in deciding Armstrong's case. While it is not very easy to see what was the understanding of Baron Bramwell as to the principle of decision in Thorogood's case, Baron Pollock expressly says that he felt a difficulty in consequence of the use of the word "identified" in that judgment, and he goes on to add, "But what I understand it to mean is, that the plaintiff, for the purpose of the action, must be taken to be in the same position as the owner of the omnibus or his driver." So, according to this explanation, it would seem to follow that every passenger in a public omnibus, or other vehicle, must be held, in regard at least to any action for reparation in respect of injury sustained through the fault of another omnibus or vehicle, to be in the same situation as the driver or owner of the vehicle in which he was himself a passenger.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

Now, I must say that I cannot assent to a doctrine so very startling in itself, and so serious as regards its consequences. On the contrary, I can see no reason why in the present case the defenders, who are admittedly wrongdoers through the fault of one of their servants, should not be held liable to the pursuer as representative of a person who was himself free from fault, and not answerable for the fault of the defenders or any one in their employment. Nor can I think that the opposite doctrine, which seems to have been given effect to by the learned Judges in the cases of Thorogood and Armstrong, has been as yet so established that it ought to be followed or adopted without a more thorough discussion, and a more authoritative judgment than it has yet received. Not only has it been adversely criticised by the profession in England, as in Smith's Leading Cases (6th ed. vol. i. p. 266), and Mr Addison's book on Torts (4th ed. p. 388), but that it has not been hitherto accepted in the Courts in England as settled law is clear from the case cited in the report of Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company of "The Milan," where Dr Lushington expressly said that he declined to be bound by Thorogood v. Bryan.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

I am therefore, for the reasons now stated, of opinion that the defenders have failed in both branches of their argument, and that the verdict in this case should be entered for the pursuer for the damages assessed by the jury.

LORD GIFFORD.—In this case, after the evidence had been led, the parties agreed to withdraw the whole case from the jury, excepting the mere assessment of damages, and consented that the jury should assess the damages on the footing of liability, leaving the legal question of liability to the Court on the record and notes of evidence. That was a judicial bargain by which the parties became bound. It was acted upon. The jury, on the assumption of liability, assessed the damages at £300, and there the duty of the jury under the joint minute terminated. But at the same time, and at the request of the pursuer's counsel, assented to by the counsel for the defenders, the presiding Judge asked the jury their opinion as to whether or not the engine-driver and guard of the goods train were in fault in passing Dalbeattie Station without seeing the train staff. To that question the jury gave an answer, by a majority of ten to two, that neither the engine-driver nor the guard was in fault.

The first question with which we have to deal is, whether the Court, in now disposing of the case, are bound by this answer of the jury to the special question put to them, and whether the Court must take it as conclusive that no fault attached to the guard and driver of the Caledonian train. On that point I think that the bargain of parties embodied in the minute must receive full effect. The parties have made the Court, and not the jury, the judge of the facts upon the notes of the evidence. If the question put to the jury by the Judge at the request of counsel was intended to modify the terms of the joint minute for the parties the minute itself should have been altered. I do not think the parties, in consenting to the special question being put to the jury, intended to depart in any degree from the bargain contained in the joint minute. I may add that, even if the answer of the jury to this question were taken as a verdict on a special point of the case, I should be prepared to hold it as contrary to evidence. But I would rather take the broad ground, that it was not within the bargain of the parties that the Court should be excluded and held bound by this answer of the jury as by a verdict, and that the joint minute cannot be held as departed from.

Now, upon the facts as disclosed on the notes of evidence I have no doubt whatever that the lamentable accident out of which this case has arisen was caused by the fault of three persons—first, of the acting stationmaster at Dalbeattie, who, in violation of a rule essentially necessary for the safe working of a single line, and emphatically enjoined upon the servants of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, allowed a train to go forward on a single line when the train staff was not in his possession. Nothing is more emphatically laid down in the company's rules than that, once the train staff is away from a station, no more trains are to be forwarded in the same direction. Now, the acting stationmaster gave the driver a train ticket, which was admissible, indeed, if he had had the train staff in his possession, but which was directly in violation of the rules when he had not the train staff, which was, in fact, on its way back to him on board of the ballast train. Not only was he in fault in this, but also in having the bundle of train tickets lying open and accessible, instead of being locked up in their proper receptacle, which could only be opened by a key connected with the train staff.

The second and third persons whose fault contributed to cause the accident

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

were the engine-driver and guard of the Caledonian train. The duty of the driver on entering a single line was to get the train staff itself, or, if he only got a train ticket, then to see that the train staff was at the station. The duty of the guard was to see the train staff at the station, and to see that it was in the hands of the stationmaster or given to the driver. In the case of a train starting with a train ticket, it was the duty of both driver and guard to see that the staff was in the possession of the stationmaster. They both failed in this duty. The rules under which they were working, and which were admittedly in their possession, bore that "no engine or train shall be permitted to leave any train staff station unless the train staff for the portion of the line over which it is to travel is then at the station." The additional rule, that "it shall also be the stationmaster's duty to have the staff or ticket in readiness, and exhibit it to the guard, who shall not start the train until he sees the staff." "The stationmaster will then hand it to the engine-driver" was added as an additional precaution. It was contained in a set of additional regulations, which there is evidence to shew were attached as an appendix to the document issued monthly to the servants of the Caledonian Company working over this part of the South-Western system as a working time-table.

There were, therefore, three individuals who must either see or have the train staff before the train starts, and thus secure the safety of the train by seeing that the train staff was at the station, and hence that no train could be coming in an opposite direction.

Now, on these facts certain questions of law arise. In the first place, was the pursuer's husband, to whom no fault is attributed, the fellow-servant of those who were in fault? He was certainly the fellow-servant of the driver and guard of his own train, for they were all in the service of the Caledonian Company. If the action had been raised against the Caledonian Railway Company it would have been excluded by the well-known rule that a servant cannot recover against his master for injury sustained through the fault of a fellow-servant.

The next question is whether the deceased Adams was or was not a fellow-servant of Douglas, the remaining man whose fault caused the accident, and whether the fault of Douglas, who was acting for the Glasgow and South-Western Company's stationmaster at Dalbeattie, disentitles the pursuer to recover against the South-Western Company. Now, was Adams the fellow-servant of Douglas? I think not. Douglas was the servant of the Glasgow and South-Western Company, and of them only. He was in no sense the servant of the Caledonian Company, though he had certainly some duties to perform with reference to passing Caledonian trains. Almost all the servants of a railway company have some duties to perform towards the passing trains of any other company which has running powers over their own company's line, and it would lead to absurd and inconvenient results if they were all to be held servants of the company exercising the running powers. The Caledonian Company, having running powers, is not really in a different position from any private trader who chooses to run his own locomotive and waggons; and surely the servants of such private trader could not be held to be fellow-servants with all the railway company's servants. But as there are no specialties in this case, I need not go further on this point, for it is directly disposed of by the decision of the other Division in the case of Calder v. Caledonian Railway Company, in which I entirely concur, and by which I am bound. Therefore, I take it, Douglas, the South-Western Company's servant, who was in fault, was not the fellow-servant of Adams.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

The last question, and perhaps the most difficult of all, is, whether the pursuer is disentitled to recover, because not only Douglas was in fault, but also the driver and guard of her husband's own train. This question is one of nicety, and authorities have been referred to in the English Courts which are of the greatest weight, and with which we must deal deliberately. Now, in the first place, the principle of collaborateur does not, in any way, interfere with the direct application of the maxim, culpa tenet suos auctores, but only with the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se. No defence whatever is given by it to the collaborateur or fellow-servant who is guilty of fault, but only to the common master. If one servant causes injury to a fellow-servant he is as much liable to him in a direct action as if he was a total stranger. Therefore, whether they were fellow-servants or not, Adams' widow has a direct action against Douglas, as well as against the driver and guard. All the actual wrongdoers are, conjunctly and severally, liable to the person whom they have injured. The only question is, whether she has also a direct action against Douglas' masters. The only defence against that action is that, besides Douglas, Robb and Robertson, the driver and guard of the goods train, contributed to the injury. That is not, in my opinion, a good defence. It would be a very strong thing to hold that, merely because a fellow-servant is to blame as well as a third party, therefore the injured person is not to recover against that third party or his master. If the pursuer has a good action against Douglas, why not against Douglas' employer? I can see no principle whatever why he should not. Suppose this had been a passenger train, could it be contended that the passengers were debarred from recovering against the South-Western Company because the driver and guard of their own train were also in fault? Were it not for the two English cases of Thorogood and Armstrong I should have had no difficulty on the point. With regard to these cases, I concur in the remarks of your Lordship in the chair. I can find no principle on which they can be held to proceed. On the contrary, I think they go clearly against principle. Fortunately we have not only the adverse criticism of standard writers on the law of England, but also the authority of that great lawyer, Dr Lushington, to support us. I therefore decline to be bound by the cases of Thorogood and Armstrong till they are endorsed by a higher authority.

Therefore, in law and on the facts disclosed, I am of opinion that the South-Western Company are liable to the pursuer of this action, and that a verdict should be entered up for her for £300, the assessed amount of damages.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having considered the issue, the minute No. 20 of process, and the Judge's notes of evidence, find for the pursuer, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons for £300; and find the pursuer entitled to expenses, including the expenses of the trial, and remit to the Auditor," &c.

ROBERT PRINGLE, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Mackintosh
v. Ross.

A. S. Ross or Mackintosh, Petitioner (Appellant).—Lancaster—Mackintosh.
Ann Ross or Robertson and Others, Petitioners.—D.-F. Watson—Thoms.
Andrew Gildart Reid, Petitioner.—Fraser.

Process—Petition for Service—Appeal for Jury Trial—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), sec. 41.—When a petitioner for service appeals for jury trial from the Sheriff of Chancery under the 41st section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, the Court will consider whether the case is suitable for jury trial, but the appellant has a right to jury trial unless cause is shewn to the contrary. It is not a sufficient reason for refusing jury trial that the evidence in the case mainly consists of a large mass of correspondence and other documentary evidence as to pedigree.

1st Division.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

(Sequel of case reported May 30, 1873, 11 Macph. 637.)

In May 1872 Mrs Christina Cockburn Ross died vested in the lands of Shandwick.

Competing petitions for service were presented by Mrs Agnes Stuart Ross or Mackintosh, A. M. Ross, and others.

The petitions were conjoined by the Sheriff of Chancery, and were then brought before the Court by an appeal under the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 41,* at the instance of Mrs Mackintosh.

The Court, on 30th May 1873, dismissed the petition of A. M. Ross, and appointed the other petitioners to lodge issues.

Issues having been adjusted, the petitioner Reid moved the Lord Ordinary to appoint the case to be sent to proof before a Judge instead of to a jury.

His Lordship reported the case verbally to the First Division.

Argued for Reid;—The case depended on a mass of documentary evidence, which it had taken more than two years to recover from different parts of the world, and which was unsuitable for the consideration of a jury. The principle was the same as in consistorial causes, which were never sent to a jury.

Mrs Mackintosh, the appellant from the Sheriff of Chancery, argued that she had a statutory right to jury trial; and besides, that the case was quite suitable for a jury properly directed by the Judge.

At advising,—

Lord President.—When this case was before us on 30th May 1873 we pronounced an interlocutor dismissing the petition of one claimant, who is now out of the case, and appointing the other parties to lodge issues. We did not in express terms find that the case ought to be tried by jury. But before ordering issues we certainly formed an opinion how the case ought to be tried. I expressed my opinion that it ought to be tried by jury. The other Judges concurred in that opinion, and I observe that Lord Deas mentions, as the great

* Titles to Land Consolidation Act (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), sec. 41.—"In all cases in which competing petitions presented to the Sheriff . . . . have been conjoined as aforesaid . . . . . it shall be competent to any of the parties at any time before proof is begun to be taken by the Sheriff . . . . to remove the proceedings to the Court of Session by a note of appeal, ... which note of appeal shall be proceeded with in like manner with notes of appeal presented with a view to jury trial against judgments of the Sheriff Courts of Scotland, and such judgment shall be pronounced on the said note of appeal as shall be just; and in the event of it appearing proper that the cause should be tried by a jury, the same shall be tried according to the law and practice in trials by jury of causes in the Court of Session, ... and the verdict . . . . shall be equally final and conclusive with the verdicts returned in trials by jury in the said Court, but with all and the like remedies by bill of exceptions, motion for a new trial, or otherwise, competent in regard to such verdicts . . . ."

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1875.
Mackintosh v. Rosa.

advantage of trial by jury, "that the verdict fixes the matter of fact which otherwise would be open to controversy in this Court and in the House of Lords."

It is quite open to us to reconsider this matter, and if I were now satisfied that this case differed from ordinary cases of pedigree in any essential point, so as to make it unsuitable for jury trial, I should be willing to alter our decision, but I cannot come to that conclusion. It is important to attend to the position of the parties under the Titles to Land Act. They go before the Sheriff of Chancery with their petitions maintaining their various claims. The decision of the Sheriff, on matters of fact, is equivalent to the verdict of a jury. It cannot be reviewed except on the ground of error in law or as being against evidence, the latter being a very unlikely ground of objection to the verdict of a Sheriff of Chancery. Now, any one of the parties may not desire that the questions of fact should be conclusively settled by the Sheriff, and may prefer that the case should be tried by a jury; and he is entitled, under sec. 41, to bring the competition here for that purpose. We are directed to consider the question whether the case ought to be tried by a jury, and, if so, to send it for trial. I do not say that in this class of cases we are bound to follow our practice in ordinary appeals under the 40th section of the Judicature Act of George IV., because it was plainly intended that these latter cases should not be tried in this Court except by jury trial, so that they might be finally tried here on appeal, and not go to the House of Lords. But here the case is different. One party says, "I want jury trial"; another may say, "I don't object to your taking the cause away from the Sheriff, but jury trial is unsuitable; let it be tried by the Court." But still the party who appeals has a certain statutory right which is not to be defeated except on good cause shewn. Here I do not see sufficient reason for interfering with that right. If I saw grounds sufficiently strong I should not hesitate to do it.

It is said that the evidence will be chiefly documentary, because the facts are beyond human memory. I am not sure that that of itself is any reason for withdrawing the case from a jury. If inferences are to be drawn not from deeds but from miscellaneous documents and correspondence, that is a very proper subject for the consideration of a jury. Besides, where there are a great many ancient documents there often arise incidental issues of a very peculiar kind—for example, as to whether documents are genuine or fabricated. Surely that is a jury question. Those who have had experience in such cases know how frequently, and sometimes how unexpectedly, such questions arise; and, for my own part, I should very much desire to have the benefit of a jury in deciding them. To take another example, we know that tombstones, which are documentary evidence in a certain sense, often require a great deal of investigation, and (in order to appreciate their value as evidence) just that every-day common-sense power of discriminating between truth and falsehood, which is the best attribute of a jury, is required. I cannot see, therefore, that the abundance of documentary evidence affords any reason why the case should not be tried by a jury.

LORD DEAS.—It was stated to us, when this case was formerly before us, that there would be a large mass of documentary evidence, but we did not think this conclusive against the expediency of a jury trial. Apart, however, from any opinion we expressed then, I should come to the same conclusion now. I agree with your Lordship that we are warranted in exercising a larger discretion as to the mode of trial in these appeals from the Sheriff of Chancery than in ordinary

No. 41.
Dec. 7, 1875.
Mackintosh v. Ross.

Sheriff Court cases. At the same time good cause must be shewn why the case is not to go to a jury. In the Fenton Livingstone case the question came to be altogether a question of law. And the Breadalbane case came largely to turn on a legal question also. I do not say it is necessary in every case to shew such strong grounds as were shewn in these cases for taking the course we there did, but I do not see any sufficient ground here for doing otherwise than sending the case to a jury.

Lord Ardmillan.—I concur in thinking that the appellant has a certain statutory right to jury trial when he demands it, not indeed absolute, but a right not to be defeated unless good reason is shewn.

I think we had before us on the former occasion most of the materials for disposal of this question as to the mode of procedure, even though the case may have expanded. But if we are now again to consider whether any sufficient reason has been shewn for refusing to the appellant the mode of trial which he desires, and came to this Court to obtain, then I must say that, in my opinion, no such reason has been shewn. There must be a number of witnesses, and the credibility of witnesses is a jury question.

There is a great deal of correspondence, but the authenticity of correspondence is a question very proper for a jury with the assistance of the Court, for, as the appellant's counsel observe, we are not to contrast the judgment of the Court with the unaided judgment of the jury. In Scotland we do not attach excessive weight to the opinion of experts or engravers. The best proof of authenticity is of a simple and more practical kind. Then as to the inferences to be drawn from a series of letters a distinction must be drawn,—a proper legal presumption or inference of law is for the Court to decide or to direct. But moral and ethical inferences from one, or more, or all, of a long series of letters is fair matter for the decision of a jury, aided by the Court. Therefore, while admitting the right of the parties to raise this question, and acknowledging that the case might have been satisfactorily tried by a Judge, I think that the appellant had, to a certain extent, a right to select the course of procedure, and that the other petitioners have shewn no sufficient cause why we should interfere with the statutory privilege in the exercise of which the appellant has come to this Court to claim a trial by jury.

Lord Mure.—I agree with your Lordships in thinking that appeals of this kind stand in a somewhat different position from those under the Judicature Act of George IV. At the same time, it occurs to me that the appellant, under this 41st section of the Titles to Land Act, has a certain statutory privilege of choosing trial by jury, subject to the discretion of the Court, upon a motion being made to have it otherwise disposed of.

If the case, however, were before me for the first time I should have felt some difficulty in deciding it; for I understand that the oral evidence will apply not to the material parts of the case but to parts of the pedigree which are not in dispute. But looking to what passed when the case was before the Court in May 1873, I can see no such change of circumstances as should now lead us to come to a different conclusion. After all, I do not see why this case should not be as well tried by jury as the Woodburnden case or the Morgan case, and I never heard it said that these cases were not satisfactorily tried.

H. & A. Inglis, W.S.—George Wilson, S.S.C.—Hunter, Blair, & Cowan, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN R. KIRKWOOD, Pursuer.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
AGNES WRIGHT OR KIRKWOOD, Defender.—Blair.

No. 42.

Dec. 9, 1875.
Kirkwood v. Kirkwood.

Proof—Witness—Adultery—Criminating Questions—37 and 38 Vict. c. 64, sec. 2.—The provision of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1874, that "no witness shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to shew that he has been guilty of adultery," is solely for the protection of the witness, and if he is willing to answer such a question the defender in an action for divorce has no right to object to its being put or answered.

Observations by the Lord President on the duty of the Judge in such cases.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

IN an action of divorce for adultery by J. R. Kirkwood, baker, Falkirk, against his wife, Arthur Brown, with whom the defender was stated in the pursuer's condescendence to have committed adultery, was examined as a witness for the pursuer. He deponed,—"I know the defender, Mrs Kirkwood. I first saw her about the beginning of November 1870. I met her in Stanley Road, Liverpool, in a public house. We had a little conversation and a few drinks together. (Q.) Did you make any arrangement about meeting her again? (Question objected to. Objection repelled)."

The Lord Ordinary having assoilzied the defender, the pursuer reclaimed.

The defender argued, inter alia, that both at common law and under the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1874,* the Lord Ordinary ought to have sustained the above objection as tending to shew that the witness was guilty of adultery.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found the adultery proved. In delivering his opinion, the LORD PRESIDENT said—Before leaving the evidence of Brown there is one point which, as matter of law, is of considerable importance. When he is examined he says,—"I know the defender. I first saw her about the beginning of November 1870. I met her in Stanley Road, Liverpool, in a public house. We had a little conversation and a few drinks together. (Q.) Did you make any arrangement about meeting her again? Question objected to." The Lord Ordinary repelled the objection, and the first question is, whether there was any room for the objection at all. The ground of it was that the answer might tend to prove that the witness had committed adultery. But I do not see that it could prove anything of the kind, unless it was followed by other questions. Therefore I think the objection came too soon, supposing it to have been otherwise well founded. But waiving that view, it is important to inquire whether this was a good objection at all in the mouth of the counsel for the defender, against a question proposed to be put to the pursuer's witness. The defender appeals to the statute. But, first, let us suppose there was no statute. At common law, I think it would not have been the duty of the Judge to sustain the objection, but to warn the witness that he need not answer the question unless

* 37 and 38 Vict. c. 64, sec. 2.—"The parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties, shall be competent to give evidence in such proceeding, provided that no witness in any proceeding, whether a party to the suit or not, shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to shew that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery."

No. 42.

Dec. 9, 1875. Kirkwood v. Kirkwood.

he chose. The common law interposes to protect the witness, not to give an advantage to the defender, and I apprehend that this statute, like the common law, was intended only for the protection of witnesses. They are protected from examination on this subject of adultery, and therefore if a question is likely to elicit an answer criminating the witness, it is the duty of the Judge to explain to the witness that he is so protected, and is under no obligation or liability to answer such questions when addressed to him. I would go farther: where the party named on record as the paramour is called, I think it is the duty of the Judge to make him aware of his protection when he is put in the box. It may, of course, escape observation when the witness is called that he is in that position. But if not, the Judge should explain the nature of the protection, but not force it on the witness. The defender has no privilege entitling him to insist that the witness shall avail himself of the enactment, which was not made in the interest of anybody but the witness, and if he says that he desires to tell the whole truth, there is nothing in either the common or statute law to prevent him. Therefore I think the objection taken by the defender was not the proper form in which to raise the point. He had a right to call the attention of the Judge to the matter. But the protection of the witness is not the business of the defender but of the Judge, and it is not his duty to protect the witness against his own will. It is clear that Brown came with his mind made up to tell the whole story.

Therefore, I am not inclined on any of these grounds to reject the evidence, or to say that the objection should have been sustained.

LORD DEAS.—I concur. I think, however, that it was not incompetent to raise the point in the form of an objection.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

C. S. TAYLOR, S.S.C.—JOHN LATTA, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 43.

Dec. 10, 1875. Dunn v. Chalmers.

ISABELLA DUNN, Pursuer.—J. P. B. Robertson.
JOHN CHALMERS, Defender.—Mackintosh.

Proof—Parent and Child—Filiation.—In an action of filiation brought by the daughter of a small farmer against a wright who lived near her father's house, it was proved that, for some time prior to 29th October 1873, the alleged date of conception (at which time the pursuer and defender were aged respectively eighteen and sixteen years), the parties were considered sweethearts, but that no familiarities had been observed between them. That after a raffle meeting on that day at the pursuer's father's house the parties had been left alone together in the kitchen for half an hour about midnight. The pursuer deponed that connection between them then took place, and that in consequence she bore the child 8½ months after. The defender stated in regard to his acquaintance with the pursuer that he had just spoken to her, and deponed that on the occasion in question they merely talked together, and that he had never had connection with her. Held that the paternity had been proved.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeenshire. M.

IN March 1875 Isabella Dunn, residing at Invernorth, in the parish of Rathen, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire, at Peterhead, against John Chalmers, wright, residing at Invernorth, for aliment for an illegitimate child of the pursuer born on 17th July 1874, of which the defender was alleged to be the father, in consequence of his having had connection with the pursuer "in or about the month of October 1873."

The defender denied the libel, and a proof was led. The whole proof is given below.* No. 43.

Dec. 10, 1875. Dunn v. Chalmers.

The Sheriff-substitute (Comrie Thomson) assoilzied the defender. On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) recalled the Sheriff-substitute's

* Pursuer's Proof.—JOHN CHALMERS, defender (eighteen).—In August last I lived about five minutes' walk from pursuer. I came there about two years ago. I have just spoken to her. In October 1873 I was at a harvest-home at pursuer's father's. Alexander Davidson, and Jane Greig, pursuer, and I remained in the barn after the others had left. I sat beside pursuer; Greig and Davidson were apart from us. We were sitting together for about half an hour, but we were doing nothing except talking. I was at a raffle at pursuer's father's, but I cannot say when that was, except that it was after the harvest-home. I saw Lewis Grant there. He was about the last to leave, and he left pursuer and me in the kitchen together. We were alone there for about half an hour. We did nothing but talk. I was at pursuer's father's on sowens night—old Christmas day. I was also at her sister's marriage. It was about that time. Pursuer was there. Davidson, and Jane Greig, pursuer, and I went to Greig's house. I was in company with pursuer. I do not remember being in the barn at Greig's that night. Pursuer told me she was with child to me, but I cannot say when. I denied that I was the father. I did not say to her to go to some one else, nor did I tell her to go to a doctor and get quit of the child.

"ISABELLA DUNN, pursuer (twenty).—Chalmers works near my father's. He has been a sweetheart of mine. At a harvest-home in 1873 he was in our barn with me. He had no connection with me that night. On 29th October there was a raffle at our place, and defender was there. He remained after the others had left, and he had connection with me in the kitchen. I slept in the kitchen, but defender was not in bed with me, but had connection with me on a sofa which was also there. My sister was married on 10th January 1874, and defender accompanied me to Jane Greig's, and had connection with me in the barn. We were alone there. Greig and Davidson had been in the barn, but had left. I bore a child on 17th July 1874, which was the result of defender's connection with me. He is its father. It is a boy, and is still alive. I produce a certificate of birth.

"JANE GREIG (eighteen).—I live with my father, who is a crofter in Rathen, about a quarter of an hour's walk from pursuer's place. I was at the harvest-home at Invernorth in 1873. Alexander Davidson and I were in the barn that night; so were the parties to this action. We remained there till about five o'clock in the morning. I think at that time the parties were sweethearts. I was at pursuer's again on sowens night. The parties were there also. I was also at the marriage of pursuer's sister on 10th January. Davidson and I and parties left between eleven and twelve, and we four went to my father's. We were in the barn. Davidson and I left the parties alone there. I went to the house, and the parties left the barn after they had been there for about twenty minutes. I never saw defender treat pursuer with familiarities.

"ALEXANDER DAVIDSON, farm-servant, New Deer (twenty-three).—In summer of 1873 I was in service near the residence of pursuer and the last witness. I understood the parties to be sweethearts, but I never saw him use any liberty with her. I was at the harvest-home at pursuer's. I was also at pursuer's sister's marriage; and afterwards we, along with last witness, went to her father's. Jane and I left the parties in the barn. They came to us in about half an hour.

"LEWIS GRANT (twenty-one), farm-servant, Cairness.—I was at the raffle at pursuer's in October 1873. It was to help a poor man. I was among the last to leave. The only persons I left behind were the parties. They were in the kitchen. I left between eleven and twelve. I did not see him taking any liberty with her."

"Defender's Proof.—DEFENDER recalled.—I had no connection with pursuer on the night of the raffle. Cross.—I never had connection with her. By the Court.—It is impossible that I could be the father of her child."

No. 43. interlocutor, and found it proved that the defender was the father of the pursuer's child.

Dec. 10, 1875. Dunn v. Chalmers. The defender reclaimed.

LORD DEAS.—The nature of the proof in this case is peculiar. The parties were very young. At the date of conception of the child the alleged father was sixteen and the mother eighteen years of age. Both apparently had been respectable and well conducted. It is clear they had formed a strong attachment to each other, and such as might naturally have led ultimately to marriage. It is proved that they were on several occasions left alone together, and this, under the circumstances, was not calculated to lead to suspicion of anything wrong. Three occasions, in particular, are spoken to. The first, on the night of a harvest-home; the second, of a raffle; and the third, of a marriage. It is not suggested that anything improper occurred on the first occasion; but it is alleged by the woman that on the second occasion connection took place on a sofa, and that it was repeated on the third occasion—viz. the night of the marriage. These are the only occasions on which connection is said to have taken place, and the child was born at a time which would sufficiently correspond with the first of them.

It is not alleged that any improper familiarities had been observed between the parties. There is no suggestion that the girl was loose in her manners, and there is no trace of intimacy between her and any other man. These are the peculiarities of this case. The proof of paternity, in an action of filiation, generally turns upon familiarities observed between the parties. Nothing of the kind is found in this case. But I am inclined to think that, under the circumstances, that does not tell against the reliability of the woman's testimony but rather in favour of it. The proof suggests that the connection took place without any premeditation on either side. The parties being together on the sofa and alone, and having an affection for each other, probably forgot themselves on the first occasion, but they did not lose all control over themselves afterwards, so that the fault was repeated once only. There is no improbability in the account given of the matter by the woman. The fact is of great importance that she is not proved to have been even intimately acquainted with any other man. Her conduct was habitually correct, and her general character is unimpeached. Her evidence is uncontradicted except by that of the defender, which has not the same appearance of candour. He had lived for two years within five minutes' walk of where she lived. It is abundantly proved that they had behaved as sweethearts, and were regarded as being so. He represents his acquaintance with her very differently. He says, "I have just spoken to her." He admits having been at the marriage, and having subsequently gone with her and the witnesses, Davidson and Jane Greig, to Greig's father's house. "But," he says, "I do not remember being in the barn at Greig's that night." Now, that forgetfulness is incredible and suspicious; for Jane Greig says that they left the marriage party "between eleven and twelve, and we four went to my father's. We were in the barn. Davidson and I left the parties" (that is, the pursuer and defender) "alone there. I went to the house, and the parties left the barn after they had been there about twenty minutes." In like manner Davidson, who is the next witness, says he was with them at the marriage, "and afterwards we, along with last witness, went to her father's. Jane and I left the parties in the barn. They came to us in about half-an-hour." The evidence of

No. 43.

Dec. 10, 1875.
Dunn v. Chalmers.

these witnesses is thus entirely corroborative of the evidence of the pursuer as to the defender and her being left alone together that night in the barn, which, the pursuer says, was the second occasion on which connection took place.

The case, as I have said, is, no doubt, peculiar. It is not proved by facts and circumstances of the kind usually relied on in actions of filiation, but the question is whether the facts and circumstances actually proved are not in themselves such as to satisfy the judicial mind that the woman's testimony is true. I am satisfied that they are so, and therefore I am for affirming the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD ARDMILLAN, LORD MURE, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

J. B. DOUGLAS, W.S.—ALEX. MORRISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 44.

Dec. 14, 1875.
Kellock v. Anderson, &c.

JOSEPH KELLOCK, Petitioner and Respondent.—D.-F. Watson—Gloag.
JOHN ANDERSON AND OTHERS, Respondents and Petitioners.—Asher—Lorimer.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Awarding and Recall.—A creditor presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of D for the sequestration of the estates of a debtor, but before the inducia had expired the debtor, with the consent of a concurring creditor, presented a petition for sequestration in the Bill-Chamber, which was awarded, as matter of course, and the process remitted to the Sheriff Court of L, where it was stated the estate could be most conveniently administered. Sequestration was thereafter awarded in the Sheriff Court of D. The petitioning creditor then presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber for the recall of the Bill-Chamber sequestration, and the debtor also presented a petition for the recall of the Sheriff Court sequestration. The Court, following the procedure in the case of Jarvie v. Robertson, Nov. 25, 1865, recalled the Bill-Chamber sequestration in hoc statu, and remitted the Sheriff Court sequestration to the Sheriff Court of L.

1ST DIVISION. Bill-Chamber. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. M.

THE affairs of John Anderson, draper, Thornhill, Dumfriesshire, having become involved, a meeting of his creditors was held in Kilmarnock on 16th September 1875, and at which a trust-deed for their behoof was executed. The trustee proceeded to realise the estate. On 23d October, however, John Kellock, a creditor for £66 contained in a bill of exchange, which had been duly protested, and the charge upon which expired that day, caused Anderson to be imprisoned, and on the same day presented a petition for sequestration of his estates in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries. The first deliverance on that petition was pronounced on that day. While the inducia on this petition were running Anderson, with the concurrence of William M'Laren, Sons, and Company, Glasgow, creditors, presented a petition for sequestration of his estates on 29th October in the Bill-Chamber, which was immediately awarded, and the sequestration remitted to the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire.

On 2d November the Sheriff-substitute (Hope) at Dumfries, there being no evidence before him of the Bill-Chamber sequestration, on the expiry of the inducia on Kellock's petition, awarded sequestration under that petition.

Kellock, on 3d November, presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber setting forth the above facts, and praying for the recall of the Bill-Chamber sequestration. Anderson and his concurring creditor lodged answers to this petition on 12th November, having previously on 8th November presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber for the recall of the Dumfries

No. 44.
Dec. 14, 1875.
Kellock v. Anderson, &c.

sequestration, or otherwise for a remit of that sequestration to the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire. In their answers to Kellock's petition, and in the body of their petition, they stated that as the general body of Anderson's creditors were in Glasgow the estate could be most advantageously administered there. Kellock lodged answers to this second petition in which he maintained that it would be for the advantage of the creditors that the 23d of October—the date of the first deliverance in the Dumfries sequestration—should be retained as the date of the sequestration instead of the 29th of October—the date of the Bill-Chamber sequestration. He also denied that the bulk of the creditors were in Glasgow.

On 23d November 1875 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Rutherfurd Clark) refused Kellock's petition;* and in Anderson's petition his

---

* "NOTE.—It was not disputed that the petition presented on 23d October to the Sheriff of Dumfriesshire was well-founded, and that but for the petition presented in the Bill-Chamber on 29th October, and the proceedings following thereon, the Sheriff would have been bound to award sequestration. The date of the sequestration so awarded would of course be the date of the first deliverance.

"It was maintained, however, that inasmuch as the sequestration had been awarded in the Bill-Chamber on 29th October, it was incompetent for the Sheriff to award sequestration in the petition depending before him. The Lord Ordinary cannot take that view, because no evidence was produced to the Sheriff that sequestration had been awarded in another Court. If evidence of the sequestration awarded in the Bill-Chamber had been produced, it would probably have been incompetent for the Sheriff to have awarded sequestration. But the Lord Ordinary does not think that this would have ultimately prevented the petitioning creditor from having sequestration awarded on his petition, though it might have necessitated the recall of the sequestration granted in the Bill-Chamber, in order to enable the Sheriff to sequestrate. In the view of the Lord Ordinary, a creditor who has presented a petition for sequestration cannot be deprived of the rights under that petition, by reason of a petition being subsequently presented in another Court. If this were so, it would be competent for the bankrupt, by his own act, to delay the sequestration by presenting a petition during the currency of the inducia.

"It was urged that it was of no consequence whether the sequestration was awarded on the 23d or 29th October, as the bankrupt was admittedly notour bankrupt on the former date. The Lord Ordinary thinks that he cannot enter into that question. It is impossible for him to determine it, and he cannot, as he thinks, dispose of the present case, on the supposition that the date of the sequestration is of no importance.

"But it was maintained that there was no ground for recalling the sequestration awarded in the Bill-Chamber, even though the sequestration awarded by the Sheriff was to stand, and that the only lawful course was to remit the latter to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, to whom the sequestration awarded in the Bill-Chamber has been remitted. It is here that the Lord Ordinary has felt most difficulty. The 19th section of the Bankrupt Act deals with the case of sequestration awarded in the Bill-Chamber and Sheriff Court, and directs that the Court or Lord Ordinary shall 'remit the sequestration' to such Sheriff Court as shall be deemed most expedient. It was urged that this enactment required the Court to maintain both sequestrations, though of different dates, and that its only province was to remit them to the same Sheriff Court. Without going so far as to hold that it is incompetent to recall the sequestration granted in the Bill-Chamber, the Lord Ordinary thinks that it is the safer course to remit the one sequestration to the other. In doing so, he follows the direct injunction of the Act in the case which has occurred; for he is of opinion that it is most expedient that the sequestration should proceed in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire. This is the wish of the great body of creditors, and it was stated by Mr Kellock that it was indifferent to him in which Court the sequestration proceeded.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1875. Adams v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

The last question, and perhaps the most difficult of all, is, whether the pursuer is disentitled to recover, because not only Douglas was in fault, but also the driver and guard of her husband's own train. This question is one of nicety, and authorities have been referred to in the English Courts which are of the greatest weight, and with which we must deal deliberately. Now, in the first place, the principle of collaborateur does not, in any way, interfere with the direct application of the maxim, culpa tenet suos auctores, but only with the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se. No defence whatever is given by it to the collaborateur or fellow-servant who is guilty of fault, but only to the common master. If one servant causes injury to a fellow-servant he is as much liable to him in a direct action as if he was a total stranger. Therefore, whether they were fellow-servants or not, Adams' widow has a direct action against Douglas, as well as against the driver and guard. All the actual wrongdoers are, conjunctly and severally, liable to the person whom they have injured. The only question is, whether she has also a direct action against Douglas' masters. The only defence against that action is that, besides Douglas, Robb and Robertson, the driver and guard of the goods train, contributed to the injury. That is not, in my opinion, a good defence. It would be a very strong thing to hold that, merely because a fellow-servant is to blame as well as a third party, therefore the injured person is not to recover against that third party or his master. If the pursuer has a good action against Douglas, why not against Douglas' employer? I can see no principle whatever why he should not. Suppose this had been a passenger train, could it be contended that the passengers were debarred from recovering against the South-Western Company because the driver and guard of their own train were also in fault? Were it not for the two English cases of Thorogood and Armstrong I should have had no difficulty on the point. With regard to these cases, I concur in the remarks of your Lordship in the chair. I can find no principle on which they can be held to proceed. On the contrary, I think they go clearly against principle. Fortunately we have not only the adverse criticism of standard writers on the law of England, but also the authority of that great lawyer, Dr Lushington, to support us. I therefore decline to be bound by the cases of Thorogood and Armstrong till they are endorsed by a higher authority.

Therefore, in law and on the facts disclosed, I am of opinion that the South-Western Company are liable to the pursuer of this action, and that a verdict should be entered up for her for £300, the assessed amount of damages.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having considered the issue, the minute No. 20 of process, and the Judge's notes of evidence, find for the pursuer, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons for £300; and find the pursuer entitled to expenses, including the expenses of the trial, and remit to the Auditor," &c.

ROBERT PRINGLE, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 44.
Dec. 14, 1875.
Kellock v. Anderson, &c.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire. Four days after this, the inducice having expired on the Sheriff Court petition, the Sheriff-substitute, in ignorance of the Bill-Chamber sequestration, awarded sequestration at Dumfries.

What remains for us to do is to put the matter into shape. The Lord Ordinary has refused the petition for the recall of the Bill-Chamber sequestration, and the result is that two petitions of different dates go into the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire with awards of sequestration standing on each. That is very awkward. The estate cannot have been sequestrated at two different dates—the first on 23d October and the other on 29th October. In that case, parties who had an interest might object to the sequestration of 29th October standing. A great many things depend on the date of the first deliverance in such petitions.

It appears to me that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the petition as to the Bill-Chamber sequestration refusing the petition, and follow the course taken in the case of Jarvies, recalling the sequestration hoc statu. The first petition presented in Dumfries, with the first deliverance of 23d October, is thus left standing, and if anything goes wrong with it, the second petition in the Bill-Chamber can be resumed.

I may add that I quite concur in the Lord Ordinary's finding as to expenses, that neither party is entitled to any.

Lord Deas.—I am not prepared to say that the remit made by the Lord Ordinary might not have suited the purpose in view; but I think the course proposed by your Lordship is fully better. I concur in the remarks made by your Lordship.

Lord Ardmillan and Lord Mure concurred.

The Court, in Kellock's petition, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the petitioner, Joseph Kellock, against Lord Rutherfurd Clark's interlocutor of 23d November 1875, recall the said interlocutor: Recall in hoc statu the sequestration awarded by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills on the 29th October 1875 on the petition for sequestration of the estates of John Anderson, presented by the bankrupt with concurrence of M'Laren, Sons, and Company, warehousemen, Glasgow: Appoint this judgment of recall to be entered in the Register of Sequestrations, and on the margin of the Register of Inhibitions, all in terms of the 31st section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

In Anderson's petition the Court adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Ronald, Ritchie, & Ellis, W.S.—Hamilton, Kinnear, & Beatson, W.S.—Agents.

No. 45.
Dec. 10, 1875.
Miller v. Walker.

James Miller, Son, and Company, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Balfour.
John Walker, Defender.—Asher—Keir.

Partnership—Joint Adventure—Minerals.—A proprietor of mines agreed to grant to A a lease for nineteen years, on condition of receiving a rent or royalty of 15s. per ton on the ore removed, without any stipulation that the tenant should work the mines. Subsequently A entered into a contract of joint adventure with B to work the mines for their joint interest, in consideration of B accepting bills at twelve months for £2000, to be repaid from the first profits, A guaranteeing profits to that amount, and undertaking to grant bills for the balance unpaid at the end of twelve months, and to renew the same from time to time until the balance should be extinguished.

No. 45.

Dec. 10, 1875.
Miller v. Walker.

In an action brought by B three years after the date of the agreement, held (1) that there being no obligation in the lease requiring the tenant to work the mines for the nineteen years, the joint adventure was not a joint adventure to work the mines for any specific period; (2) that the defender's guarantee was to be construed as a guarantee that the mines should, within a few years, produce £2000 of profit; (3) upon the proof, that no profit had been realised, and that there was no reasonable prospect of profit being realised in future; and (4) that, in these circumstances, the pursuer was entitled to bring the joint adventure to an end, and to require implement of the guarantee (diss. Lord Deas, on the ground that it had not been proved that the joint adventure was not still a reasonable speculation).

1st Division.
Lord Gifford.
B.

In 1872 Mr Leisk, proprietor of the island of Haaf Grunie, one of the Shetland Islands, entered into an agreement with John Walker, contained in the two following letters:—

"Uya, 21st Feby. 1872.—Dear Sir,— . . . I am now thinking as the spring of the year advances to try and see if any more of the chromate of iron can be got out of my island of Haaf Grunie. As Mr A. Sandison informs me you might be induced to take a lease of the chromate ore mine, I therefore would now offer you a nineteen years' lease of these mines on the condition that you pay me 15s. per ton of rent or royalty on all chromate ore lifted, whether first, second, or third, and that, should my tenant for the time being of said island require surface damage paid him, you to arrange and pay that. . . . GEO. T. LEISK."

"29th February 1872.—. . . . I agree to accept a nineteen years' lease of these mines on the condition that I pay you fifteen shillings per ton of rent or royalty on all chromate ore lifted, whether firsts, seconds, or thirds, and that, should the tenant of the grazings require surface damage paid him, I will arrange and pay that. JOHN WALKER."

Thereafter Mr Walker entered into negotiations with Messrs James Miller, Son, and Company, merchants, Glasgow, which resulted in an arrangement contained in the following letters:—

"Glasgow, 22d March 1872.—Messrs James Miller, Son, & Co.—Dear Sirs,—In consideration of your now having given me your acceptance for £2000 at 12 months as a bonus for a half share in George Leisk of Uya nineteen years' lease of his chrome ore mines in Haaf Grunie I agree to same being worked on joint account, and the understanding is that I guarantee that the profits upon said mine shall amount to £2000, and are first to be applied to paying said acceptance, and that thereafter the profits are equally divisible between us, and if at the maturity of said bill (£2000) two thousand pounds have not been cleared I agree to renew same for the balance aye and until said account has been made up. —Yours truly, JOHN WALKER.

"Glasgow, 22d March 1872.—Dear Sir,—We confirm the arrangement come to between us to-day as expressed in your letter of this date anent the joint account of the chromate mine lease from Mr George Leisk of Haaf Grunie.—Yours truly, JAS. MILLER, SON, & Co."

In implement of this arrangement Messrs Miller, on 22d and 23d March 1872, granted two promissory-notes for £1000, payable twelve months after date. These were renewed in 1873, and again in 1874.

On 1st May 1872 the works were commenced.

On 13th October 1874 Messrs Miller raised this action against Mr Walker, concluding (1) for declarator that the agreement contained in the letters of 22d March 1872 has all along been and is now null and void, and that the same has now fallen and come to an end, and is no longer binding upon the pursuers; (2) for delivery of the bills for £1000 each, which were renewed by them in March 1874; (3) or for payment of £2000; (4) charges for interest or discount on the bills; (5) interest at 5 per cent on the bills since 27th March 1873; (6) that the defender was

No. 45. liable for the whole expenses of working; (7) for payment of £139, 3s. 8d. There was also a conclusion for reduction of the missives of 22d March 1872 by which the joint adventure was entered into.

Dec. 10, 1875. Miller v. Walker.

The pursuers alleged that they had been induced to enter into the joint adventure by false representations by the defender as to the value of the minerals. "By their examination and by inquiries the pursuers learned, and it is the fact, that the representations made by the defender as aforesaid relative to the chrome ore and chrome ore mines in the said island and its workability to profit, in reliance and on the faith of which they entered into the said joint adventure arrangement, and renewed the said bills from time to time, were unfounded in fact, and were false. The pursuers so ascertained, and it is the fact, that there did not at the date of the said arrangement, and that there does not now, exist in the said island, any chrome ore mines or chrome ore capable of being wrought so as to pay working expenses, and yield either within one or two years, or during the entire currency of the said nineteen years' lease, a profit of £2000; and further, that there was not at the said date, and is not now, in the said island, chrome ore capable of being wrought to any profit whatever. The said joint adventure arrangement was thus entered into under essential error on the part of the pursuers, induced by false representations made to them by the defender as aforesaid."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers are entitled to have decree declaring the said joint adventure agreement at an end, as also to have decree of delivery, relief, and payment, as concluded for, in respect that the said island did not at the date of the said agreement, and does not now, contain any chrome ore workable to the profit promised, or to any profit at all, and that the defender is not in a position to give the equivalent stipulated as the counterpart of the obligations undertaken and fulfilled by the pursuers. (2) The pursuers are entitled to have such decree, or otherwise to have decree of reduction as concluded for, in respect that the said arrangement was entered into by them under essential error; and, separatim, that the said error was induced by false and fraudulent misrepresentations on the part of the defender.

The defender denied the alleged misrepresentations, and stated that for several years prior to March 1872 the pursuers and defender had been engaged together in extensive transactions in chrome ore which was got from the island of Unst; that with the view of obtaining better terms from the proprietors of the Unst quarries they were anxious to obtain possession of other chrome ore quarries, and that this led to the joint adventure; that after the working of the mine had been started it was stopped by a process of interdict at the instance of Mr Leisk's sister and nephew till March 1873; that it was only in the summer seasons that operations could be carried on; and that in September 1873 operations were again stopped for want of an efficient foreman.

The defender further alleged that he still believed that the mines could be successfully worked.

A proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, the import of which sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to instruct any relevant or sufficient grounds for reducing or setting aside as null and void ab initio the agreement for joint adventure entered into between the pursuers and defender on 22d March 1872, and embodied in missives of that date passing between the pursuers and the defender: Therefore, repels the reasons of reduction, and assoilzies the defender from the reductive conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Farther, and in reference to the nature and effect of the said agreement,

No. 45.

Dec. 10, 1875.
Miller v. Walker.

finds that the pursuers and defender, as joint adventurers under said agreement, have differed as to the mode in which the joint adventure is to be carried on; and, in particular, that they have differed as to the amount of capital to be advanced for testing or proving the amount of chrome ore in the island of Haaf Grunie, in Shetland, referred to in said agreement, or for working and mining the chrome ore in said island, and also, as to the parties by whom, and at whose risk said capital is to be contributed: Finds that there are no termini habiles contained in the agreement, according to which the Lord Ordinary or the Court can be called upon to define the amount of capital to be advanced or expended, or to define and fix the mode in which the said joint adventure is to be carried on: Therefore, and in the circumstances disclosed in evidence, finds that the pursuers are entitled to bring the said joint adventure to an end; and finds, declares, and decerns that the same has come to an end accordingly: Finds, in point of law, that the pursuers having offered to renounce in favour of the defender all right and interest of any kind belonging to the pursuers in the chrome ore mines of Haaf Grunie, or in the lease thereof granted to the defender by Mr George T. Leisk of Uya, and now vested in the defender, the pursuers, on such renunciation, are entitled to demand that the defender shall relieve them of two bills for £1000 each drawn by the defender upon and accepted by the pursuers, dated 21st and 26th March 1874; or otherwise, if the pursuers have paid said bills, that the defender is bound to repay the same to the pursuers, with all interest which has accrued or which may accrue thereon; and also to repay to the pursuers any interest or discount which the pursuers may have paid or incurred on previous bills, of which the said two bills are renewals; and to this extent and effect decerns in favour of the pursuers under the declaratory conclusions of the summons; and in order that effect may be given to the above findings, and the cause concluded, appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses hitherto incurred, subject to some modification, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the Auditor of Court to tax the same and to report: Meantime grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor."*

* "NOTE.—The main and the only difficult part of the case relates to the construction and legal effect of the agreement, assuming it to be valid and legally binding on both parties. The missives of agreement are in the following terms. The defender's offer to the pursuers is"—(His Lordship here quoted the defender's letter, dated Glasgow, March 22, 1872, and the pursuers' answer of the same date).

"A great many questions have been raised by the parties regarding the true meaning and construction and regarding the legal effect of this agreement, which the Lord Ordinary now assumes to be binding on both parties. To aid in the construction the Lord Ordinary has the advantage of the whole preceding circumstances being fully disclosed in the proof and correspondence.

"Without entering into details or into argument the Lord Ordinary will state shortly the results to which he has come as to the construction and legal effect of this written agreement.

"(1) He thinks that the missives constitute an agreement of joint adventure or limited partnership, the subject of the joint adventure being the lease of the chrome ore in Haaf Grunie, then vested in the defender, Mr Walker. The contract, then, has the incidents and legal effects of a contract of joint adventure or limited partnership.

"(2) The defender by the contract guarantees that the profits of the joint adventure 'shall amount to £2000.' The Lord Ordinary thinks this means, and must mean, that the net profits, after paying all outlay and cost of every kind, and after paying interest upon outlay and cost, shall amount to at least

No. 45.

Dec. 10, 1875.
Miller v. Walker.

The defender reclaimed. He argued that one of two joint adventurers was not entitled to put an end to the adventure unless some circumstance £2000. It is a guarantee not only against loss and against all sunk and irrecoverable outlay, but it is a guarantee that every outlay, including interest, shall be repaid, and that at least £2000 shall be over of clear profit.

"(3) This clear profit, the certainty of which the defender guarantees, is to be applied in retiring the pursuers' acceptance or acceptances for £2000, which were granted in the first instance at twelve months' date. No time is fixed in the agreement within which the net profits shall be forthcoming, but it is implied that the profits shall begin to emerge immediately, for the defender undertakes, if the £2000 of profits have not been realised the first year, to renew the balance of the bill or bills 'aye and until the said amount has been made up.'

"(4) The Lord Ordinary thinks that this implies that the pursuers, while granting their bill and credit for the purpose of raising £2000 to start with, were not to be required to pay the said amount, for the defender agrees to renew the bills—that is, to keep the pursuers free from advance until the bills are paid from profits, and this payment is assumed to begin, to some extent at least, the first year.

"(5) Nothing is said in the agreement as to proving or testing the mines, or as to boring or searching for mineral. It is assumed that the defender had satisfied himself upon that head, for he guarantees productiveness, and agrees to the mines being at once worked 'on joint account.'

"(6) There is no obligation laid upon either party to advance capital; no definition of the amount of capital which each partner or joint adventurer may be called upon to pay; and no machinery is provided as to settling any disputes or differences which may arise between the two partners as to the mode of working the minerals, or as to the mode of carrying out the ends of the joint adventure. All these matters are left unsettled, and to be determined by the rules of common law.

"The reason of the missives making no provisions for advance of capital, or for the other matters now referred to, appears to have been that the defender was confident that the mines had only to be touched to become instantly productive.

"It is established by the proof that the parties—that is, the two partners or joint adventurers—have differed—hopelessly differed—as to the working or carrying out of the joint adventure. The pursuers have satisfied themselves that the mines are wholly unproductive, and, being of opinion that to attempt to work them would just be to throw away money hopelessly and irrecoverably, they decline to advance money or capital in the working of the mines for the repayment of which capital they have no security whatever, for the defender denies that he will be personally bound to repay advances of capital which may be required for working and for proving the mine. The defender admits that he must guarantee profits to amount to £2000, but he maintains that in the meantime the pursuers must advance, and advance indefinitely and speculatively, whatever is necessary for sinking pits or shafts on the chance that ore will ultimately be found. As the Lord Ordinary understood the defender's argument, there is no limit to this either in amount or time. The advances may go on till near the end of the lease, and the amount is only to be limited by the defender becoming hopeless of ultimate success. The pursuers seem to have been willing to advance to some small extent at first, for they placed the half of the first year's outlay to the defender's credit in account with them, and the bills for £2000 have been twice renewed—that is, they have not run one year, but three years. By October 1874, however, the pursuers were satisfied that the mines were valueless, they refused to make further advances, and called upon the defender to relieve them from the current bills. The defender refused, and hence this action.

"(7) The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the partners or joint adventurers, having differed in regard to the carrying out the highly speculative adventure in question, the Court cannot ordain this speculative adventure to be carried on, but the adventure must terminate on equitable terms.

not contemplated at the time the contract was entered upon had occurred. The adventure was a speculative one, and it could not be said that it had so failed as to entitle one of the parties to bring it to an end. In all "The Lord Ordinary declines to say or to prescribe to the parties how much money must be sunk in excavating pits or quarries or shafts in Haaf Grunie in the hope of ultimately getting a return. It is no part of the duty of the Court to conduct speculative mining, or to say how it is to be conducted, or how much the parties are to risk in the venture. If the joint adventurers do not choose to define all this for themselves in their agreement, and if they differ, there is no alternative. Their vague agreement must come to an end. The Court cannot make an agreement for the parties which they have not made for themselves.

"In the present case the evidence does not enable the Lord Ordinary to say, either on the one hand that the mines are sterile, or on the other that they can be worked to profit, and he declines to decide this question. He thinks that the decision of this question is not necessary for the disposal of the case. Nor is it necessary or possible for the Lord Ordinary to fix how much money must be sunk before the mines are abandoned as hopelessly sterile.

"It is needless to refer to the evidence, which, even as to the experts, is of the most vague and inconclusive nature. The speculation at best is a matter of risk, chance, and hope; and as the parties themselves have not chosen to fix the extent of their risk and of their venture, if they differ, the Court can only terminate their agreement.

"There has been here full and fair opportunity for trial. The defender in substance guaranteed that the working should be instantly profitable. Three years have elapsed and the profit has not begun. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the pursuers are not bound to wait longer or to do more.

"(8) It follows that the pursuers are entitled to have the joint adventure declared at an end, and to be relieved of their bills or of their obligation for the £2000. If they have paid or incurred interest either upon the ultimate bills or on previous renewals they seem entitled to repayment. Interest on an advance is as much outlay as the advance itself, and as the defender guaranteed the net profit to be £2000, he is liable to that extent over and above the outlay and interest.

"(9) Nor, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, can the defender complain of the slightest hardship. He has himself to blame. If he wanted a copartner or co-adventurer who would bear equal risk with him he should have so stipulated in the written agreement. On the contrary, he undertook to relieve the pursuers of all risk whatever—he guaranteed that there should be no loss at all, but at least £2000 of profit. He is now simply called on to fulfil his guarantee.

"The Lord Ordinary is happy to think, however, that the defender himself must regard his present defeat as in reality a great gain. He is now receiving back by the present judgment the whole lease as his exclusive property, and as he values it as worth at least £8000, and no one can tell how much more, he has every reason to be satisfied. It is seldom that a Judge can by any judgment give gain and satisfaction to both parties. As the lease is fully vested in the defender he requires no reconveyance.

"As the bills last current fell due 24th and 29th March last, and as the Lord Ordinary has not been informed whether they have been taken up or renewed, and as the exact amount of interest or discount is not stated or ascertained, the Lord Ordinary cannot exhaust the case by an absolutely final judgment. He has pronounced such findings, however, as he hopes will define the rights of parties, and leave nothing but the mere details of figures for adjustment. For this purpose he has appointed the case to be enrolled.

"As the present Lord Ordinary is only acting as Interim-Ordinary, under the authority of the Lord President, he has thought it right to dispose of the question of expenses; and, as the pursuers have been substantially successful, they are entitled to their costs. Probably the reductive conclusions have not created any separable part of the expense, but the failure therein is a good reason for some modification. The Lord Ordinary has granted leave to reclaim the judgment, being in its form interlocutory."

No. 45.

Dec. 10, 1875. Miller v. Walker.

the cases where the Court had decided that one partner was entitled to bring the adventure to an end the object of the joint adventure had failed.[1]

Argued for the pursuers;—The adventure was now of a more speculative nature than at the time it was entered on. There was now no reasonable prospect of profit.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is one part of the case about which I do not think there can be any difficulty,—I mean the reductive conclusions of the summons; and I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is no proof of fraud. I think that the allegations of fraud should never have been made. The pursuers ought to have known that the adventure upon which they entered was of a hazardous kind, and I do not think they had any reason to charge their co-adventurer with fraud.

The other part of the case is of a delicate kind. It deals with the right of one of two co-adventurers to put an end to a joint adventure. There may be such a right under certain circumstances and conditions, but the great difficulty is to apply the law to the circumstances, and to determine what is sufficient to terminate the contract. The contract out of which the joint adventure sprang is founded upon missives of lease between George Leisk and John Walker. The first of these is dated 21st February 1872, and is from the proprietor. He offers a nineteen years' lease of the mines "on the condition that you pay me 15s. per ton of rent or royalty on all chromate ore lifted, whether first, second, or third." Then there is a condition as to surface damage. On the other hand, Walker, by letter dated 29th February 1872, agrees "to accept a nineteen years' lease of these mines on condition that I pay you 15s. per ton of rent or royalty on all chromate ore lifted, whether firsts, seconds, or thirds." Now, it must be observed that, although this is a lease for nineteen years, it does not stipulate for a fixed rent. The only prestation is to pay a royalty of 15s. per ton on the ore actually taken. If there is no working and no ore taken there is to be no rent. It is clear that the working is a matter of option; the tenant may either work the mine or let it alone, in which case the lease would be practically inoperative. Whenever he stops working, the obligation to pay royalty stops also. I think the Dean of Faculty correctly characterised the contract as a license to work for nineteen years. Now, Walker having secured the lease, makes a proposal to share it with the pursuers in the following terms:—"In consideration of your having now given me your acceptance for £2000 at 12 months, as a bonus for a half share in George Leisk of Uya's nineteen years' lease of his chrome ore mines in Haaf Grunie, I agree to same being worked on joint account, and the understanding is that I guarantee that the profits upon said mine shall amount to £2000, and are first to be applied to paying said acceptance, and that thereafter the profits are equally divisible between us, and if at the maturity of said bill (£2000) two thousands pounds have not been cleared, I agree to renew same for the balance aye and until said amount has been made up."

[1] Lindley on Partnership, vol. i. (3d ed.) p. 234; Montgomery v. Forrester, June 17, 1791, Hume, 748; Marshall v. Marshall, Jan. 26, 1815, 3 Ross, L. C. (Com. Law), 611; Warner v. Cunningham, Jan. 24, 1798, M. 14,603, 3 Dow, 76, 2 Bell's Com., 5th ed., 633; Jennings v. Baddeley, Dec. 12, 1856, 3 Kay and Johnston, 78; Dickie v. Mitchell, June 12, 1874, ante, vol. i. 1030; Bain v. Black, Feb. 22, 1849, 6 Bell's Appeals, 317.

The bonus given by the pursuers to Walker, on consideration of their being taken into the lease was a loan of £2000. The loan was given in the form of a bill of exchange, accepted by the pursuers. The bill was for twelve months, and it was anticipated that the profits of the mine would be sufficient to retire the bill at the end of the twelve months, or at some future time, when the bill should have been renewed and again become due. Walker undertakes to guarantee that the mine should yield £2000 of profit, and as soon as that is done the money should be applied in payment of the bill—thereafter the profits were to be divided between the joint adventurers. If the mine had turned out as profitable as Miller and Walker hoped, there would have been no difficulty. I cannot see why the work should not have been carried on. The difficulty of the Lord Ordinary makes no impression upon my mind. He seems to think that this is a very imperfect contract. He says that as the partners differed, either of them was entitled to put an end to the joint adventure. I cannot subscribe to that. No doubt there is nothing said as to who is to supply the capital or who is to bear the losses, but the law will supply the defect when two persons enter into a joint adventure without making such stipulations. When nothing is said about the amount of capital, the law presumes that each partner supplies what is sufficient to carry out his share of the joint adventure. There are large adventures carried on in this country where the terms of contract are not more explicit than here. No doubt it is easy for the partners to state difficulties if they quarrel, but though there are no conditions in the contract itself to regulate the rights of the partners the law will supply them. The effect of the contract is for the decision of a Court of law. This case is one of difficulty, but the decision of the Lord Ordinary does not commend itself to my mind.

The general rule is that one of two joint adventurers is entitled to put an end to the joint adventure if it comes to be attended with greater risk than when the contract was entered into, or if there be no reasonable belief that profit will be made for either party. It is necessary to attend to the terms of the contract itself, and see what it was. The first question which arises is on the construction of the contract, whether there was any definite term of endurance. That is attended with considerable difficulty. There is no term in the contract itself, but there is a reference to the lease, which was for nineteen years. If the parties had been bound to work, or to pay a fixed rent whether they worked or not, the term of the joint adventure would then have been the same as the lease, and it would not have come to an end till the lease came to an end, because, while Walker was bound, he had communicated the one-half of the lease to the pursuers. But, looking to the lease, I entertain great doubts if it is a lease for nineteen years. The lease does not bind the parties to work; there is no difficulty then in abstaining from working if they do not find it profitable. Therefore I think the joint adventure is not for a fixed period. But neither do I think the absence of a fixed term will entitle the parties to put an end to the contract. It was evidently intended to last for a considerable time. If the joint adventure is being carried on, it is out of the question for one of the parties to say he is tired of it. There must be notice given before he can put an end to it, or there must be some recent cause. Now, the case which is alleged on the part of the pursuers is that nothing has been made out of this mine during the three years it has been worked, and that there is no reasonable prospect of anything being made out it. If that be so, the pursuers are entitled to put an end to the adventure. They are not entitled to do so at a day's notice, but they are entitled to have it settled in the course of the action that the adventure is to be brought to an end.

No. 45.
Dec. 10, 1875.
Miller v. Walker.

The question comes to be one of evidence, and having given my best attention to the case I come to this result: Nothing has been made out of the mine hitherto. No doubt there are reasons of a temporary kind for this. There has been a litigation and a difficulty about the manager, but, looking to the evidence, and especially to the scientific evidence, to see if there is a reasonable prospect of profit, I have come to the conclusion that the great weight of the scientific evidence is against the prospect of the mine being worked to a profit. That being so, what is to be the effect of the contract between the parties? The defender has guaranteed that the mine shall yield £2000, and that that shall be applied to repaying the pursuers. Mr Walker is therefore bound to pay £2000 for retiring the acceptance.

I confess I have not come to this conclusion without difficulty, but I think it a just and fair result.

Lord Deas.—I agree with your Lordship that this case is attended with great difficulty. I likewise agree that it is impossible to concur with the reasons which the Lord Ordinary in his note has given for his judgment. His view comes to this, that it is sufficient to put an end to a contract of partnership that one of the parties says he has differed with the other as to how the affairs of the partnership ought to be conducted. When partners differ between themselves we are familiar with the appointment of a judicial factor. But that is a different thing from one partner being entitled de plano to put an end to the contract without the consent of the other.

Another part of the case in which I agree with your Lordship is, that there was no ground for imputing any fraudulent motives to the defender, or any motives whatever inconsistent with good faith. It is not in favour of the conclusion at which the pursuers ask us to arrive that they thought it necessary to support that conclusion by unfounded allegations of fraud.

Laying aside these allegations, I confess that I have great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that there are here sufficient grounds for putting an end to the contract. It is true that the contract is not for a definite period, in which case, as your Lordship has stated, we could not have put an end to it. But it is clear enough, I think, that the contract was intended to last for some considerable time.

The first part of the contract provides that steps should be taken to ascertain whether the metal could be worked to profit. I am not satisfied that that part of the contract has been yet followed out. There seems to be a great difference of opinion whether the mine can be worked to profit or not. A considerable time has no doubt elapsed without this having been ascertained one way or the other. But this is accounted for to a great extent by the interdict which stopped the working. The workmen, after being interdicted, could not, in that part of the country, go back to the island till April 1873. Then the manager was found to be unfit for his duties, and there was difficulty in getting another. A variety of other circumstances combine to account for the delay. Therefore, admitting the principle that such a contract may be put an end to by a change of circumstances, I doubt if the time can be said to have arrived for doing so.

No. 45.
Dec. 10, 1875.
Miller v. Walker.

Your Lordship suggested that either of two things would justify the Court in putting an end to the contract—1st, if there were greater risk than the parties had contemplated at the time of entering into the contract; and, 2d, if there were no reasonable prospect of profit being made. I agree that the second might put an end to the contract. But I do not think that a greater risk of loss in testing the mine would have that effect.

Although this is a matter for the discretion of the Court, we have a duty to protect the defender as well as the pursuers. It seems impossible that this action, if it is to come to the result pointed at by the Lord Ordinary, can be unattended with loss to Mr Walker. He has devoted his time and attention to this mine, and has been thereby diverted from other schemes, and probably kept from making profit in other ways. If it be a reasonable speculation, and he is prepared to go on with it, we are not entitled to interfere, unless for very strong reasons. My difficulty is, that I do not think it proved that there are any such strong reasons here. The partners entered into the joint adventure with their eyes open, and whatever may occur hereafter I do not think there are as yet sufficient grounds for us to interfere.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has rightly disposed of the reductive conclusions of this action. There is no sufficient evidence, indeed there is no evidence, of fraud, or of wilful misrepresentation inducing essential error. I do not think that there was any fraud or intentional misrepresentation on the part of the defender.

The parties entered on a mineral speculation, or joint adventure, in regard to which the defender, Mr Walker, having the best means of judging, and being best acquainted with the locality and with the nature of the speculation, was the most eager and sanguine, and he may have expressed strongly his hopes and expectations. These, it seems to me, he honestly entertained and communicated. But there is nothing in his conduct which can sustain the conclusion for reduction.

The remaining conclusions,—declaratory and petitory,—are rested on different grounds, and cannot be similarly disposed of, though they also are of a nature requiring careful consideration. These conclusions, depending chiefly on evidence, are peculiar. The application of the rules of the law of joint adventure to the facts of this case is attended with difficulty.

Mr Walker held a lease from Mr Leisk of the minerals on or in the island of Haaf Grunie for nineteen years. The "rent or royalty" is 15s. a-ton on all chromate ore lifted. There is no fixed rent. There is no obligation on the tenant to work the ore; but, if he work it, he pays 15s. a-ton on all he lifts. That is the only obligation undertaken by the tenant. It is important to observe the nature of this lease. It must be read fairly. The landlord is, I think, bound to permit the tenant to work for nineteen years on the terms stated if the tenant chooses to do so. It is to him a license to work at a certain lordship per ton. But the tenant, though not taken bound to work, could not, I think, hold the lease for its whole currency without working at all, and exclude the landlord or another tenant from working. If the tenant were to refrain persistently from working,—and so escape all payment of rent,—and yet to insist on occupying under the lease so as to prevent all working by the landlord or by another, I am disposed to think that the lease could, at the instance of the landlord, be brought to an end. But, however that may be, I am satisfied that the tenant, Mr Walker, was not under absolute obligation to work the minerals during the nineteen years. The proper prestations of a lease are absent. Therefore when Mr Walker assumed a partner, and introduced him into this joint adventure, then nineteen years was not necessarily the endurance of the joint adventure. I cannot so read it. When working this ore on the lordship as stipulated becomes impracticable in consequence of not finding sufficient quantity of ore, then I think that the joint adventure must terminate or be terminable by either party. It could not, in equity, be permitted to one of the joint adventurers to force the other joint adventurer to proceed in a disastrous speculation to the great loss of both. I cannot say that mere difference of opinion as to the possibility or probability of success is a sufficient ground for calling on the Court to declare the joint adventure at an end. On that point I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and I do not quite agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think that we cannot avoid the question of reasonable probability of success,—the question on which the parties have led proof: Is there now in Haaf Grunie such an amount of chromate of fair quality as to justify continued working? Or, is it reasonable to hold that continued working cannot be conducted with profit, or indeed, without loss?

No. 45.

Dec. 10, 1875. Miller v. Walker.

I cannot hold mere difference of opinion sufficient. I cannot recognise the pursuers' right to terminate the adventure because they doubt the prudence of proceeding. Inquiry is necessary in order to protect the one party from the caprice of the other. But on the answers to the two questions I have indicated the decision of this case must, in my opinion, depend.

In the view which I take of the lease, or license to work, and the agreement, the mutual obligations of the parties to the joint adventure cannot be held as continuing for the whole lease, so as necessarily to last for nineteen years. I scarcely think that the defender himself maintained that proposition. On the other hand, the pursuers cannot, at their pleasure, and without reason or explanation, enforce the termination of the adventure. Between these extreme propositions the justice of the case appears to lie; and, I think, there is sufficient support for it in law. The pursuers can, in my opinion, put an end to the adventure, if there has been reasonable trial, and if the result is that the mineral does not exist in this island of such quality and in such quantity as to justify continued expenditure with any fair prospect of success. To force the continuance of a very hazardous, perhaps ruinous, adventure, against the will of the pursuers, would not be equitable, nor would it be in accordance with legal principle. The authority of Professor Bell (Bell's Com. vol. ii. pp. 632–3), and the decisions in the case of Montgomery v. Forrester (June 17, 1791, Hume, 748), and in the case of Barr v. Speirs, 18th May 1802, F. C., and Marshall v. Marshall, 23d Feb. 1816, F. C., are favourable to the pleas of the pursuers, and several decisions in England mentioned by Mr Bell confirm the same view of the law. I may also refer to the English case of Crawshay v. Maule, decided by Lord Eldon in 1818 (1 Wilson's Chan. Rep. 181).

Accordingly, it is necessary to consider the proof in order to ascertain the true state of the facts, whether the continued working of this chromate can be conducted with reasonable hope of success.

On the evidence in regard to the state of the chromate in Haaf Grunie I confess I have had difficulty in forming an opinion. It is in some respects conflicting, and in some respects unsatisfactory. I do not enter on any analysis of the evidence, which I have carefully read. But I have ultimately arrived at a conclusion unfavourable to the prospects of the adventure, and favourable to the pleas of the pursuers. I think the joint adventure was not properly an initiatory adventure, not a speculation for searching and ascertaining the existence of chromate. The mineral was believed to be, and stated by the defender to be, in the land, and it indeed was so to some extent. The object of the speculation was to develope it, and work it, and dispose of it profitably. Taking that view of the speculation, I think the result of the proof is that there is not in the land mentioned in this lease, and in the joint adventure, such mineral of the kind specified as can be worked with any reasonable hope of profit.

The speculation has up to the present time proved a failure, and nothing but a great outlay and a new and unexpected discovery can make it otherwise. This is the opinion of the pursuers. But not only so, I think it is a reasonable opinion so far as the truth has been or can at present be ascertained. Amid the conflicting evidence I cannot refuse to attach weight to the opinion of Professor Heddle and to the testimony of Mr W. G. Mowat.

Mr Walker says he is, and I do not doubt that he really is, of a different opinion. He is very sanguine as to the result. If he is right he will now get the whole adventure into his own hands, and then it is hoped he may find it as profitable as he anticipates. But since the date of the joint adventure nothing has occurred to justify this prospect of success.

Taking this view of the evidence, and construing fairly the missives which express the agreement of 22d March 1872, I am of opinion that, looking to the ascertained character and position of the minerals, and having regard to the fair ends and objects of the joint adventure, one of the parties cannot insist on continuing the connection and partnership against the wish of the other party, and apparently against the interests of both. The eager and sanguine disposition of Mr Walker may sustain his own efforts amid discouragements, but cannot justify the Court in compelling the pursuers to continue a hazardous speculation, which they, apparently not without some reason, expect to be disastrous.

Lord Mure concurred with the Lord President.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor so far as it disposes of the reductive conclusions of the summons: Quoad ultra recall the said interlocutor: Find that according to the sound construction of the contract of joint adventure between the pursuers and defender, dated the 22d March 1872, the defender guaranteed that the mine which forms the subject of the joint adventure should within a few years yield profits amounting to at least £2000, which sum was to be applied to repayment of the loan of £2000 obtained by the defender from the pursuers: Find that the said mine has not hitherto yielded any profit, and that there is no reasonable prospect of profits being realised in the future: Find that in these circumstances the pursuers are entitled to put an end to the joint adventure, and to call upon the defender to fulfil his guarantee: Therefore find, decern, and declare that the said contract of joint adventure has come to an end, and in respect it is admitted that the pursuers have retired with their own funds the bills for said advance of £2000, decern and ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuers of £2000, with interest from the date of citation: Assoilzie the defender from the 4th and 5th conclusions of the summons, and decern: Declare and decern in terms of the 6th conclusion; but

No. 45.

Dec. 10, 1875. Miller v. Walker.

in respect the sum of £139, 3s. 8½d. has not been advanced and paid by the pursuers, but only credited to the defender as an item in an unsettled account, dismiss the action quoad the 7th conclusion, and decern: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—GEORGE ANDREW, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 46.

Dec. 16, 1875. Anderson v. Garson.

THOMAS ANDERSON, Pursuer.—Trayner.
WILLIAM ROSS GARSON, Defender.—Mackintosh.

Process—Reponing—Decree by default.—The reponing of a party against whom decree by default has gone out is a matter for the discretion of the Court. Circumstances in which a defender was reponed upon payment of the previous expenses incurred by the pursuer.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THOMAS ANDERSON, builder in Leith, and a trustee and member of the "Imperial Building Association," raised an action against the individual partners of that association for payment of £420 and interest, being the amount contained in a bill signed by him and the other trustees of the association on behalf of and for the behoof of the association. Anderson had been compelled, in the first place, to retire the bill under a threat of personal diligence.

All the members of the association, with the exception of William Ross Garson, S.S.C., and a Mr M'All, allowed decree in absence to go out against them on 24th February 1875. Garson and M'All lodged defences, Garson acting as agent for both. The case was put out in the procedure-roll on 18th May, and again on 1st, 8th, and 15th June. On 12th June the trustee upon the estate of M'All, who had become bankrupt, allowed decree to go by default. On 15th June, the Lord Ordinary, in respect of no appearance for Garson, decerned against him in terms of the conclusions of the libel.

On 6th July Garson lodged a reclaiming note against this interlocutor.

It was explained for him at the bar that he had not observed the case in the rolls, and, in consequence, his not being represented before the Lord Ordinary was due to an oversight. He therefore prayed to be reponed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The undernoted cases were referred to.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—There can be no doubt that this is not a decree in absence but one by default, and I am not disposed to depart from anything I said in the case of Arthur v. Bell. It is always a matter in the discretion of the Court (1) whether a party against whom a decree by default has gone out is to be reponed at all; and (2) if so, upon what conditions it is to be done. We have reason to believe that decrees by default go out in cases where the parties or their agents are greatly to blame, and that is no light matter.

[1] Wilson v. Stevenson, June 20, 1835, 13 S. 962; Wilson v. Stark, Feb. 17, 1844, 6 D. 692, 16 Scot. Jur. 605; Anderson v. Brown, Jan. 20, 1854, 16 D. 367, 26 Scot. Jur. 175; M'Lay v. Keir, Feb. 24, 1854, 16 D. 658, 26 Scot. Jur. 309; Hamilton v. Christie, March 11, 1857, 19 D. 712, 29 Scot. Jur. 330; M'Laren v. Robertson, May 29, 1857, 19 D. 769, 29 Scot. Jur. 348; Mather v. Smith, Nov. 23, 1858, 21 D. 24, 31 Scot. Jur. 11; Young v. Mackenzie, July 19, 1859, 21 D. 1358, 31 Scot. Jur. 744; Boak v. Watson, July 14, 1860, 22 D. 1468, 32 Scot. Jur. 666; Arthur v. Bell, June 16, 1866, 4 Macph. 841, 38 Scot. Jur. 440; Shand's Prac. 961; A. S. July 11, 1828 (M'Laren's Proc. Acts, 547).

I think this defender should only be reponed upon paying the pre[illegible] penses incurred by the pursuer, including those incurred in connec[illegible] this reclaiming note.

An[illegible] Garson.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Remit to the Lord Ordinary to repone the said defender on payment by him of the expenses incurred by the pursuer in the cause up to this date."

A. DUNCAN & G. V. MANN, S.S.C.—W. R. GARSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875.

Kidd v. Byrne. Byrne v. Johnson.

WILLIAM KIDD, Pursuer.—Pattison—Rhind.
JOHN WILLIAM BYRNE, Defender.—Fraser—Scott.

JOHN WILLIAM BYRNE, Pursuer.—Fraser—Scott.
ROBERT JOHNSON, Defender.—D.-F. Watson—Keir.

Lease—Reparation—Game—Rabbits—Game Tenant—Relief.—An agricultural lease reserved to the landlord the sole right to the game and rabbits, with power to himself and his game tenant to shoot and sport on the farm without liability for damages. The landlord let the game to a tenant without express limitation of the amount of game and rabbits to be kept on the lands.

In an action by the agricultural tenant against the landlord, held that the landlord was liable for damage to crops arising from an excessive stock of rabbits.

In an action of relief by the landlord against the game tenant, held that it was an implied condition of the contract between him and the landlord that he should not keep more than a fair stock of rabbits for the purposes of sport, and that he was therefore bound to relieve the landlord of the damages found due to the agricultural tenant in the other action, and of the whole expenses incurred or found due by the landlord in that action down to the date of judgment in the Inner-House.

Observed that the liability of the landlord to his agricultural tenant and the liability of the game tenant to the landlord depended in each case on the contract, express or implied, between the respective parties, and that where the game tenant did not come individually into contact with the agricultural tenant there could be no direct right of action by the latter against the former in respect of injuries by game or rabbits.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. R.

IN 1864 Mr Byrne of Elshieshields let to William Kidd the farm of Chapelcroft on that estate for fifteen years from 1864. The lease contained the following clause:—"Reserving also to the proprietor the sole right to the whole game of every kind, rabbits and hares, and to all the fish in the rivers, burns, lakes, and ponds within the lands hereby let, with full power to himself and to those having his permission, or to the tenant of the game and rabbits, to hunt, shoot, or fish and sport on the farm without liability in damages; and the tenant shall be bound to preserve game of all kinds to the utmost of his power, to interrupt poachers and all unqualified persons, and to give information of them to the proprietor or those acting for him; and the tenant shall not be entitled to keep game dogs of any description, and he shall only be entitled to keep dogs for herding cattle; but no dogs of any kind shall be allowed to go into the plantation or into the ground kept in permanent pasture on which the plantation formerly grew."

By lease dated November 1872 Mr Byrne let to Mr R. Johnson, for five years, the mansion-house, &c. of Elshieshields, "together with the exclusive right of hunting and shooting, sporting, killing game and rabbits, and traversing the said estate and that of Templand and Reidhall

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875. Kidd v. Byrne. Byrne v. Johnson.

in search or pursuit of game, rabbits, wild ducks, or snipe, or for preserving the game and rabbits, and to kill vermin." Mr Johnson bound himself "to maintain on said lands during the currency of this lease a fair stock of game and rabbits, and to exercise the right of shooting in a sportsmanlike manner, and at the end of the lease to leave on said lands a fair stock of game and rabbits, and not to extirpate them; the said John William Byrne, on the other hand, promising his hearty co-operation in the preservation of the game by preventing the tenants on the property from infringing on the terms of their leases in relation to same."

In December 1874 Kidd raised an action against his landlord, Mr Byrne, concluding for £200 of damages for injuries done by rabbits to his crops during the years 1873 and 1874. He averred that during these years, in which Mr Johnson was lessee of the shootings of Elshieshields, the rabbits had increased to an unreasonable extent.

Mr Byrne, in defence, stated that he was willing to admit damage to the extent allowed by Mr Johnson, to whom he looked for relief.

Mr Johnson having repudiated liability, Mr Byrne raised an action against him for relief of the action at Kidd's instance, and of all costs of the same.

He pleaded;—(2) The defender, the game tenant, is bound to relieve the pursuer from the conclusions of the action raised at the instance of the agricultural tenant for damages caused to his crops by the excessive stock of rabbits kept by the defender, and also to relieve the pursuer of all costs, and to pay the expenses of the present action.

Mr Johnson pleaded in defence to the action of relief;—(2) The defender being under no obligation to relieve the pursuer of claims by tenants for damage by game or rabbits, the action cannot be maintained.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof in both actions, which was taken upon the same day. (The actions were not conjoined.) The following facts appeared:—

Until 1873 the stock of rabbits on the estate of Elshieshields was small, but soon after Mr Johnson took possession of the shootings (towards the close of 1872) the rabbits began to increase. During the year 1873 Mr Johnson made frequent complaints to Mr Byrne and his agents of the scarcity of game on the estate, and of Kidd and another tenant named Gillespie shooting rabbits. By threat of legal proceedings he compelled Mr Byrne, in July 1873, to apply for an interdict against Kidd and Gillespie killing rabbits. Interdict was accordingly granted by the Sheriff. From this time the rabbits were allowed to increase to a very large extent, notwithstanding complaints on the part of the agricultural tenants, and remonstrances on the part of Mr Byrne's agents. At length, in the spring of 1874, Mr Johnson took active steps to reduce the stock of rabbits, and large numbers were killed by trapping and netting. In a letter to Mr Byrne's agents, dated 30th April 1874, Mr Johnson stated that the rabbits had come in upon him like a flood.

The rent paid by Mr Johnson for the house and shootings was £164 per annum, and it was in evidence that between £120 and £130 was a fair rent for the house alone.

On 25th June 1875 the Lord Ordinary pronounced these interlocutors:—

(1) In the action at the instance of Kidd against Byrne:—"Finds, in the first place, as matter of law, that though by the lease, of which No. 11 of process is a copy, the farm of Chapelcroft, on the estate of Elshieshields, was let by the defender to the pursuer under reservation of 'the sole right to the game of every kind and of the rabbits and hares upon the lands' thereby set, and though the pursuer is by the said lease taken bound to preserve the game to the utmost of his power, the defender was not en-

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875.
Kidd v. Byrne.
Byrne v. Johnson.

titled so to manage the game and rabbits as to have an excessive stock upon the said farm, and the pursuer is not barred from suing for reparation of injury alleged to result from the violation of this implied condition of the contract: Finds, in the second place, as matters of fact (1) that both in 1873 and in 1874, though to a smaller extent in the former than in the latter year, the stock of rabbits on the said farm of Chapelcroft was excessive, the consequence being that serious injury was caused to the pursuer's crops of all kind upon the ground; and (2) that the damage thus done to the pursuer in 1873 was not less than £50, and in 1874 was not less than £60, these two sums amounting together to £110: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns against the defender for the said sum of £110, with interest at the rate of five per cent per annum from 17th December 1874, the date of the citation following on the summons, till payment, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The pursuer is tenant of the farm of Chapelcroft, on the estate of Elshieshields, and the defender is his landlord. The farm extends, inclusive of pasture land, to more than 300 acres, and the rent is £326. By the lease the defender reserved 'the sole right to the game of every kind, and to the rabbits and hares on the lands,' and he also reserved to himself and those having his permission, or to the tenant for the time being of the game and rabbits, power to hunt, shoot, or sport on the farm without being liable in damages. The pursuer, moreover, was taken bound to preserve the game to the utmost of his power. From 1864, when the lease began, till 1873, neither game nor rabbits were a cause of complaint to the pursuer; but early in 1873 the rabbits began to increase in numbers, the injuries to the crops became greater and more manifest, and both rabbits and injuries went on increasing, as the pursuer says, till after the harvest of 1874, when things became so bad that the present action for reparation was instituted. It appears that in the autumn of 1872 the game and rabbits on Elshieshields were let with the mansion-house to a Mr Johnson, and the increase in the number of rabbits may have been caused by his adoption of a course of management different from that practised by the defender when the game and rabbits were in his own hands. Whether this is or is not the true explanation of the increased number of the rabbits in 1873 and in 1874 is, however, really immaterial on the present occasion, because the defender could not, by letting the game and rabbits, shake off or diminish his responsibility to the pursuer, the agricultural tenant of the farm.

"The first question for consideration is whether there was any responsibility incumbent on the defender for depredations committed by game on the crops of the pursuer. Both were reserved to the defender: the power of hunting and killing both was also reserved without the defender being held liable in damages. What is the effect of this provision? Does it imply that game or rabbits may be preserved to any extent, that depredations on the estate may be committed to any extent, and yet that there should be no redress? This was a view that was hardly presented on the part of the defender. Both principle and the authorities are against it; and consequently the Lord Ordinary has felt no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the reservation and the power might be abused in violation of the lease, and that for the abuse, should it be established, the defender must answer to the pursuer.

"This brings the controversy to an issue not of law but of fact. Was there an abuse of the exclusive right to game and rabbits which was reserved by the defender? In other words, were game or rabbits permitted so to increase in number that the injury done to the crops was greater than was compatible with the return which the pursuer might reasonably expect from the cultivation of his farm as let by the defender? That some injury was to be calculated on is certain. Game and rabbits were reserved, and these could not be present without committing some depredation. The difficulty is in determining when the point is reached at which the stock ceases to be fair and becomes excessive. No

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875.
Kidd v. Byrne.
Byrne v. Johnson.

(2) In the relative action of relief at the instance of Byrne against Johnson:—"Finds, as matter of law, that the defender, as game tenant on Elshieshields under the lease set forth in the record is not entitled to keep on Elshieshields, or on any of the farms of that estate, more than a fair average stock of rabbits; and, on the contrary, that it is an implied condition of the said lease that should the defender keep more than a fair average stock of rabbits on the said estate, or on any of the farms thereof, and the pursuer in consequence be subjected in damages for injury caused to the crops of his tenants or others by this excess, the defender is bound to relieve the pursuer of these damages: In the second place, finds, as matter of fact (1) That in 1873 and in 1874, though to a less extent in the former than in the latter year, the stock of rabbits on the farm of Chapelcroft, part of Elshieshields, of which farm William Kidd senior is tenant, was not a fair average stock, but on the contrary was an excessive stock of rabbits, the consequence being that serious injury was done to the crops of all kinds upon the ground of that farm in these years; (2) That in an action at the instance of the said William Kidd senior against the present pursuer for damages on account of injury done by rabbits to his crops in 1873 and in 1874, now depending in Court, it has been found by interlocutor dated 25th June current, following on a proof, at the leading of which the present defender by arrangement was present and took part, that the damages in which the present general rule can be laid down for all cases, and the result in each case, therefore, as it occurs, must be governed by the facts which are established. Here the Lord Ordinary thinks that an excess in the stock of rabbits has been proved, and he is of this opinion, in the first place, because of the numbers which were upon the farm in 1873 and in 1874, as compared with the stock between 1864 and 1872, and, in the second place, because the depredations on the crops in 1873 and in 1874 were so great as naturally if not necessarily to suggest that the interests of the agricultural tenant had been neither fairly or reasonably regarded. On the part of the defender it was maintained that if the stock of rabbits became too large, this circumstance was at least in part to be ascribed to neglect on the part of the pursuer. He, it was said, might have killed the rabbits, and thus have kept the numbers down; his lease, while imposing upon him the obligation to preserve the game, imposing no obligation on him to preserve the rabbits upon the farm. This construction of the lease is, however, contradicted by the right previously asserted by the defender. In July 1873 he obtained an interdict in the Sheriff Court, by which the pursuer was prevented from killing, not only game, but rabbits, and therefore it seems vain for the defender now to argue that rabbits might have been killed by the pursuer, and that thus the injuries which were suffered might have been prevented.

---

"The only evidence as to the pecuniary amount of the pursuer's loss is that which has been afforded by the witnesses for the pursuer. They agree generally in the view that the sum sued for is not greater than is required for reparation of the injuries sustained, but the Lord Ordinary thinks that the sum to be allowed must be reduced below their estimation. In the first place, the witnesses are of a class who naturally sympathise with the pursuer, and who, while speaking with perfect honesty, may, nevertheless, unconsciously fall into some exaggeration. Some allowance must therefore be made upon this account. In the second place, the injury which would be caused by rabbits, even if the stock had not been excessive, must also be taken into account, and this the Lord Ordinary thinks is a consideration which has been overlooked. Making the best use he could of the materials afforded, the Lord Ordinary considers that £50 for 1873 and £60 for 1874 is a reasonable assessment of the damage to which, according to his view of the law and of the facts, the pursuer is entitled, and £110 accordingly is the sum for which decree has been given by the foregoing interlocutor."

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875. Kidd v. Byrne. Byrne v. Johnson.

pursuer is liable for injury done in 1873 and in 1874 to the crops on Chapelcroft by the excess in the stock of rabbits beyond a fair average stock, is £110, and decree for this sum has been given against the present pursuer, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from 17th December 1874, the date of citation following on the summons in said action, till payment; and (3) That in the said action the present pursuer has also been found liable to the said William Kidd senior in the expenses of process: Therefore, repels the defences, and decerns the defender to make payment to the present pursuer of the said sum of £110, with interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from said 17th December 1874 till payment; or otherwise to make payment of the said sum and interest to the said William Kidd senior, that the pursuer may thereby be relieved of the decree pronounced against him as aforesaid: Further, finds the defender liable to the pursuer in payment or relief (1) of the expenses incurred by the pursuer in defending the said action at the instance of the said William Kidd senior; and (2) of the expenses found due by the pursuer to the said William Kidd senior in the said action, all in terms of the conclusions of the present summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to his expenses in the present action, of which, as well as of the expenses incurred by the pursuer in defending the said action at the instance of the said William Kidd senior, allows accounts to be given in, and remits these accounts," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The defender is game tenant of Elshieshields, and is now sued by his landlord for relief of the damages claimed from the latter by Kidd and Gillespie, two of his agricultural tenants. The question is, whether the present defender is answerable for the consequences of the alleged injuries to the tenants' crops even on the assumption that damages must be rendered by the landlord. The answer, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, depends, in the first place, on the view to be taken of the defender's rights as game tenant,—Can he increase or preserve rabbits to any extent, whatever may be the consequences to the landlord? Or is his right, so far as it can be exercised without responsibility to the landlord for the consequences, subject to an implied condition that the stock one year or one period with another shall not exceed a fair average stock? The latter is the view which the Lord Ordinary has adopted, and upon which the finding as to the law of the case in the foregoing interlocutor has been pronounced. The answer to the cardinal question depends, secondly, on whether the stock of rabbits on Chapelcroft, as well as on the Holm farm of Elshieshields (Gillespie), the tenant of which is also suing his landlord for damages, was only a fair average stock, and not an excessive stock in 1873 and in 1874. As to this a long proof has been led. Kidd and Gillespie, the pursuers of the actions for damages, the present pursuer, who is defender in these actions, and the present defender, were all present and took part, and the conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary has been brought is, that the stock was far in excess of that which was a fair average stock. There may be cases in which it is necessary to guage what is a fair average stock as between a landlord and his agricultural tenants as compared with that which is a fair average stock as between that same landlord and his game tenant. But the present, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, is not one in which such a necessity exists; because, in his opinion, the stock of rabbits exceeded such a fair average stock as either landlord or game tenant was entitled to maintain without answering for the consequences. Probably it is not necessary, but nevertheless it may be right, for the Lord Ordinary to explain that his attention was called, and has been directed, to the cases that have been decided, and especially to the decision in Inglis v. Moir and Gunnis, 7th December 1871, 10 Macph. 204. The Lord Ordinary thinks that his view of the law, as set forth in the first finding of his interlocutor, is neither contradicted nor foreclosed by anything which was said or done in the case just mentioned, or in any other decision. Had he thought otherwise, the judgment he has given would not have been pronounced."

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875. Kidd v. Byrne. Byrne v. Johnson.

In each action the defender reclaimed.*

Argued for Johnson (the game tenant);—(1) Kidd was not entitled to damages against his landlord, and therefore the claim of relief fell. From the terms of the agricultural leases it was evident that a considerable amount of game, and the existence of a game tenant, were contemplated, and must be presumed to have been taken into account in adjusting the rent. The game clause in the lease, if it meant anything, must have the effect of disentitling the tenant to a claim of damages which otherwise would have been competent to him. To get over such a clause he must establish a case amounting to bad faith on the part of the landlord. The case was precisely similar to that of Morton v. Graham, in which the tenant was found not entitled to damages.[1] (2) In any view Mr Johnson could not be made responsible. He entered into no contract with the agricultural tenant. The increase of rabbits arose from natural causes. He was not bound to kill them for the benefit of the farmer.[2] Mr Byrne might have stipulated that the game tenant should relieve him of all claims at the instance of the farmer. But this was not done. On the contrary, instead of binding him to keep down the rabbits, Mr Byrne bound him to keep up a fair stock of rabbits. The measure of liability of Mr Johnson to Mr Byrne was therefore clearly not the same as the measure of liability of Mr Byrne to his agricultural tenant. The minimum number of rabbits which Mr Johnson was obliged to maintain was a fair stock, i.e., the maximum number which Mr Byrne was entitled to keep in a question with his agricultural tenant.

Argued for Byrne;—(1) The expression "a fair stock" in the game lease meant a fair stock for the purposes of sport, not of profit. The rent paid by Mr Johnson was only £30 or £40 more than would have been got for the mansion-house alone, shewing that the shootings were regarded as a mere privilege or adjunct of the mansion-house. The right communicated to Mr Johnson was the right reserved by the landlord to himself in the agricultural lease, and therefore whatever claim the agricultural tenant had against the landlord he had the same claim against the game tenant. (2) Further, in giving the right to the game and rabbits to a game tenant Mr Byrne cannot be held to have authorised an unreasonable and oppressive exercise of that right. If, therefore, Mr Johnson had unreasonably increased the stock of rabbits, he and not the landlord was directly liable to the agricultural tenant. Culpa tenet suos auctores.[3]

Argued for Kidd;—It was proved that the rabbits had been increased to an extravagant extent, beyond anything which could have been in con-

---

* A similar action of damages, raised against Mr Byrne by Gilbert Gillespie, tenant of the Holm Farm of Elshieshields, and a relative action of relief, raised by Mr Byrne against Mr Johnson, were heard at the same time, and were disposed of in the same way, both by the Lord Ordinary and by the Second Division.

[1] Drysdale v. Jameson, Nov. 30, 1832, 11 S. 147, 5 Scot. Jur. 134 (Lord Glenlee's opinion); Morton v. Graham, Nov. 30, 1867, 6 Macph. 71, 40 Scot. Jur. 37 (Lord President's opinion); Broadwood v. Hunter, July 19, 1855, 17 D. 1139; Wilson v. Wemyss, Dec. 2, 1847, 10 D. 194, 20 Scot. Jur. 51 (Lord Fullerton's opinion).

[2] Inglis v. Moir's Tutors and Gunnis, Dec. 7, 1871, 10 Macph. 204, 44 Scot. Jur. 123.

[3] Tassie v. Magistrates of Glasgow, June 18, 1822, 1 S. 503; Weston and Sons v. Tailors of Potterrow, July 10, 1839, 1 D. 1218, 11 Scot. Jur. 597; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock Sacking Co., May 13, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 671.

templation of the parties to the contract when his (Kidd's) lease was entered into. Whatever relief he might have, the landlord was the person with whom he had contracted, and who was therefore liable to him. No. 47. Dec. 16, 1875. Kidd v. Byrne. Byrne v. Johnson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In regard to the actions by the agricultural tenants against the landlord I think that as long as the landlord or his game tenant kept no more than a fair sporting stock of rabbits the agricultural tenants were not, under the special terms of their leases, entitled to complain. Such is the effect I should give to the reservation contained in those instruments. But I am perfectly satisfied that in the latter part of 1873 and in 1874 the stock of rabbits was unreasonable. It was not a sporting stock. It had to be kept down by trapping and netting (which are not sport), and this was done by the orders of Mr Johnson, who says that they came in upon him like a flood. It is impossible to say that such a stock was not largely in excess of anything in contemplation of the parties to the leases.

It has been argued for the landlord that the right of the agricultural tenants to redress is against the game tenant, in respect that he has gone beyond the terms of his lease. No plea to this effect is stated on record, and I think the argument unsound. It is enough to say that the liability of the game tenant must arise on his own contract, and that he has no contract with the agricultural tenant. The principle, which applies to cases of delict committed by the wrongful exercise of powers derived from another, has no application. Accordingly, in the question between the landlord and the agricultural tenants the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right. There might remain some question as to the amount of damages, but I think we must regard the Lord Ordinary's judgment as to the amount as the verdict of a jury, not to be disturbed, unless manifestly wrong.

The question of relief between the landlord and the game tenant is very important. We have no case between the agricultural tenants and the game tenant. The question is between the landlord who let the shooting for purposes of sport, and the game tenant, who took the lease. I adhere entirely to the views which I expressed in the case of Inglis v. Moir's Trustees: When the game tenant does not individually come into contact with the agricultural tenant, he has nothing to do with the arrangements between the agricultural tenant and the landlord. He is not bound to know anything of the terms of the agricultural tenant's lease, whether it be prior or posterior to his own. His rights and liabilities must be discovered from his own contract with the landlord.

This case is remarkably different in its circumstances from that of Inglis v. Moir. In that case the agricultural tenant had right to kill rabbits on his farm. The real mischief was caused by the landlord having exercised a reserved right of planting, and the rabbits came from plantations reserved in the lease. The game tenant pleaded, successfully, that he was no more bound to protect the agricultural tenant from rabbits than the agricultural tenant was bound to protect him. We found that he had not prevented the agricultural tenant from killing rabbits, and we held that the mere fact of his being in possession of the shootings was not sufficient to make him liable.

Here the circumstances are very different. Mr Johnson acquired the right of excluding the agricultural tenants from killing rabbits, and exercised that right by obtaining interdict against them. Having done that, he allowed the rabbits to increase to an enormous extent. Now, his liabilty must be judged of upon the

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875.
Kidd v. Byrne.
Byrne v. Johnson.

terms of his own lease. If he was making a fair and reasonable use of the subject let to him, that is enough to protect him. If his use of the subject was beyond reason, it is clear that he is not entitled to embroil the landlord with his agricultural tenants, or subject him in a claim of damages at their instance, by a use of the subject which is beyond the contemplation of parties. At the same time I think it right to make two observations. I am unable to accept Mr Fraser's argument that where a landlord grants an agricultural lease and afterwards a game lease of the same subject, he takes the game tenant bound by all the stipulations in the agricultural lease. That would lead to the most extravagant results. Where there is no contract between the agricultural tenant and the game tenant it is as impossible to import the terms of the prior agricultural lease into the game lease as it would be to import the terms of the game lease into the agricultural lease if the game lease were the first in date. In the next place, I do not think that the obligation imposed on the game tenant to maintain a fair stock of game and rabbits implies an obligation to keep down their number to a fair stock. The object of the clause is to maintain the stock, not to diminish it. The obligation it imposes is to preserve, and not to destroy. The liability and obligation to keep down the stock must be looked for elsewhere. It is impossible to say that, if the game tenant chose to take his risk of having to relieve the landlord of a claim of damages by the agricultural tenant, the landlord could, under this clause, prevent him from increasing the stock of game and rabbits. Still, I think this throws some light upon the question. The landlord is bound to protect the sporting tenant to the extent of a fair sporting stock. He undertakes that up to the extent of a fair sporting stock he will be liable. The obligation on the game tenant to maintain a fair stock necessarily implies this. But will the landlord be liable for anything beyond this? It may be said, with some show of reason, that in going beyond this the game tenant proceeds at his own risk. But the true ground of liability here is the violation by the game tenant of the essential conditions of his right. Where the stock has been increased to such an extravagant extent as in the present case, far beyond anything required for sporting purposes, there is no difficulty in holding that this was not the use contemplated by the game lease, and that the maxim applies, culpa tenet suos auctores.

I believe that this increase of rabbits was more of an accident than anything else. Mr Johnson seems to have been afraid of having too few rabbits instead of too many, and thus was not alive to the danger of their increase. Still he must bear the consequences. The landlord repeatedly warned him of the claim which he was incurring. I think that the right of relief has been made out. The injuries suffered by the agricultural tenants have plainly been great, and with every desire to protect the reasonable rights, even of sporting tenants, it is impossible to justify what was done by Mr Johnson.

Lord Ormidale.—I have come to the same conclusion. There are two sets of actions here,—two at the instance of the agricultural tenants against their landlord, and corresponding actions of relief by the landlord against the game tenant.

First, as between the agricultural tenants and the landlord, the ground on which I arrive at the same result as the Lord Ordinary may be shortly stated. In the leases to the agricultural tenants the landlord reserves all right to the game and the rabbits. There are also in the leases sufficient indications that it was for the

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875.
Kidd v. Byrne.
Byrne v. Johnson.

purpose of sport this reservation was made. I likewise take it to be clear that the landlord had it in his power to exercise the reserved right himself, or to transfer it to another. At the same time, I think it is implied in the agricultural leases that the preservation of game and rabbits was not to be carried beyond a reasonable extent. The landlord, or party in his right, could not, for example, convert the farms into rabbit warrens to the destruction of the proper rights of the agricultural tenants without being answerable in damages.

The next question is whether the agricultural tenants have suffered damage, and to what extent. I agree with your Lordships that in a matter of this kind we ought to deal with a Lord Ordinary's judgment very much as with the verdict of a jury, and adopt his conclusions, unless there is something plainly wrong in them. My own impression, on a consideration of the evidence, is that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a very fair conclusion as to the amount of damages. Very considerable injury was undeniably sustained by the agricultural tenants. In giving their evidence, they as well as, perhaps, some of their witnesses may have spoken somewhat extravagantly as to their rights on the one hand, and the extent of the damage sustained by them on the other. Taking all this, however, into account, and making due allowance for it, I think the Lord Ordinary's assessment of the damages is not exposed to any well-founded objection.

Then as to the question of relief by the landlord against the game tenant to whom the right reserved in the agricultural leases was transferred, I think that there was an implied obligation or understanding in the game lease to the effect that the preservation of the game and rabbits was not to be carried to an excessive or unreasonable extent. The game tenant was expressly bound to keep up a fair average stock of game and rabbits, but although not expressly said, I cannot doubt that, according to the true meaning of his lease, he also came under an implied obligation not to increase the stock beyond a fair and reasonable amount, having regard to the rights of the agricultural tenants whose leases were prior in date to his. According to the evidence, however, he appears to me to have in this respect exceeded the just measure of his right, and on that ground to have subjected himself in damages to the same amount as that in which the landlord has been subjected to the agricultural tenants. The result is, that while the landlord is liable under his contract to his agricultural tenants, so is the game tenant under his contract liable to the landlord in relief.

These are shortly the grounds on which I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. Delicate and difficult questions are sure to arise from the conflict of interests between the agricultural tenant who has one use of the surface, and the game tenant, who has another use of the surface. It is the interest of the one to have as little game as possible, and the interest of the other to have as much game as possible.

The agricultural tenants were fairly warned in their leases that a game interest was reserved, either to the landlord for his own behoof, or to any game tenant to whom he might give over the game rights. They must be held to have laid their account with having a game tenant beside them, or, at all events, with having to bear the loss and inconvenience which a reasonable and ordinary stock of game and rabbits might cause. In Kidd's lease it is expressly said that there may be a tenant, not only of the game proper, but of the rabbits. On the other hand, Mr Johnson, the game tenant, must be held to have known—indeed, he

No. 47.

Dec. 16, 1875.
Kidd v. Byrne.
Byrne v. Johnson.

must have seen—that there were agricultural tenants on the ground, and therefore he must be held to have taken the burden, which a game tenant takes in such cases, that he will not preserve to an excessive degree. Similar principles apply to both cases. The agricultural tenants must bear a certain amount of loss inevitable from the presence of a reasonable and moderate amount of game and rabbits for the sport of the game tenant. And, in like manner, the game tenant must bear the damages, if by his act or negligence he makes the stock excessive. The Lord Ordinary has applied this principle. He uses the same phrase in the interlocutor finding the landlord liable to the agricultural tenant, and in the interlocutor finding the game tenant bound to relieve the landlord. The reason given is exactly the same, namely, that the stock of rabbits was excessive, and more than a reasonable stock for moderate sport over such farms as are here in question. As I read the proof and the Lord Ordinary's judgment he has not given the agricultural tenants full damages for all the loss which they have suffered. He has deducted what they were bound to bear. On the other hand, he has not subjected the game tenant in the full amount of damages caused by the rabbits. He has deducted the damage which was inevitable from the fact of a moderate stock of rabbits, and for which Mr Johnson was not liable from his position as a game tenant. Mr Johnson cannot complain of being found liable to the landlord for the excess of damages over what was reasonably in the contemplation of parties, for which excess the landlord has been found liable to the agricultural tenants.

Lord Neaves was absent.

Additional expenses having been allowed to the respondent in each reclaiming note, counsel for Mr Byrne moved that Mr Johnson should be found liable to him in relief of the expenses in Kidd's action, incurred and found due by him (Byrne) since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Mr Johnson opposed the motion, on the ground that the reclaiming note for Mr Byrne was unnecessary.

The Court were of opinion that Mr Byrne would not have been in safety to have acquiesced in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary against him, that he was entitled to full indemnity, and therefore must be allowed the expenses in question.

These interlocutors were pronounced:—

(In the action at Kidd's instance against Byrne)—"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of, with additional expenses," &c.

(In the action of relief at the instance of Byrne against Johnson)—"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of: Find the defender (reclaimer) liable to the pursuer in payment or relief (1) of the additional expenses incurred by the present pursuer since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the reclaiming note for him in the action at the instance of William Kidd senior against him, and (2) of the expenses found due in said reclaiming note by the pursuer to the said William Kidd senior, and decern: Find the present pursuer also entitled to the additional expenses incurred by him in this action of relief since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decern," &c.

R. P. Stevenson, S.S.C.—W. S. Stuart, S.S.C.—George Andrew, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 48.

Dec. 17, 1875.
M'Laurin v. Stafford.

AGNES STAFFORD OR M'LAURIN AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Asher.
JANET M'LAURIN OR STAFFORD AND HUSBAND, Defenders.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.

Issue—Reduction—Error.—A father and mother aged respectively seventy-eight and seventy-five years brought an action against a daughter and her husband to reduce an irrevocable disposition granted by the pursuers six months before, whereby, subject to the pursuers' liferents, and certain burdens, the parents' moveable estate, and a liferent of heritage, were conferred upon the daughter in consideration of her, in time coming, assisting the mother in the management of a hotel. The pursuers averred that the deed was executed under essential error on their part, they believing that the deed was a revocable testamentary deed making alterations upon a prior settlement in accordance with instructions given by them to their law-agent, while, in fact, it was irrevocable and not in accordance with these instructions; and further, that the error had been induced by the defenders in instructing the law-agent, and by the law-agent, or by one or other of them; and further, that the error had been fraudulently induced by these parties. The pursuers pleaded—(1) essential error, (2) essential error induced by the defenders, (3) fraudulent impetration. Held that besides an issue of fraud the pursuers were entitled to the issue "whether the pursuers in granting the disposition were under essential error as to the substance and effect of the said deed," without the addition of the words "induced by the defenders," as contended for by the defenders.

1ST DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. Lord Shand.

THIS action was raised in May 1875 by Mrs Agnes Ferguson or M'Laurin, wife of Ronald M'Laurin, sometime merchant in Oban, and residing there, and by her husband for his own interest, and as administrator-in-law for his wife, to reduce a disposition granted by Mrs M'Laurin, with consent of her husband, on 12th November 1874.

The pursuers called as defenders their daughter, Mrs Janet M'Laurin or Stafford, wife of John Francis Stafford, M.D., residing at Pollokshields, Glasgow, and her husband, and several other persons having an interest in the deed.

Dr and Mrs Stafford alone defended the action.

The grounds of action were set forth in the following plea:—The pursuers are entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for—(1) Because the said deed was signed by them under essential error. (2) Because in signing the said deed the pursuers were under essential error induced by the said Dr and Mrs Stafford and Robert Lawrence (the law-agent who prepared the deed), or one other of them. (3) Because the said deed was obtained from the pursuers by fraudulent concealment practised by the said Dr and Mrs Stafford and Robert Lawrence, or one or other of them. (4) Because the said deed was obtained from the pursuers by false and fraudulent representations as to its tenor and effect made by the said Dr and Mrs Stafford and Robert Lawrence, or one or other of them.

The pursuers averred—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer Mrs Agnes Ferguson or M'Laurin, and the pursuer Ronald M'Laurin, who are respectively seventy-five and seventy-eight years of age, were married in the year 1825. At that time Mr M'Laurin had a general store in Oban, and also acted as a carrier between Glasgow and Oban. He was able to read and write in Gaelic, but understood very little English. He was upwards of twenty-five years of age before he understood English at all, and, up to the present time, he has been much more familiar with Gaelic. His hearing has been defective for a number of years. Mrs M'Laurin cannot write, never having been taught."

The pursuers further stated that after their marriage Mrs M'Laurin took the management of the store till about 1845, when she left it to the care of her husband, and, having bought the old Woodside Hotel, Oban, commenced the business of hotel keeping. (Cond. 3) "About fifteen years after the Woodside Hotel was acquired Mrs M'Laurin proposed to her husband to feu a piece of ground in Oban for the purpose of building a larger hotel upon it. He had taken no part in the management of the Woodside Hotel, and was against the proposal, so that Mrs M'Laurin feued the ground in her own name, and built upon it, and furnished the hotel now known as the 'Craig-ard.' A number of years thereafter Mrs M'Laurin bought for £750 an adjoining piece of ground, with a villa upon it, called Braehead, and upon which she borrowed money to the extent of £600. She also furnished this villa, and used it as an adjunct to the hotel. The money spent in building and furnishing Craig-ard Hotel and Braehead belonged to Mr M'Laurin. Mrs M'Laurin had none of her own, and there never was any marriage-contract between her and her husband. The bond over Braehead, as well as those taken over Craig-ard, were granted by Mr M'Laurin. Mrs M'Laurin was an active person, and Mr M'Laurin rarely interfered with anything she did." (Cond. 4) "Craig-ard Hotel (upon which there was taken a bond for £500) is worth about £3000, and the furniture, &c. in it is worth about £4000 more. Braehead was worth about £150 over the bond for £600, and the furniture in it would be worth about £300." . . .

No. 48.
Dec. 17, 1875.
M'Laurin v. Stafford.

Cond. 5 set forth that besides a son and daughter who died without issue the pursuers had the following children—(1) Mrs Catherine M'Laurin or Hunter, wife of John C Hunter, storekeeper, United States, who had seven children; (2) Mrs Agnes M'Laurin or Fleming, wife of Daniel Fleming, clothier, Glasgow, who had no children; (3) Lauchlin M'Laurin, storekeeper, United States, who had two children; (4) Ronald M'Laurin, who died about three years ago, leaving a widow, Mrs Elizabeth Ferguson or M'Laurin (who was a cousin of his own), and two children; and (5) the defender, Mrs Janet M'Laurin or Stafford, who was married in November 1869 to her present husband, who was then a medical student, and had no children. At the time of their marriage Dr Stafford was about twenty-three years of age and his wife about thirty-six. (Cond. 6) "The defender, Mrs Stafford, assisted her mother in the hotel business up to the date of her marriage, as her other daughters had done, until they were married. She also assisted her in the following season. The pursuers' son Ronald also assisted in the hotel from 1870 up to the time of his death in 1872, and his wife has assisted in the hotel since the spring of 1871, and continues still to do so. The pursuers were very much opposed to the marriage of the defender with Mr Stafford."

(Cond. 8) "In July 1872 the pursuers' son Ronald died. Before his death, and of this date (May 2, 1872) the pursuer, Mrs M'Laurin, with consent of her husband, made a settlement, by which she gave to Ronald and his wife, and the survivor of them (after the death of herself and husband, and subject to her husband's liferent), the liferent of the Craig-ard Hotel and plenishing, and the fee to their children, but subject (1) to an annuity to the defender, Mrs Stafford, of £80 a-year for ten years and £100 a-year for two years longer, and (2) to an annuity of £20 a-year for ten years to Mrs Catherine M'Laurin or Hunter. This settlement only dealt with the Craig-ard Hotel and its plenishing, and as Ronald and his wife were substantially managing the business of the hotel, the intention of the pursuers was that they should continue the business after their (the pursuers') death, subject to the annuities before mentioned. The terms of this settlement were made known to the defender, Mrs Stafford, in the summer of 1872, and the pursuers' other children resident in Scotland were also made aware of its terms." (Cond. 9) "In the same year

No. 48.
Dec. 17, 1875.
M'Laurin v. Stafford.

(1872) and after the death of the pursuers' son Ronald, the defender, Mrs Stafford, who knew that Braehead stood in name of her mother, induced her mother to bequeath it and its contents to her, and on 14th October 1872 her mother executed a disposition and settlement, by which Braehead, with its furnishing and plenishing, was left to her. The pursuer, Mr M'Laurin, was not asked to consent to this deed, as he had been displeased at Mrs Stafford getting so much under the settlement made in May preceding." (Cond. 10) "On 14th August 1873 the pursuer, Mrs M'Laurin, with consent of her husband, the other pursuer, conveyed Braehead absolutely to the defender, Mrs Stafford, by disposition of that date. The defender, Mrs Stafford, had pressed for such a conveyance, saying that the deed of 14th October 1872 had not been properly prepared; and the pursuer yielded, and got her husband to concur."

The following were the pursuers' averments in regard to the deed under reduction:—(Cond. 11) "The defender, Mrs Stafford, also pressed on her mother to alter the testamentary settlement made by her, with consent of her husband, in May 1872. Mrs M'Laurin agreed to make certain alterations on this deed. These alterations were to the effect that after Mrs M'Laurin's death the defender, Mrs Stafford, should come in to manage the hotel along with Mrs Ronald M'Laurin junior, and divide the profits between them. Mrs Ronald M'Laurin junior was to continue at Craig-ard so long as she remained unmarried. Ronald's two children (now aged 7 and 5 years) were to get Craig-ard and the furniture in it when they came of age. The existing burdens were to be paid up during their minority as far as possible. The addition to Craig-ard was to be built principally from the price of Braehead. Mrs M'Laurin accordingly instructed Mr Lawrence, writer, Oban, her ordinary law-agent, to prepare a deed making the foregoing alterations on the settlement of 1872;" and (Cond. 12) "Thereafter the deed under reduction was prepared by Mr Lawrence, writer, Oban, on the instructions of the defenders, Dr and Mrs Stafford, and signed by or for the pursuers."*

* The deed bore,—"I, Mrs Agnes Ferguson or M'Laurin, . . . and I, the said Ronald M'Laurin, ... for the love and affection which we have and bear to Janet M'Laurin or Stafford, our daughter, wife of John Francis Stafford, physician and surgeon, residing at Pollokshields, near Glasgow, and in order to secure her assistance in the management of the business of the Craig-ard Hotel, Oban, during the remainder of our lives, do hereby, but under burden of our own liferent of the premises, give, grant, assign, and dispone from us, our heirs and successors, to and in favour of the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford—In the first place, All and Whole," &c. (the pursuers' heritable property), "declaring that the said subjects before disponed shall, after the death of the longest liver of us, be held by the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford in trust for her own liferent use allenarly, and after her death for Ronald M'Laurin junior, and Margaret M'Arthur M'Laurin, our grandchildren, children of the deceased Ronald M'Laurin, our son, equally between them; whom failing, our other grandchildren, the children of our son Lachlan M'Laurin, and of our other daughters Catherine M'Laurin or Hunter, Agnes M'Laurin or Fleming, and the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford, equally among the said grandchildren in fee; and further declaring, that the before-written disposition in favour of our said daughter, Janet M'Laurin or Stafford shall be burdened, as we hereby burden the same, with payment of the following provisions to our other children, namely, to the said Catherine M'Laurin or Hunter, £200 sterling; to the said Agnes M'Laurin or Fleming, £100 sterling; to the said Lachlan M'Laurin, £100 sterling; and the same shall also be burdened, as we hereby burden it, with payment of £200 sterling to our daughter-in-law Elizabeth Ferguson or M'Laurin, widow of our said son, Ronald M'Laurin; which provisions shall be payable to the parties before named in five yearly instalments, commencing at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen twelve months after the death of the longest liver of us, and shall

No. 48.

Dec. 17, 1875.
M'Laurin v. Stafford.

(Cond. 15) "At the time when the said deed was signed by the pursuers, although it was read over in their presence, as this was done rapidly and without explanation, neither of the pursuers understood its import. Mr Lawrence, who prepared the said deed, was the ordinary law-agent of the pursuers, and they relied upon his having taken care as their agent that the said deed was in strict accordance with the instructions which Mrs M'Laurin had given him. The pursuers had no idea that Mr Lawrence had been taking any instructions (as was the fact) from Dr and Mrs Stafford as to the preparation of the said deed. The defenders, Dr and Mrs Stafford, and Mr Lawrence, or one or other of them, falsely and fraudulently represented to the pursuers that the deed was merely an alteration of the testamentary settlement of May 1872 of the nature agreed to by Mrs M'Laurin as above mentioned, and the pursuers signed it in this be in full to our said children before named of their legitim, bairns' part of gear, and all they can ask or claim by and through the death of us or either of us; and the same shall likewise be burdened, as we hereby burden it, with payment of the sums of £300 sterling to the said Ronald M'Laurin junior, and £2000 to the said Margaret M'Arthur or M'Laurin, which sums shall be payable on the younger of them attaining the age of twenty-one years complete; . . . . and in the event of both dying before the said term of payment without leaving issue, the said provisions shall lapse and become void; and we hereby entrust the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford with the maintenanee, education, and upbringing of the said Ronald M'Laurin junior, and Margaret M'Arthur M'Laurin, after our death, and until the arrival of the before-mentioned period, for payment of their provision to them, with power to her, in the event of her death, to appoint trustees or guardians to manage the said subjects, to which they will then succeed, until the arrival of the said period; and in respect it is our wish that she should have the custody and entire control of them, and defray, as by acceptance hereof she obliges herself to defray, the whole cost of their maintenance, education, and upbringing after our death, we hereby declare and provide that should their mother, the said Elizabeth Ferguson or M'Laurin, remove, or attempt to remove the said children from the custody of the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford, and from under her control and management, the said provision of £200 in her favour, or the instalments thereof which may remain unpaid, shall be forfeited, and she shall have no claim thereto; and we hereby reserve to ourselves and to the survivor power to diminish the provisions before conceived in favour of our said children, daughter-in-law, and grandchildren, or to deduct from one and add to another, or to cancel and withdraw them entirely, but not so as that the total amount thereof, with which the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford and the said subjects before disponed are burdened, shall be increased beyond the sum of £1100 sterling; and in view of its being necessary or expedient to enlarge Craig-ard Hotel, which is built upon the subjects before disponed, we reserve to ourselves power, during our joint lives, or the life of the survivor, to enlarge it, and to borrow money and grant heritable security in common form over the said subjects for the cost of the said enlargement to an extent not exceeding the sum of £2000: Declaring that after the death of the survivor of us it shall be in the power of the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford in like manner to enlarge the said hotel, and to borrow money and grant heritable security over the said subjects for the cost thereof to the extent foresaid; and further we, the said Agnes Ferguson or M'Laurin, and Ronald M'Laurin, do hereby, but under burden of our own liferent of the premises, assign, convey, and make over to the said Janet M'Laurin or Stafford, her heirs and assignees, the whole furniture and plenishing of every kind in Craig-ard Hotel, Oban, as the same belongs to us or either of us, and that as her absolute property; but reserving to us and each of us our liferent use and enjoyment of the same; and we resign the said pieces of ground before disponed for new infeftment," &c. The deed was signed by Mr M'Laurin, and by a notary for Mrs M'Laurin, on the ground that she could not write, "never having been taught to do so."

---

belief. If the pursuers had known the terms of the deed, and that it was irrevocable, they would not have signed it. They never intended to execute, and never gave any authority for the preparation of an irrevocable deed; they never intended to dispose of their property in the manner set forth in said deed; they never proposed to entrust the upbringing of their grandchildren to Mrs Stafford, but, on the contrary, would have been strongly opposed to any such course; and they never desired to secure her assistance in the management of the hotel during their lives, as is falsely stated in the narrative of said deed, the business having been always conducted to their satisfaction by Mrs Ronald M'Laurin jun." (Cond. 16) "The said deed was subscribed by or for the pursuers without any consideration being granted therefor, and under essential error as to its tenor, meaning, and effect, as above set forth. The pursuers signed the said deed under essential error as aforesaid, induced by the said Dr and Mrs Stafford and Mr Lawrence, or one or other of them. They knew that the pursuers, when they subscribed the said deed, or caused it to be subscribed, did not know its tenor, meaning, or effect, and that they never authorised its delivery." (Cond. 17) "The said deed was impetrated from the pursuers by fraudulent concealment practised by the said Dr and Mrs Stafford and Mr Lawrence, or one or other of them, they well knowing that the pursuers were not aware of the tenor, meaning, and effect of the said deed, and that they would not have signed the said deed if they had been aware of its tenor, meaning, and effect. The said deed was impetrated from the pursuers by false and fraudulent representations as to the tenor, meaning, and effect of the said deed, made to them by the said Dr and Mrs Stafford and Mr Lawrence, or one or other of them, as above set forth; or otherwise Mr Lawrence, in consequence of misunderstanding Mrs M'Laurin's said instructions, or being misled by communications to him on the subject from the defenders, made under the profession that they were authorised by Mrs M'Laurin, prepared the said deed in the terms in which it was afterwards executed, under the error in fact that it was in accordance with Mrs M'Laurin's instructions, and that it gave effect to the pursuers' wishes in regard to the disposal of the estate therein mentioned, and thereafter Mr Lawrence induced the pursuers to sign the said deed under the same error in fact on his part." (Cond. 18) "After the said deed was signed by the pursuers it was taken away by Mr Lawrence, and, without any authority from the pursuers, it was put by him on the Register of Sasines on behalf of Mrs Stafford. Upon this recently coming to the knowledge of the pursuers, they became apprehensive that the deed which they had signed was of a different nature from what they had understood it to be. They thereupon took legal advice on the matter, and became aware for the first time that they had granted a de præsenti deed of gift in favour of Mrs Stafford. As she has refused to allow the deed to be cancelled, and insists upon her rights as proprietrix of the subjects therein conveyed, the present action has become necessary."

The defenders denied the whole material averments of the pursuers, and the following issues were, after discussion, approved of by the Lord Ordinary for the trial of the cause:—"Whether the pursuers, in granting the disposition dated on or about the 12th day of November 1874, of which No. 7 of process is an extract, were under essential error as to the tenor and effect of the said deed? Whether the pursuers were induced to grant the said deed by fraudulent concealment practised by the said Doctor and Mrs Stafford, and Robert Lawrence, or one or other of them; or false or fraudulent representations made by them, or one or other of them, as to the tenor and effect of the said deed?"

The defenders reclaimed, and after hearing before the First Division,

No. 48.
Dec. 17, 1875.
M'Laur.n v. Stafford.

the Lord President intimated that the Judges were divided in opinion whether the words "induced by the defenders" should be inserted in the first issue, as contended for by the defenders, or not. In these circumstances the case was ordered to be argued on this point before seven Judges.

The case was heard before the First Division, along with the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Ormidale, and Lord Gifford.

Argued for the defenders;—It was necessary for the pursuers not only to prove error, but that the error was "induced by the defenders." A mere mistake on the part of a person sciens et prudens would not warrant reduction. The kind of error was also generally inserted in the issue. It was different where the error was such as the party could not guard against; in that case a general issue was allowable. In the present case, if the pursuers did not know the contents of the deed they signed it was their own fault. Their own error was no reason for setting aside their deed of gift.[1]

The pursuers argued;—This was a case of pure essential error. In such a case, the deed being gratuitous, there was a case of error apart from inducement or concealment. If an agent made a mistake as to the meaning of his clients, that error would entitle them to have reduction. On the matter of "error," with the exception of the rule as to onus, English law was the same as our law. When the deed depended upon no antecedent obligation, but was merely derived from the granter's wish, and the granter shewed that he never intended to grant the deed, it might be voided.[2]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are of opinion in this case that the first issue proposed by the pursuers should be approved of without the variation proposed by the defenders.

The other Judges concurred.

THE First Division pronounced an interlocutor approving of the following issues:—"Whether the pursuers, in granting the disposition dated on or about the 12th day of November 1874, of which No. 7 of process is an extract, were under essential error as to the substance and effect of the said deed? Whether the pursuers were induced to grant the said deed by fraudulent representation or fraudulent concealment practised by the defenders and Robert Lawrence, solicitor in Oban, or one or other of them?"

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—THOMAS WHITE, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] Maclagan v. Dixon, Dec. 4, 1832, 11 S. 165, 5 Scot. Jur. 140; Conston v. Miller, Feb. 26, 1862, 24 D. 607, 34 Scot. Jur. 302; Alexander v. Alexander, Jan. 12, 1866, 4 Macph. 291; Ritchie v. Ritchie's Trustees, Jan. 13, 1866, 4 Macph. 292; Purdon v. Rowatt's Trustees, Dec. 19, 1856, 19 D. 206, 29 Scot. Jur. 99; Munro v. Strain, Feb. 14, 1874, ante, i., 522; Hogg v. Campbell, March 12, 1864, 2 Macph. 848, 36 Scot. Jur. 428; Harris v. Robertson, Feb. 16, 1864, 2 Macph. 664, 36 Scot. Jur. 333; Lord Wemyss v. Campbell, June 6, 1858, 20 D. 1090, 30 Scot. Jur. 537; Waddell v. Waddell, March 17, 1863, 1 Macph. 635, 35 Scot. Jur. 337.

[2] Dickson v. Halbert, Feb. 17, 1854, 16 D. 586, 26 Scot. Jur. 266; M'Conechy v. M'Indoe, Dec. 23, 1853, 16 D. 315, 26 Scot. Jur. 145; Johnston v. Johnston, March 11, 1857, 19 D. 706, 29 Scot. Jur. 320, H. L., Feb. 10, 1860, 3 Macqueen, 619, 32 Scot. Jur. 286; Wilson v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 6, 1860, 22 D. 1408, 32 Scot. Jur. 639; Adamson v. Glasgow Water-Works Commissioners, June 23, 1859, 21 D. 1012, 31 Scot. Jur. 558; Murray v. Murray, Feb. 12, 1839, 1 D. 484, 11 Scot. Jur. 328; Gibson v. Jeyes, July 9, 1801, 6 Vesey, 276; Cooke v. Lamotte, Nov. 21, 1851, 15 Beavan, 234.

JOHN SAWYER AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Gloag.
ALEXANDER SLOAN, Respondent.—M'Laren.

No. 49.

Dec. 17, 1875.

Sawyer, &c. v. Sloan.

Curator Bonis—Foreign Lunatic—Recall of Appointment.—A curator bonis was appointed to a lunatic domiciled in England in order to grant discharges of her aliment to a judicial factor on a Scotch estate. Thereafter the brother of the lunatic obtained a commission of lunacy in the Court of Chancery in England, under which committees of the person and estate were appointed to the lunatic. Upon the application of the committees of the person and estate the Court recognised their title and recalled the curator's appointment.

1st DIVISION. B.

ON 10th January 1871 Alexander Sloan, C.A., Glasgow, was appointed by the Court curator bonis on the estate of Miss Caroline Rae, who was a lunatic and resident in England. The petition under which Mr Sloan was appointed was presented by Miss Rae's eldest brother, since deceased, and one of her sisters. The ground of the appointment was, inter alia, that the sole means of maintenance of the lunatic was a sum, limited to £150 a-year, which had been bequeathed to her in liferent out of the residue of a mixed heritable and moveable estate in Scotland under the management of a judicial factor who had come in place of trustees, and that this judicial factor declined to pay over her share of the liferent of the estate on the ground that she was insane and could not grant a discharge. This petition had also contained a prayer for the appointment of a curator bonis to Miss Caroline Rae's sister, Miss Harriet Rae, who was also insane, and had also a right to a share of the liferent of the same estate, but that part of the prayer had been refused, because the Court of Chancery had already appointed a sister-in-law, Mrs Julia Rae, wife of the Misses Rae's brother, Alfred Rae, committee of the person to Miss Harriet Rae, and John Sawyer, public accountant, London, committee of her estate.

On 11th December 1871 Alfred Rae applied in the Court of Chancery for the appointment of committees of the person and estate of Miss Caroline Rae, as a person of unsound mind, and on 22d December Mrs Julia Rae, Alfred Rae's wife, was appointed committee of the person, and John Sawyer committee of the estate. Mr Sawyer called upon Mr Sloan, the curator bonis, to pay over the income of Miss Caroline Rae's share of the trust-estate to him as committee of her estate, but this Mr Sloan refused to do. Mr Sawyer then, with consent of Mrs Julia Rae, the committee of the person of Miss Caroline Rae, presented this petition to the First Division of the Court of Session on 19th November 1875, praying for the recall of Mr Sloan's appointment as curator bonis as being now superfluous and unnecessary. In addition to the facts above set forth the petition contained statements that Miss Caroline Rae was of English parentage and a domiciled Englishwoman, and had always resided in England, and that according to the law of England the committees of her person and estate entirely represented her.

Mr Sloan, the curator bonis, lodged answers to the petition, in which he admitted that the lunatic was domiciled in England, but pleaded that his appointment being prior in date to that of the petitioners in the Court of Chancery, and having been made by a Court having jurisdiction to appoint an administrator of Miss Rae's estate in Scotland, was not liable to be recalled on such grounds as were set forth in the petition; and prayed that, as the estate could be most economically managed by a continuance of the present arrangement, the prayer of the petition be refused.

Argued for the petitioners;—The curator bonis had only been appointed as a person who could give a valid discharge to the judicial factor for the

No. 49.
Dec. 17, 1875.
Sawyer, &c. v. Sloan.

lunatic's liferent income. The committees of the person and estate were now in a position to grant such discharges, and the existence of the curatory was no longer necessary. Scotch and English Courts mutually regarded Scotch and English guardianships,[1] and this English guardianship, being of a fuller and more complete description than the Scotch curatory, should be respected by the Scotch Court. The curator bonis had no power over the lunatic's person, whereas the committee of the person had.[2]

Argued for the curator bonis;—The curator bonis having been first appointed, and by a competent Court, and there being no averments of bad management on his part, the original appointment should stand. The only question was as to who was to administer the estate. There was nothing about personal guardianship raised in the case, so the domicile of the lunatic was of no importance. Domicile might rule in questions of succession, but the question of administration should be settled by the situation of the property.[3]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The appointment of curator bonis, which under this petition is sought to be recalled, was made on 10th January 1871, on a petition at the instance of relations, and it prayed for the appointment of a curator bonis, not only on the estate of Caroline but also on that of Harriet Rae, their only means being a trust-estate situated and administered in Scotland. The Court in disposing of that petition made a distinction between the cases of the two sisters. They appointed Mr Sloan as curator bonis to Caroline Rae, but refused to make any such appointment in the case of Harriet, the reason being that Harriet had already a guardian appointed by the Court of Chancery. It seems to me that that distinction was a proper one, and that the Court did right both in the appointment which they made and in that which they refused to make. As regards Caroline, she had not been cognosced in this country, nor made a ward of Chancery in England, and there was no one therefore to manage her affairs, so that a curator bonis in her case was obviously necessary. Harriet, on the other hand, had a guardian appointed by the Court of Chancery, and with a title perfectly sufficient to entitle him to take charge of her affairs. I do not think the principle of international law admits of any doubt. It is quite unnecessary that a fresh guardian should be appointed to manage personal estate, even when situated in another country. The case of heritage of course is different. Now, since Mr Sloan was appointed, Caroline Rae has come to be in the same position as her sister; she is now a ward of Chancery, and has had a personal guardian appointed to her, and in these circumstances I think the prayer of the petition must be granted. I cannot imagine any necessity for keeping up a double machinery for managing this estate. Mr Sawyer has a perfectly good

[1] Scott v. Bentley, Feb. 20, 1855, 1 Kay and Johnson, 281; Bayne v. Sutherland, June 21, 1749, M. 4595, H. L. Feb. 13, 1750, 1 Pat. App. 454; Nasmith v. Nasmith, Nov. 12, 1624, M. 4046; Rose v. Grant, June 9, 1835, 7 Scot. Jur. 403; Accountant of Court v. Geddes, June 29, 1858, 20 D. 1174; Laing v. Robertson, June 21, 1859, 31 Scot. Jur. 554; Murray v. Baillie, Feb. 24, 1849, 11 D. 710, 21 Scot. Jur. 239; Johnstone v. Beattie, Jan. 29, 1856, 18 D. 343, 28 Scot. Jur. 161.

[2] Bryce v. Grahame, Jan. 25, 1828, 6 S. 425.

[3] Preston v. Melville, March 29, 1841, 2 Rob. App. 88; Buchan v. Harvey, Dec. 21, 1839, 2 D. 275; Hay, Petitioner, July 16, 1861, 23 D. 1291, 33 Scot. Jur. 648; Stuart v. Moore, Feb. 27, 1861, 23 D. 446, 33 Scot. Jur. 445.

title, and we are bound to recognise it in this country. I am therefore for granting the prayer of the petition. No. 49. Dec. 17, 1875. Sawyer, &c. v. Sloan.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the appointment of the said curator, and decern; and remit to the Junior Lord Ordinary to proceed farther in the matter of the petition: Find the curator entitled to his expenses in these proceedings out of the lunatic's estate: Remit to the Auditor," &c.

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—MACANDREW & WRIGHT, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM PITT DUNDAS (Registrar-General), Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Watson —J. P. B. Robertson. No. 50. Dec. 17, 1875. Dundas.

Process—17 and 18 Vict. cap. 80, sec. 55—Burnt Registers.—Procedure followed in restoring parish registers which had been destroyed.

1ST DIVISION. B.

THE manse of Glenrinnes, occupied by the Rev. Charles Bruce, the registrar of the parish, was burned down on 25th September 1875, and the whole of the registers, thirty-six in number, pertaining to births, deaths, and marriages, were destroyed, and also a register of corrected entries.

Duplicates of twenty-four registers and of the register of corrected entries were in the General Register House at Edinburgh, but the duplicates of the other twelve were in the custody of the registrar of the parish at the date of the fire, and were destroyed. The six registers pertaining to 1874 were awaiting collation by the examiner, and the six pertaining to 1875 were the current registers in the course of formation.

The Registrar-General for Scotland presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session under the 55th section of the Registration (Scotland) Act, 1854.*

The prayer of the petition was as follows:—"May it therefore please your Lordships to order this petition to be intimated on the walls and in the Minute-book, and thereafter, on being satisfied of the accuracy of the statements made in this petition in regard to the destruction of the said twenty-four registers, and the said register of corrected entries, to authorise new duplicates of them to be made at the sight of the petitioner, and to direct that each of the said new duplicate registers be authenticated by the signature of the petitioner; and to declare that when so authenticated they shall thereupon become, in all respects, of the same force and

* 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 80, sec. 55, enacts that "if any duplicate register in the custody of the registrar shall be lost, destroyed, or mutilated, or shall have become illegible in whole or in part, such fact shall be forthwith communicated by the registrar to the Registrar-General, who shall require the registrar immediately to transmit to him the duplicate register which shall have been mutilated or become illegible; and the Registrar-General shall thereupon present a petition to one of the Divisions of the Court of Session, setting forth the fact of the loss, destruction, mutilation, or total or partial illegibility, as the case may be, of such duplicate register, and the date of the discovery of such loss, destruction, mutilation, or total or partial illegibility of such duplicate; and the Court, on being satisfied regarding the same, and after such intimation as they may think proper, shall order such register to be corrected or completed, or a new duplicate to be made, at the sight of the Registrar-General, and such corrected or completed duplicate, or new duplicate, authenticated by the signature of the Registrar-General, shall thereupon become in all respects of the same force and validity as the original duplicate."

No. 50.
Dec. 17, 1875.
Dundas.

validity as the originals; and with regard to the remaining twelve registers, to remit to a proper and qualified person to make inquiry, and report as above set forth, and, if satisfied with such report, your Lordships to authorise new register books to be supplied by the petitioner to the said Charles Bruce, or the registrar for the time being, who shall engross therein, in the ordinary way, the particulars of all the entries referred to in such report; and to direct that each of the said new registers be thereafter authenticated by the signature of the petitioner; and to declare that, when so authenticated, they shall have the same force and validity as the originals."

Intimation was ordered on 19th October 1875, and on 30th October the portion of the prayer in favour of holding the twenty-four new registers of the same force as the original ones was granted. On 2d November the petitioner presented a minute setting forth, "that it is proposed that the party appointed by the Court to inquire what entries the above named registers contained should (1) ascertain the actual number of events that were recorded, by communicating in person with the registrar, session-clerk, medical practitioners, sexton, and such other parties as may be found likely to possess information; (2) extract from suitable informants and documents, and insert in appropriate schedules, if possible, all the particulars required to be registered; and (3) report the result, setting forth the sources of information in each case, and transmitting such schedules to the Court."

The Court granted commission to Mr G. S. Dundas, advocate, to take evidence, and report.

Mr Dundas reported on 4th December, and on that day the petitioner was ordered to prepare new registers in duplicate from the materials furnished by his report.

On 17th December the new registers were presented to the Court, and

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the petition and proceedings with the new registers prepared and presented to the Court in terms of the last interlocutor, declare that the said new registers, which are signed as relative to this interlocutor, shall have the same force and effect as the original registers for the period to which they relate, and decern."

J. AULDJO JAMIESON, W.S., Crown Agent.

No. 51.
Dec. 17, 1875.
Robertson v. Robertson.

JAMES STEWART ROBERTSON, First Party.—D.-F. Watson—Kinnear.
JAMES STEWART ROBERTSON Junior, Second Party.—Balfour—Asher.
JAMES STEWART ROBERTSON AND OTHERS (Hepburn's Trustees), Third Parties.—Mackay.

Trust—Entail—Institute.—A testator conveyed his whole property to trustees, directing them to continue the trust during the life of his widow, and for at least ten years after his own death, and "after the death of my said wife, and while the trust shall continue to subsist," to pay an annuity to "the heir who would then be entitled to succeed to my lands [of A] under the destination after contained." The trustees were directed to entail the lands of A, and the destination was to the heirs whomsoever of the testator's body, whom failing, to J. R. and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to other substitutes. The testator further directed that, considering that J. R. was heir of entail presumptive to the lands of C, now in possession of the testator's wife, and that it was his intention that the estate of A should be held by a series of heirs different from those entitled to the estate of C, his trustees should insert in the deed of entail of A a condition

No. 51.

Dec. 17, 1875.

Robertson v. Robertson.

to secure that, in the event of the succession to A opening to an heir who should be at the time proprietor of C, the right of such heir under the deed of entail to be executed should lapse as if he were naturally dead. J. R. succeeded to C by the death of the testator's wife, two years after the death of the testator. Held that he was thereby disqualified from claiming the annuity, and that it was payable to his eldest son as the heir entitled to succeed to A.

1ST DIVISION. B.

JOHN STEWART HEPBURN died in 1872, without issue, leaving the estate of Colquhalzie, and other landed property and personal property of considerable amount. The deceased left a trust-disposition and settlement dated in 1865, with codicils of various dates.

By the trust-disposition he conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees. After directions as to paying debts, &c., the sixth purpose of the trust directed that the "trustees shall make payment of the whole free income of the trust-estate to my said wife in the event of her surviving me, and that during all the days of her life;" and the seventh purpose, that the "trustees shall continue the trust hereby created during the life of my said wife, and for at least ten years after my death, although her death may occur within that time, and shall have power thereafter to continue the same for such longer period as in their own discretion they may deem expedient."

By the eighth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement the truster directed that, "after the death of my said wife, and while the said trust hereby created shall continue to subsist, my trustees shall apply the free rents of my lands of Colquhalzie, and, if necessary, a part of the annual produce of the other trust-estate, towards the education, maintenance, and upbringing of the heir who would then be entitled to succeed to my said lands under the destination after contained, if in minority; . . . and in the event of the heir who at the death of my said wife would be entitled to succeed to the said lands under the destination before referred to being major, or on the heir then in minority as aforesaid attaining majority, such heir, or any other heir who during the subsistence of the said trust shall for the time being be the heir entitled to succeed as aforesaid, and shall be of full age, shall be entitled to be paid by my trustees, while the said trust continues, at the rate of £200, or £250, or £300 per annum, according to their own discretion, and their judgment of his or her capacity for prudent management; . . . . and I also give power to my trustees, if satisfied of the prudence of such heir, to allow him or her the produce of the said lands of Colquhalzie, and the actual possession of the mansion-house," &c.

By the last purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement it was provided, inter alia, that "on the whole of the foregoing purposes of the trust being fulfilled, the whole debts due by me or by my trustees, and the legacies bequeathed by me and by my said wife, so far as payable from my estate as aforesaid, being paid, the trust having subsisted for not less than ten years after my death, the heir for the time being entitled to succeed to my lands under the said deed of entail being major, and my trustees seeing no necessity or expediency for longer continuing the trust, then my trustees shall, as soon as convenient, divest themselves thereof as follows, viz.:—(First), My trustees shall execute a deed of strict entail of the said lands of Colquhalzie" and others in favour of the heirs whomsoever of the testator's body, whom failing, to a series of heirs.

By codicil dated in 1868 the truster (who was then in his eighty-sixth year) recalled the prior destination, and directed his trustees "to execute the said deed of entail (when the time for doing so shall arrive) to and in favour of the following series of heirs, viz., to the heirs whomsoever of my body, whom failing, to James Stewart Robertson of Edradynate, my second paternal cousin, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of his body," whom failing, to the other heirs and substitutes therein specified.

No. 51.
Dec. 17, 1875.
Robertson v. Robertson.

The codicil also contained the following provision:—"Farther, considering that the said James Stewart Robertson is heir of entail presumptive to the lands of Cluny and others now in possession of Mrs Helen Stewart Hepburn, my wife, in virtue of a deed of entail executed by Adam Stewart of Cluny, her father, under which the heir of entail in possession thereof bears the name and title of Stewart of Cluny, and that it is my intention that the foresaid estate of Colquhalzie and others shall be held by a series of heirs different from those succeeding to the said estate of Cluny, and with the name and title of Stewart Hepburn of Colquhalzie, therefore I direct my trustees to insert in the said deed of entail to be executed by them a condition in such terms as shall in their opinion effectually provide and secure that in the event of the succession to my said lands and others opening to an heir who shall be at the time proprietor or heir of entail in possession of the said lands of Cluny and others, or of the succession to the said lands of Cluny and others opening to an heir who shall at the time be proprietor or heir of entail in possession of my said lands and others in virtue of the said deed of entail to be executed by my trustees, the right of such heir under the said last mentioned deed of entail to succession to or possession of my said lands and others shall lapse or cease and determine to the same effect as if such heir were naturally dead, and that if such heir shall be in possession of my said lands and others he shall be bound forthwith to denude himself thereof in favour of the heir who in accordance with the destination before specified would be entitled to succeed thereto as if the heir so bound to denude were then dead."

Mrs Helen Stewart Hepburn died without issue on the 21st April 1874.

On her death James Stewart Robertson succeeded to the entailed estate of Cluny.

This case was presented by him (first party), his only son, James Stewart Robertson junior (second party), and Mr Hepburn's trustees (third parties).

On behalf of the said James Stewart Robertson it was maintained that he was the party in whose favour, as institute or disponee, should he survive, the trustees would be bound to execute the entail directed to be made, and that as such he was now, and during the subsistence of the trust, entitled to all the provisions and benefits conferred by the eighth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement of 16th August 1865, on the person, being major, who would be entitled to succeed to or acquire the truster's lands in virtue of the deed of entail to be executed as aforesaid.

On the other hand, the said James Stewart Robertson junior maintained that on a proper construction of the settlements of the said John Stewart Hepburn, before narrated, the said James Stewart Robertson junior was the party in whose favour, should he survive, the trustees would be bound to execute the deed of entail and assignation and conveyance directed to be made, and that he was now, and during the subsistence of the trust, entitled, by the eighth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement of 16th August 1865 to all the benefits and provisions conferred upon the heir entitled to succeed to or acquire the truster's estates in virtue of the deed of entail to be executed as aforesaid.

The following questions of law were therefore submitted to the Court:—"(1) Whether the said James Stewart Robertson is, during the subsistence of the trust and his survivance, entitled to the provisions and benefits conferred by the eighth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement of 16th August 1865? (2) Or whether the said James Stewart Robertson junior is at present entitled to the provisions and benefits conferred by the eighth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicil?"

No. 51.

Dec. 17, 1875. Robertson v. Robertson.

Argued for first party;—From the advanced age of the truster at the time of making the trust-disposition the words "to the heirs whomsoever of my body" must be taken as merely formal. James Stewart Robertson, the first party, was evidently the persona prædilecta and nominatim institute in the deed of entail to be executed; and the clause of exclusion or devolution which was applied to "heirs" did not apply to him. If it did he must be excluded in any event, for he could never take Colquhalzie while Mrs Hepburn was alive, and the moment she died he necessarily succeeded to Cluny. This was not a reasonable construction when the evident intention was to favour the said James Stewart Robertson.[1] Further, the question whether the first party could take or hold Colquhalzie could not arise till 1882, and no disqualification could operate against him till that date. He being therefore the person who was called first under the destination, was entitled till then to reap the intermediate benefits conferred by the eighth purpose of the trust.

Argued for the second party;—The leading purpose of the trust was to prevent the lands of Colquhalzie and Cluny being held by the same person. It was not correct to describe James Stewart Robertson as the institute, for the words "heirs whomsoever of my body" cannot be taken as meaning nothing. The term "heirs" here included the institute, being in a trust-deed and not in a deed of entail. From other portions of the deed the truster obviously so used the term.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised by this special case is, whether MR James Stewart Robertson of Edradynate or his son is entitled to a certain provision contained in the 8th purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late John Stewart Hepburn of Colquhalzie. One object of that trust-deed was to provide for the execution by the trustees of a deed of entail of the lands of Colquhalzie and others in favour of a series of heirs originally contained in the deed of trust itself, but afterwards altered by a codicil. In the codicil, which, of course, is now the ruling deed in regard to the destination, the trustees are directed to make the entail in favour of "the heirs whomsoever of my body, whom failing, to James Stewart Robertson of Edradynate, my second paternal cousin, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing," to certain other heirs. The entailer inserted in the same codicil a clause which has given rise to the difficulty intended to be solved by the judgment in this special case. "Considering that the said James Stewart Robertson is heir of entail presumptive to the lands of Cluny and others, now in possession of Mrs Helen Stewart Hepburn, my wife, in virtue of a deed of entail executed by Adam Stewart of Cluny, her father, under which the heir of entail in possession thereof bears the name and title of Stewart of Cluny, and that it is my intention that the foresaid estate of Colquhalzie and others shall be held by a series of heirs different from those succeeding to the said estate of Cluny, and with the name and title of Stewart Hepburn of Colquhalzie, therefore I direct my trustees to insert in the said deed of [1] Hutchison v. Hutchison, Dec. 20, 1872, 11 Macph. 229, 45 Scot. Jur. 156.

No. 51.
Dec. 17, 1875.
Robertson v. Robertson.

entail to be executed by them a condition in such terms as shall in their opinion effectually provide and secure that, in the event of the succession to my said lands and others opening to an heir who shall be at the time proprietor or heir of entail in possession of the said lands of Cluny and others, or of the succession to the said lands of Cluny and others opening to an heir who shall at the time be proprietor or heir of entail in possession of my said lands and others, in virtue of the said deed of entail to be executed by my trustees, the right of such heir under the said last mentioned deed of entail to succession to or possession of my said lands and others shall lapse or cease and determine to the same effect as if such heir were naturally dead, and that if such heir shall be in possession of my said lands and others, he shall be bound forthwith to denude himself in favour of the heir who, in accordance with the destination before specified, would be entitled to succeed thereto, as if the heir so bound to denude were then dead."

Now, when the testator died, Mr Robertson of Edradynate was the heir first entitled to succeed, the testator having died without issue of his body. But when the widow, Mrs Helen Stewart Hepburn, died, Mr Stewart Robertson succeeded by that event to the estate of Cluny, and the consequence was, that under this clause he became disqualified from holding the estate of Colquhalzie. In consequence of the provision of the trust-deed, to which I am about to refer, he never was the heir in possession of the estate of Colquhalzie, and therefore he had no occasion to denude of that estate. His disqualification arose before he could take, in any view, the estate of Colquhalzie; and having become Stewart of Cluny, he thereby became absolutely disqualified from being Stewart Hepburn of Colquhalzie. The two characters are, by the will of this testator, absolutely incompatible. It is said, indeed, that Mr Stewart Robertson is not affected by this clause, because he is the institute of tailzie in the deed directed to be made,—the deed of entail of Colquhalzie, and the institute is not named in this clause of exclusion. Now, upon the construction of the clause itself, I should not have the least difficulty in holding that the institute is intended to be included. In the first place, this is not a question of the construction of a deed of entail, and therefore such authorities as the Duntreath case[1] and the long series of cases that followed upon it, have no application whatever. We are here upon the construction of a deed of trust directing trustees how they are to make an entail, and it is impossible to read this clause without seeing that it is the enixa voluntas testatoris that no man, be he who he may, shall combine in his own person the two irreconcileable characters of Stewart of Cluny and Hepburn of Colquhalzie. He will not have it at any time or under any circumstances; and giving effect to the intention of the testator, as we are quite entitled to do, dealing with a deed of trust like this, the result is not at all doubtful. But there is another reason why this argument cannot prevail, which I shall mention by-and-bye, when I come to the construction of the eighth purpose of the testator's trust, with which we are more immediately concerned. In the first place, it is necessary to look at the seventh purpose in order to make the eighth perfectly intelligible. The seventh is,—"That my trustees shall continue the trust hereby created during the life of my said wife, and for at least ten years after my death, although her death may occur within that time, and shall have power thereafter to continue the same for such longer period as, in their own discretion, they may deem expedient; and after the decease of my said wife they shall pay such legacies as she may bequeath by a writing under her hand, so far as the personal estate left by her may be insufficient for that purpose, but the payment thereof from my estate not to exceed in all £1000." And the eighth is,—"After the death of my said wife, and while the said trust hereby created shall continue to subsist, my trustees shall apply the free rents of my lands of Colquhalzie, and, if necessary, a part of the annual produce of the other trust-estate, towards the education, maintenance, and upbringing of the heir who would then be entitled to succeed to my said lands under the destination after contained, if in minority, it being my wish that the education of such heir shall include a professional education if required," &c.; and farther on he proceeds, "And in the event of the heir who at the death of my said wife would be entitled to succeed to the said lands under the destination referred to being major, or on the heir then in minority as aforesaid attaining majority, such heir, or any other heir who during the subsistence of the said trust shall for the time being be the heir entitled to succeed as aforesaid, and shall be of full age, shall be entitled to be paid by my trustees, while the said trust continues, at the rate of £200, or £250, or £300 per annum, according to their own discretion and judgment of his or her capacity for prudent management;" and then there is an alternative in the event of the heir being married, which it is not necessary to refer to. Now, it is quite plain that the person who is intended to be favoured under this eighth purpose is the heir who would be entitled to succeed at a particular time in the history of the trust—the heir who would be entitled to succeed to the estate of Colquhalzie at a particular time there fixed. The first observation that occurs here is, that if Mr Stewart Robertson is institute in the sense of not being an heir within the meaning of this trust-deed, he can take nothing under this clause, for there is nobody favoured by this clause except heirs; and, therefore, that, I apprehend, independent of all other arguments, puts an end to his contention that he is institute of tailzie, for the moment that that is affirmed he is out of Court.

[1] Edmonstone v. Edmonstone, 1771, 2 Pat. 255.

But the next point for consideration is, what is the point of time in the mind of the testator at which we are to determine who is the heir who will then be entitled to succeed? Now, I do not think that is difficult to fix. It is at the death of the widow, while the trust still subsists. The death of the widow, standing the trust, is the punctum temporis inspiciendi. Now, what is to be ascertained then? The thing to be ascertained then is, who is the heir who would at that time be entitled to succeed under the destination after-mentioned; or, in other words, who is the heir who, "at the death of my said wife, would be entitled to succeed," for that is another form of expression contained in the clause; or again, another form of expression that is used, "who for the time being is the heir entitled to succeed as aforesaid." Now, I apprehend that under this trust-deed, with the codicil, an heir cannot be entitled to succeed, within the meaning of this clause, at the death of the widow and while the trust still exists, because, until the trust is brought to an end and the deed of entail executed, no heir can succeed—that is to say, he cannot take the estate. And, therefore, the meaning of the various expressions here used is plainly this: supposing that, at the death of the wife, the trust were to come to an end, in whose favour would the deed of entail fall to be executed in the first instance? In other words, who would be the disponee under the deed of entail supposing it to be executed at the date of the wife's death? Now, can it be maintained, under that clause of exclusion to which I have referred in the codicil that Mr

No. 51.
Dec. 17, 1875.
Robertson v. Robertson.

Stewart Robertson, the father, is in that position that he could require the trustees, if the trust were then at an end, to make the deed of entail in favour of him as disponee? Upon the death of the widow he has succeeded to the estate of Cluny, and by succeeding to the estate of Cluny he is debarred for ever from taking the estate of Colquhalzie; and the plain answer, therefore, is, that he can neither demand, nor can the trustees comply with the demand, that they should execute a deed of entail in his favour. If the deed of entail fell to be executed at that point of time—viz., at the death of the wife—it would plainly fall to be executed in favour of his son, as the next heir called to the succession under the destination, and not in favour of the father. I am, therefore, for answering the first question in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find and declare that the first party is not, in the circumstances stated in the case, entitled to the provisions and benefits conferred by the eighth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement of 16th August 1865, appended to the case: And find and declare that the second party is entitled to the provisions and benefits conferred by the eighth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement, and decern."

ADAM, KIRK, & ROBERTSON, W.S.—PEARSON, ROBERTSON, & FINLAY, W.S.—LINDSAY, HOWE, TYTLER, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 52.
Jan. 4, 1876.
Grant v. Grant's Trustees.

MRS EMILIA BAILLIE OR GRANT, First Party.—Mackintosh.
MISS MARIA GRANT AND OTHERS (Children of the Marriage between the late Patrick Grant and Mrs Emilia Baillie or Grant), Second Parties.—A. J. Young.
PATRICK GRANT AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Grant's Marriage-Contract Trustees), Third Parties.—Campbell Smith.

2D DIVISION. R.

Marriage-Contract—Trustees found bound to Denude in favour of the Primary Creditors upon Liferentrix renouncing her interest.—By antenuptial contract between Mr Patrick Grant, W.S., and his wife, the marriage-contract trustees were directed to pay to Mrs Grant, in the event of her surviving her husband, the yearly proceeds of certain funds, which, it was declared, "shall be paid to the child or children of the said intended marriage after the death of the said Emilia Baillie (Mrs Grant), in such proportions as the said Patrick Grant and Emilia Baillie may direct by any joint deed under their hand, and failing thereof the same shall be divided equally among the said children; declaring always that if any child or children of the said marriage shall die before the said sum provided to him, her, or them under these presents, or the exercise of the said power of division, shall be paid or become payable, leaving lawful issue of his, her, or their bodies, the said issue shall have right to the share of such deceasing child or children in the same manner as if such parent had received payment, or the same had become payable during the parent's lifetime."

Mr Grant predeceased his wife, leaving three children of the marriage. No deed of apportionment was executed. Mrs Grant and her children (who had all reached majority and were unmarried), being the whole parties in existence interested in the marriage-contract trust, were desirous of having the trust brought to an end, and offered to discharge the trustees for their respective interests. The trustees maintained that they were bound to keep up the trust until the arrival of the period fixed in the marriage-contract for the division of the fee of the estate. In a special case presented by the parties, held, in accordance with Pretty v. Newbigging, March 2, 1854, 16 D. 667 (26 Scot. Jur. 338), that the trustees were "bound now to denude of the trust, and pay over the proceeds of the trust-estate" to Mrs Grant and her children, "on receiving a full discharge from Mrs Grant and her family for their respective interests of the whole of their intromissions and actings in usual form."

No. 52.
Jan. 4, 1876.
Grant v. Grant's Trustees.

ADAM & SANG, W.S.—HORNE, HORNE, & LYELL, W.S.—Agents.

SMITH, LAING, AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—Balfour—Keir.
Rear-Admiral LEWIS MAITLAND AND ANOTHER, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—Rutherfurd.

No. 53.
Jan. 7, 1876.
Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c.

Superior and Vassal—Obligation—Relief—Public Burden—Landlord and Tenant.—A feu-charter dated in 1814 contained the following clause:—"During the existence of the present feu-right all public and parochial burdens or taxes imposed or to be imposed shall be paid by the superior and vassal as if the former was proprietor and landlord and as if the latter was tenant under him." Held, in an action by the vassal for relief of all poor-rates payable in respect of property, that the superior was only bound to relieve the vassal of poor-rates on the annual value of the feu-duty.

Observations (per Lord President and Lord Deas) as to the competency of looking behind a feu-charter at other and prior documents with a view to construing the charter.

Expenses—A. S. Dec. 19, 1835.—A Lord Ordinary ordered a minute to be lodged with regard to a branch of a case, and to a certain extent based his judgment upon matters contained in it. The Court adhered, but not upon the same grounds. The Auditor disallowed the expenses of the minute to the successful party. Held that he was entitled to his full expenses.

1st DIVISION. Lord Shand.

ON 5th May 1814 Charles Maitland of Rankeilour granted a feu-charter of certain subjects called Russell Mill and lands to George Moon, designed as "yarn-spinner at Russell Mill," to be held "of and under me, the said Charles Maitland, and my heirs and successors," for an annual payment of £36, 15s. in name of feu-farm duty. The charter, in addition to the usual feudal clauses, contained a provision giving the vassal full power to erect houses, mills, and machinery on the lands, and the precept of sasine was qualified with the following declarations:—"First, That the vassal for the time being shall keep the mill-dam and mill-lead always in good order, and buildings at all times on the lands hereby disponed of the value of £150 sterling; and in case of the irritancy of the present feu-right, in any manner whatever, the vassal shall put the whole houses, mills, and others, standing at the period of his removal, although exceeding in value the foresaid sum of £150 sterling, in a tenantable order and condition. Secondly, That if two full years' feu-duty shall remain unpaid after the term of payment thereof, then this present feu-right shall, in the option of the superior, cease and determine without any process of declarator for that effect, and it shall not be lawful to purge this irritancy at the bar. Thirdly, That during the existence of the present feu-right, all public and parochial burdens or taxes imposed or to be imposed shall be paid by the superior and vassal, as if the former was proprietor and landlord, and as if the latter was tenant under him. Fourth, That these declarations shall be inserted in the infeftment to follow hereon, as well as in every subsequent precept of sasine and infeftment that may be granted of and taken over the said mills, lands, and others, otherways such precept and infeftments, and deeds following thereon, shall be null, void, and of no effect."

Mr Moon was infeft on this feu-charter, and in 1864 disponed the sub-

No. 53.
Jan. 7, 1876.
Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c.

jects, along with two separate pendicles adjoining, to Messrs Smith, Laing, and Company, flax-spinners, who had since 1856 been in possession of the mill and lands, under agreement with him. The vassals under the feu-charter regularly paid the feu-duty of £36, 15s. up to 1871, when, having taken the view that the superior was bound, in virtue of the third declaration in the charter given above to relieve them of all poor-rates levied on the subjects in respect of property, they withheld payment of the feu-duty. The superior refused to recognise any obligation on him to relieve his vassals of proprietor's poor-rates, excepting upon £36, 15s.

In September 1874 the vassals raised an action in the Court of Session, concluding (1) for declarator that the superior was bound to relieve them of "all poor-rates imposed on or paid by the pursuers from and after 15th October 1856, or to be imposed on or to be payable by them in respect of the property of the subjects at Russell Mill belonging to and possessed by them." They also concluded for decree against the superior for payment of £143, 17s. 11d., being the amount they alleged they had paid in poor-rates in respect of property since 15th October 1856, subject, however, to deduction of the feu-duties which they had withheld.

The late James Maitland of Lindores was the then superior of the subjects, and lodged defences. He died while the action was still pending, and his heir, Rear-Admiral Lewis Maitland, and his executor and sole trustee, Mr D. M. Govan, were sisted as defenders in his place.

It was stated for the defenders, that although the annual value of the subjects at the date of the charter did not exceed £36, 15s., owing to the extensive works, &c., which had been since erected, the annual value had been increased to £480.

The Lord Ordinary, after having heard parties, appointed the defenders to lodge a minute, stating in detail the nature and value of the subjects at the date of the charter and at the present date, the pursuer to answer in eight days.

In the minute which the defenders lodged in compliance with this interlocutor they narrated the history of the feu-charter. It appeared that the authors of George Moon (the original vassal) were in possession of a tack of the subjects for 999 years from Martinmas 1803 at a rental of £36, 15s., and that of even date with the feu-charter in 1814 Moon executed a renunciation of this tack, and that the charter was granted without any payment or valuable consideration. The tack and renunciation were produced in process. The parties were at issue as to the exact annual value of the subjects, but the pursuers admitted that the value in 1873-4 was £480.

The Lord Ordinary, on 24th June, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds that the defenders are not liable to pay to the pursuers the sums sued for beyond the proportion thereof, of which payment has been offered, in terms of the answer to article sixth of the condescendence: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds them entitled to expenses, and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The pursuers are the proprietors of Russell Mill flax-mill, Cupar-Fife, and adjoining ground, in virtue of a feu-charter granted by the late Charles Maitland, younger of Rankeilour, in 1814, in favour of the late George Moon, and titles following, and they occupy the mill and property in carrying on their business. Having paid poor-rates since they acquired the property in 1856, both as proprietors and tenants and occupants, it seems to have lately occurred to them that they had a claim of relief against the superior for the proprietor's or owner's half of these rates. Accordingly, since Whitsunday 1871, they have withheld payment of their feu-duties, and by this action they seek to have the

No. 53.
Jan. 7, 1876.
Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The obligation undertaken was to relieve the vassal of all landlord's taxes in all time coming, and the superior found liable to relieve them of the half of the poor-rates leviable in respect of ownership since 1856, amounting, according to the state, No. 28 of process, to £143, 17s. 11d. The defender, the late James Maitland (now represented by his heir and executor, who have both sisted themselves as defenders) objected to the claim entirely for the period prior to March 1865, on the ground that Lady Maitland, who had a liferent of the superiority from 1840 till her death in 1865, drew the feu-duty annually from the pursuers, granting them receipts for the amount, and that the claim, if to be made, was a proper charge against Lady Maitland, and should have been deducted from the feu-duties paid to her. In regard to the period since March 1865, the defender offered to pay a proportion of the owner's or landlord's share of the rates effeiring to a rent of £36, 15s., being the amount of the feu-duty, and disputed his liability beyond this. The pursuers' claim is founded on a clause in the feu-charter of the property in the following terms:—'Thirdly, that during the existence of the present feu-right, all public and parochial burdens or taxes, imposed or to be imposed, shall be paid by the superior and vassal, as if the former was proprietor and landlord, and as if the latter was tenant under him.'

"This clause is expressed in unusual and peculiar terms. The vassals, as owners of the property, are of course assessed for all owner's taxes, and being occupants as well as owners, they are assessed for the full amount of all taxes, including those in respect of tenancy or occupancy to which the property is liable; but they claim relief under the clause now quoted of all owner's rates.

"In ascertaining the sound construction of the clause it is plainly competent, and it is desirable, to look at the circumstances in which the parties to the feu-contract were placed when it was entered into; for the language of the deed ought to receive the effect which the parties then intended it should receive, if in the light of the surrounding circumstances it fairly bears the meaning which will give it that effect.

"The history of the property, as appearing from the deeds produced, is this. It was let by the proprietor, Charles Maitland, Esq., younger of Rankeilour, in 1801, for 999 years from Martinmas 1803, at the rent of £36, 15s. The tenant's right belonged in 1814 to the late Mr Moon, who had purchased the tack and subjects in 1811, but without having completed his title. In 1814, the parties having the title to the lease, by renunciation dated 5th May of that year, on the narrative that 'the said George Moon has been in possession of the said mills and others since Martinmas 1811, and that it has been judged expedient to change the nature of the tenure by which the said possession is held from a tack to a feu-right, and which the proprietor has been so obliging to grant the said George Moon, therefore, to enable him to do so, and relieve the property of the said original tack,' the renunciation follows. The feu-right was granted on the same day. It thus appears that the feu-right of 1814 was merely a different form of title substituted for the previous 999 years' lease, which the proprietor agreed to grant as a favour to the tenant, without consideration or advantage. The feu-duty was the same as the old rent, viz., £36, 15s. Keeping this in view, there appears to me to be no doubt as to the true construction of the clause of relief as to public burdens. These burdens are to be divided, or, in other words, the vassal is to have relief, as if the superior 'was proprietor and landlord,' and as if the vassal 'was tenant under him,'—that is, so far as burdens are concerned, as if the relation which existed between the parties under the lease still continued, and the vassal were paying a rent of £36, 15s. in place of a feu-duty of that amount.

"Such clauses of relief are strictly construed. The pursuers must shew that the relief they ask is distinctly given by the language used. Even without the light furnished by the previous history of the property derived from the deeds produced, I do not think the clause would fairly bear the construction put on it by the pursuers, that the superior should relieve them of all owner's taxes. If that had been the agreement, it admitted of being expressed in very simple

No. 53.
Jan. 7, 1876.
Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c.

defenders were therefore bound to pay such taxes irrespective of the relation they might bear to the amount of the feu-duty. It could not be said that the parties to the charter had not contemplated the increase in value of the subjects, as it was expressly stated that the vassal might erect buildings and improve the subjects. Owing to the state of taxation at the time when this obligation was entered into it amounted to total relief except from one-half of the schoolmaster's salary.[1]

The Lord Ordinary had formed his judgment upon documents which he was not entitled to look at. The feu-charter was the only document which set forth the concluded contract between the parties, and it alone was to be construed.[2]

Argued for the defenders;—The true reading of this clause was, looking to the other provisions of the charter, many of which resembled those in a lease more than a feu-charter, and to the fact that at the date of the charter the parties occupied the position of landlord and tenant, that the superior was to pay landlord's taxes on £36, 15s. per annum. It was competent to read another deed not with a view to ascertaining the intention of the parties but so as to extract reliable information as to the knowledge of the parties which might assist to clear up an ambiguity.[3] The words used were not speculative, they had reference to a contract existing between the parties at the time. In all the cases cited for the pursuer the clause of relief was absolute, and had been fully intended. Here the intention had been only to divide the taxes upon £36, 15s. between the superior and vassal as if they had been landlord and tenant.

At advising,—

Lord President.—The pursuers of this action are the vassals in a feu-charter dated 5th May 1814, and they bring the action against their superior for the purpose of having it found and declared that the superior is bound to free and relieve them of all poor-rates imposed on or paid by them from and after 15th terms, without any reference to the relation of landlord and tenant. The superior is to relieve the vassal as if he were landlord and the vassal tenant. The relation of landlord and tenant necessarily implies a fixed rent, and the feu-duty supplies the measure of the rent. The clause must, I think, be read as if the words followed at its close 'at the rent herein stipulated as feu-duty;' for the feu-duty is as it were the rent which the parties had in view. The matter is, however, in my opinion made clear when regard is had to the circumstances in which the feu-right was granted, and which quite explain, not only why so peculiar an obligation was undertaken, but give material aid, if that be needed, in the construction of the clause.

---

"I am farther of opinion that as the pursuers recognised Lady Maitland's rights to the liferent income from the superiority, they were bound to retain the poor-rates in making their payment to her, if they intended to enforce such a claim. The right of liferent only gave a claim to the free income or feu-duties, and the pursuers were not entitled to pay more than they owed, and come upon the superior with a claim for sums which were proper deductions to be made annually from the feu-duty."

[1] Hunter v. Chalmers, July 16, 1858, 20 D. 1311, 30 Scot. Jur. 767; Lees v. Mackinlay, Nov. 11, 1857, 20 D. 6, 30 Scot. Jur. 10; Paterson's Trustees v. Hunter, Dec. 10, 1863, 2 Macph. 234, 36 Scot. Jur. 115; Nisbet v. Lees, June 15, 1869, 7 Macph. 881, 41 Scot. Jur. 502; Preston v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Feb. 4, 1870, 8 Macph. 502, 42 Scot Jur. 232; Traquair's Trustees v. Heritors of Innerleithen, Dec. 13, 1870, 9 Macph. 234, 43 Scot. Jur. 121.

[2] Stewart's Trustees v. Hart, Dec. 2, 1875, supra, p. 192.

[3] Forlong v. Hossack, April 3, 1838, 3 Sh. and M'L. App. 177; Davidson v. Magistrates of Anstruther-Easter, Jan. 28, 1845, 7 D. 342.

No. 53.

Jan. 7, 1876.
Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c.

October 1856, or to be imposed in respect of the property of certain subjects at Russell Mill, possessed by them under the feu-charter.

The feu-charter is in many respects quite in common form. It feus out to the original grantee subjects called corn, barley, and lint mills, converted into a flax spinning mill, with the ground adjoining, consisting of about two acres, and the haugh, all as sometime possessed by George Moon, with the water power from the river Eden, and with full power and privilege to the grantee to erect houses, mills, and every other kind of buildings on the ground and river feued.

The subjects are to be holden "of and under me, the said Charles Maitland, and my heirs and successors whomsoever, in feu-farm, fee, and heritage for ever," and the reddendo is the sum of £36, 15s. in name of feu-farm duty. So far there is nothing remarkable in the feu-charter, and nothing bearing on the question to be decided in this action. The only part of importance is the power which is given to erect houses and every kind of buildings on the ground, which is certainly a very superfluous clause in such a charter as we are considering, as the grantee has undoubtedly the right. The peculiar part is in the later portion of the deed. After the usual feudal clauses comes a proviso that sasine is only to be given under three particular declarations, which are to be inserted in the infeftment and in every subsequent precept of sasine, and to be a real burden on the right of property. These declarations are certainly very unusual and remarkable. The first is, "that the vassal for the time being shall keep the mill-dam and mill lead always in good order, and buildings at all times on the lands hereby disponed of the value of £150 sterling, and in case of the irritancy of the present feu-right, in any manner whatever, the vassal shall put the whole houses, mills, and others, standing at the period of his removal, although exceeding in value the foresaid sum of £150 sterling, in a tenantable order and condition." This certainly is a very peculiar provision. As far as the first part is concerned it is usual, but when it is contemplated that the right may come to an end, and if the vassal be removed from the subjects he shall be bound to put them into a tenantable condition, one cannot help thinking that we are reading a lease; and when we look at the second declaration, which is "that if two full years' feu-duty shall remain unpaid after the term of payment thereof, then this present feu-right shall, in the option of the superior, cease and determine without any process of declarator for that effect, and it shall not be lawful to purge this irritancy at the bar," we seem to be dealing again with the terms of a lease. The third declaration, which provides "that during the existence of the present feu-right, all public and parochial burdens or taxes, imposed or to be imposed, shall be paid by the superior and vassal, as if the former was proprietor and landlord, and as if the latter was tenant under him," still more and more assimilates the charter to a lease, and the relations of parties to those of landlord and tenant.

It is with the third declaration that we have particularly to deal, but all of them must be taken together, because it is contended that this charter is to be read as a lease in so far as consistent with its being a feu. The right is intended to be permanent unless it be destroyed by an irritancy. As regards parochial burdens or taxes, the superior is to be considered as the landlord, and the vassal as the tenant—or otherwise, he is to pay tenant's taxes; but when these taxes come to be imposed, especially in the case of poor-rates, they are imposed, not on the annual value of the subjects to the superior, but on the annual value as

No. 53.

Jan. 7, 1876.
Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c.

they would let from year to year as possessed by the tenant. The pursuers—the tenants—maintain that the superior is bound to pay one half of these rates, but the defenders say the feu-charter is to be dealt with as if it were a lease in the matter of division of taxation, and the rent under that lease is £36, 15s., being the annual prestation from the tenant to the landlord. If it is to be treated as a lease with a rent stipulated to be paid, then the defender will be bound to relieve the vassal in so far as the tax on £36, 15s. will go, i.e., he will just have to pay what he would have to pay if he were landlord under a lease with that as the rent. We have to decide between these two contentions.

The Lord Ordinary has found for the defender. I agree with the Lord Ordinary, but I do so on a construction of the feu-charter and without considering any of the other documents, of the competency of looking at which I have great doubts. We are told that there existed a lease of these subjects: that may be so, but the parties have departed from it. They agreed to put an end to it, and it no longer regulates their liabilities inter se.

The clauses in the feu-charter come to this, that, so far as consistent with the right being one in perpetuity, the superior and vassal are to stand in the same relation as if they were landlord and tenant in a lease in which the rent stipulated was £36, 15s. I think, therefore, that we should adhere.

Lord Deas.—As your Lordship has said, this is a very peculiar deed. I agree with your Lordship that some of the clauses which have been referred to are much more like clauses in a lease than in a feu-charter, and that these cannot be disregarded in its construction. In particular, I agree that in construing the third declaration as to the extent of public and parochial burdens and taxation which the vassal was to be relieved of we must calculate these as if the parties were under a lease with a rent of £36, 15s. That appears to me to be the fair and legal construction of the deed, and in coming to that conclusion I do not think we are at all interfering with what is laid down in the cases cited to us, including Lees v. Mackinlay in 1857, and the various cases that followed on that decision. I have read all these cases in considering what should be our judgment here, and I am of opinion that the fair and legal construction of this deed is what I have stated. I come to this conclusion upon the terms of the feu-charter itself, and not on the grounds assigned by the Lord Ordinary. Some of his views are, to say the least of them, doubtful in point of law, and, even if they were otherwise, they are not necessary to my view of the case.

Lord Ardmillan.—I concur in the result of the judgment of absolvitor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, and I also agree in your Lordship's remarks.

I cannot rest my opinion on the terms of the previous lease, or on the renunciation, or on any of the documents referred to, apart from the feu-charter of 1814. The rule of law has long been authoritatively settled, that such writings, whether before or after the date of the charter, cannot be used for construction of the terms of the charter, which must speak for itself.

I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on another question in regard to the competency of ascertaining, as matter of fact, the relations of the parties to each other, and the condition of the parties relative to the subjects conveyed by the feu-charter.

It is enough for the decision of this case, to consider carefully the terms of the

No. 53.

Jan. 7, 1876.
Smith, Laing, and Co. v. Maitland, &c.

charter itself, wherein I think we can find all that is required as materials for judgment.

The structure and terms of the charter are very peculiar. Even apart from the particular clause which your Lordship has read, this deed has a dubious or mongrel aspect, combining strangely the language of a feu-right with the language of a lease. I need not again allude particularly to the stipulations in regard to buildings at removal, and to the numerous expressions and the numerous provisions and stipulations in the feu-charter, which are more appropriate and suitable to a lease than to a feu-right. Your Lordship and Lord Deas have already mentioned them.

But then, within this deed, which has already disclosed so many of the usual relations and usual stipulations of a lease, we find, on reading further, this express and very remarkable declaration,—"Thirdly, That during the existence of the present feu-right, all public and parochial burdens or taxes imposed or to be imposed shall be paid by the superior and vassal, as if the former was proprietor and landlord, and as if the latter was tenant under him." On no fair construction of this singular clause can I come to any other conclusion than that expressed by your Lordship, that, as regards public and parochial burdens or taxes, the parties have agreed that their rights and obligations shall be on the footing that the superior is dealt with as landlord, and the vassal dealt with as tenant under him, and of course that the writing which constitutes the relation between landlord and tenant, and which is called a feu-charter, is truly, quoad this question of the taxes, and liability for burdens, public and parochial, a species of lease. If the feu-duty of £36, 15s., payable at Whitsunday and Martinmas, is viewed as a rent, that will be in accordance with the obvious intention of the parties, gathering the intention entirely from the deed.

The superior is to relieve the vassal, as if he himself were landlord and the vassal were tenant. The relation of landlord and tenant requires and implies a rent, and here the £36, 15s. payable by the vassal as if he were tenant to the superior as if he were landlord is truly, in the meaning of the charter, and according to the intention of the parties, just a rent. I have no doubt that it was meant to be so, and I think we must hold it to be so. I think that the defenders' proposal to pay rates effeiring to a rent of £36, 15s. is a fair and equitable offer, and that the pursuers are not entitled to further relief.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

When the defenders' account of expenses came before the Auditor for taxation he disallowed all the expense incurred in connection with the above mentioned minute.[1] The defenders objected to this ruling, and on 17th February the Court sustained the objection, and allowed them the expense of the minute, on the ground that the Lord Ordinary was entitled to order the minute and answers, and had evidently taken it into consideration in forming his judgment. Moreover, the defenders had not failed in any point or branch of their case as stated on record.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—LEBURN, HENDERSON, & WILSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

[1] A. S. Dec. 19, 1835, "General Rules in regard to the taxation of accounts."

No. 54.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Roxburgh and Co. v. Barlas.

1st Division. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

ROXBURGH AND COMPANY, Appellants.—Scott—M'Laren.
DAVID BARLAS (Young and Armstrong's Trustee), Respondents.—Balfour.

Process—Printing—Expenses.—In the sequestration of Young and Armstrong, spirit-merchants, Glasgow, a claim by Roxburgh and Company, creditors, having been rejected by the trustee, Mr Barlas, they appealed to the Sheriff, and afterwards from the Sheriff to the Court of Session.

When the case was called the print of the appeal, and especially the titles of the pleadings in the Sheriff Court, as printed, were found to be so imperfect that it did not appear from the print who the respondent was.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the note of appeal, appoint the appellants to amend the print by adding in manuscript on the margin the titles of the pleadings in the Sheriff Court, and for that purpose continue the cause till this day week: Find the appellants liable in the expenses of this day, which modify to £2, 2s. sterling, and for which sum decern against the appellants for payment to the respondent."

MORISON & KEITH, S.S.C.—FRASERS, STODART, & MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

JOHN WILSON AND JAMES WILSON, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Lee—Harper.
JAMES WADDELL, Defender.—Balfour—Alison.

Minerals—Property—Water—Mining Operations.—In an action brought by the tenants of a coal mine against the tenant of an adjoining mine belonging to the same proprietor for damage caused by water flowing into the pursuers' mine from the defender's workings, it was proved that the water consisted—(1) of the natural drainage of the defender's mine; and (2) of water collected on and diverted from the surface in consequence of the dislocation of drains and the subsidence of portions of the surface through the defender's mining operations. It was also proved that the pursuers had, with the landlord's permission, worked into and removed a natural barrier of coal between the mines, which would have prevented the flow of water complained of. Held that the pursuers had been in fault in destroying the barrier between the mines, and therefore that they were not entitled to recover damages from the defender.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Ormidale, and Lord Gifford), that the pursuers would not have been entitled to object to the flow of water from the defender's mine in so far as it consisted of the natural drainage of the mine when properly worked.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Ormidale), that the pursuers, if they had not been in fault, would have been entitled to damages for the injury caused by the surface water diverted from its former course by the defender's operations.

Opinion (per Lord Gifford) contra, on the ground that the defender's operations were in themselves proper, and that he was not bound to carry off the rainfall.

2d Division. Ld. Curriehill. I.

JOHN AND JAMES WILSON were tenants of a colliery at Overton, on the estate of Coltness, belonging to Mr Houldsworth, under a lease for nineteen years from Martinmas 1855. James Waddell was tenant of the adjoining colliery on the same estate for nineteen years from Martinmas 1866.

The coalfields worked by the pursuers and the defender were separated by the line of the Caledonian Railway which ran east and west. The defender's field was situated on the north side of the line and to the rise of the coal. That of the pursuer lay to the south of the line and to the dip of the coal.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

The defender was prohibited by his lease from working the coal within five yards of the boundaries of the subjects let, and therefore within five yards of the ground belonging to the railway, which was about thirty yards broad.

The pursuers, on the other hand, were bound by their lease "not to work, without first obtaining the sanction of the proprietor, any of the coal within five yards of the boundaries of the subjects let to them, or of the Caledonian Railway."

In August 1870 the pursuers obtained the sanction of Mr Houldsworth to their working as much of the coal under the railway as was practicable, he having a reserved right to the coal and other minerals under the land belonging to the railway.

The pursuers and defender both worked the seam of coal called the "Ell" seam, which was nearest the surface, and also the "Main" seam, which was immediately below. The out-crop of the Ell seam occurred within the defender's workings. At the out-crop the Ell coal came very close to the surface of the ground. At the defender's No. 2 pit the seam was reached at a depth of 16 fathoms, and at his No. 1 pit, which was near the railway, at a depth of 46 fathoms. At the pursuers' pit the seam was not reached till a depth of 84 fathoms.

The defender was bound by the terms of his lease to work out the Ell seam to the out-crop.

The defender had worked the Ell seam by forming a large "dook" or waste adjoining the railway, whence he worked out the coal to the out-crop, removing the pillars and exhausting the coal as far as possible. On coming to the out-crop his workings caused great damage to the surface, which became much broken up into "sits" and holes. By arrangement with Mr Houldsworth these "sits" and holes were not filled up and the surface restored, as is usual in such cases, Mr Houldsworth and his mining engineer having come to the conclusion, from previous experience, that it was better for the estate, looking to the quality of the land, to plant it than to attempt to restore the surface for agricultural purposes.

The consequence of the defender's method of working out the Ell seam was, as alleged by the pursuers, that a great quantity of surface water entered the mine by the "sits" or openings in the surface, and, running down to the defender's waste at the railway, lodged there and worked its way through the barrier between the two coal-fields, and so passed into their workings, causing them great damage and inconvenience. Their averment was,—(Cond. 3) "The defender's operations in working out his said coals have caused the ground above the same to subside over an area of about five acres, and the said subsided ground forms a basin into which surface water from an area of about twenty acres falls; and the said water having no other escape, owing to the failure of the defender to make provision for its passing on, passes down through the said ground, by means of breaks, holes, or sits in the same, caused by its having subsided as aforesaid into the coal-workings or wastes of the defender, in which it collects, and thence through the barrier or wall foresaid into the foresaid mines or coal-workings of the pursuers. The said surface water consists to a large extent of water which, but for the said breaks, holes, or sits, would not come upon the said five acres. The defender has no right of servitude or otherwise in respect of which he is entitled to pass on the water as foresaid into the workings of the pursuers, and he is bound to provide for its passing over the surface of the said five acres, by making surface repairs, constructing surface drains, or other means,

No. 55.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

and providing pillars or other supports of the said surface in his mines. Further, the defender is bound, under the terms of his tenancy, to work out his coals as near the out-crop as can be done consistently with keeping up the surface, to work his pumps and bring them on air daily, so as to prevent as much as possible water coming through into the pursuers' workings, and to form and leave sufficient pillars under all water on the surface; and he has failed to implement his said obligations, and in consequence of his said failure the water foresaid comes into the said workings of the pursuers."

The pursuers accordingly raised this action against the defender concluding for £2000 in name of damages, and for decree ordaining the defender to repair and drain the surface of the ground under which he carried on his coal workings, in such a way "that surface water shall be carried off the said ground, and be thereby prevented passing through the same into the defender's workings foresaid or wastes therein, and thence into the pursuers' mines or coal-workings after-mentioned, and also so to carry on his said coal-workings that the ground foresaid, or any ditches or drains therein, shall not be so damaged, injured, or affected, as to permit surface water to pass down into the defender's said coal-workings or wastes foresaid, and thence into the pursuers' said mines or coal-workings; otherwise, in the event of said water passing through into the defender's said workings or wastes, he should be decerned and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, either to remove the same from his said workings or wastes, by pumping out or otherwise, or to prevent its passing thence into the mines or coal-workings of the pursuers."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the fault of the defender, as condescended on, they are entitled to reparation. (3) The defender being bound to prevent the surface water in question coming into the mines or coal-workings of the pursuers, the pursuers are entitled to decree, in terms of one or other of the alternative conclusions of the libel.

In defence, the defender stated that he was entitled and bound, under his lease from Mr Houldsworth, the common landlord of the pursuers and the defender, to work out the Ell coal seam to the out-crop, and his whole mineral workings and relative operations were conducted in conformity with his lease, in the ordinary and proper mode, and with due and reasonable care, and that the true cause of the access of water into the pursuers' workings had been their own operations in working out the barrier of coal under the railway between the two coal fields, which admitted water not only from the defender's colliery, but from other collieries belonging to Mr Houldsworth situated to the rise of the pursuers' mineral field.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defender not having been in fault in reference to the matters complained of, he is entitled to be assoilzied. (3) The defender's operations having been conducted in the ordinary and proper mode, and with due and reasonable care, the action cannot be maintained. (5) The influx of water complained of being due to the pursuers' own operations, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary, on 8th June 1875, allowed a proof before answer.*

* "NOTE— . . . The cause has been heard in the procedure roll upon the relevancy of the action, and, after hearing an able argument from the bar, I have come to be of opinion that, although the pursuers' averments are, notwithstanding the amendments which were allowed, still somewhat awanting in precision, they are nevertheless sufficient to entitle the pursuers to a proof before answer.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

The proof which was led established that the workings of the defender in the Ell seam had been regular and usual, except when working out the seam at the out-crop, at which place he had removed somewhat more of the pillars than was customary, and had, by special arrangement with the landlord, refrained from restoring the surface and filling up the sits, contrary to usual practice; that though the landlord had formed a catch-drain across the land draining into the area where the sits were, in order to intercept the drainage, it had been only partially successful, and that a considerable amount of surface water did get into the mine through the sits, estimated by the engineers examined at about six million gallons per annum; that the defender's pumps were only adapted for pumping the water from the Main seam, and that he had made no provision for letting the water of the Ell seam down into the Main seam for the purpose of reaching his pumps; that it all drained into his waste adjoining the railway, and there lodged against the barrier of coal between the two coal-fields, and found its way through to the pursuers' workings; that the defender had not been careful to preserve the five yards margin of coal along the railway as stipulated in his lease, but that the pursuers had, since 1870, when they received the landlord's sanction to do so, worked out the coal so far as practicable under the railway. The general bearing of the proof will also appear from the opinions of the Judges.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

"The mutual rights and obligations of superior and inferior heritors as to the transmission and reception of water, whether flowing on the surface or underground, are not definitely fixed by the law. Each case depends very much on its own circumstances. The general rule is stated by Erskine as follows (ii. 9, sec. 2):—'Where two contiguous fields belong to two different proprietors, one of which stands upon higher ground than the other, nature itself may be said to constitute a servitude on the inferior tenement by which it is obliged to receive the water that flows from the superior. If the water, which would otherwise flow from the higher ground insensibly without hurting the inferior tenement, should be collected into one body by the owner of the superior in the natural use of his property for draining his lands or otherwise improving them, the owner of the inferior tenement, without the positive constitution of any servitude, is bound to receive that body of water on his property, though it should be damaged by it, but as this right may be overstretched in the use of it, without necessity, to the prejudice of the inferior ground, the question, how far it may be extended under peculiar circumstances, is arbitrary.' This statement of the law was referred to by the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) in the case of Campbell v. Bryson, 16th December 1864, 3 Macph. 254, as expressing accurately the law of Scotland upon the subject, and it applies, in my opinion, to all water, whether superficial or subterraneous.

"The proof which is now allowed will shew whether the defender is, as the pursuers allege, violating the obligations imposed on him by his tenancy to prevent water from flowing into the pursuers' mines, or whether, and how far, the defender is overstretching the use of his right to pass on to the pursuers water which is collected in his own land in consequence of his use of the subject for mining operations.

"The proof is allowed before answer, so that all questions of relevancy are reserved."

* "NOTE.—The averments which the pursuers undertake to prove are contained in the third article of their condescendence as amended. The relevancy of these averments was discussed when the case was heard in the procedure roll, and before answer a proof was allowed. The proof has now been led, and the result, in my opinion, is, that the pursuers have failed to prove their averments, so that any decision as to their relevancy is unnecessary.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

The pursuers reclaimed.

Argued for them;—The right of the defender to work out the Ell coal to the out-crop was always under this limitation, that he must do so with

"Before considering the proof, it may be expedient to state what appears to me to be the general legal principles upon which cases like the present should be decided. No better exposition of the law can be found than in the passage from Erskine which is quoted in the note to the interlocutor of 8th June 1875. In the case of Campbell v. Bryson, also referred to in that note, the present Lord President (then Lord Justice-Clerk), in commenting upon the doctrine of Erskine, says,—'Now, I think we have here not only a statement of general doctrine applicable to the case in hand, but we have also a very careful statement of what is the proper qualification of that doctrine. In the last sentence of the passage that I have read he says that it must in every case be an arbitrary question how far this right is to be stretched under the particular circumstances. That is to say, if the inferior heritor complains that the superior heritor is unduly pressing his right and making the servitude intolerable to him, he will have the right to come to the Court with his complaint, and the Court will be entitled to regulate the matter between the two upon equitable terms. This is the true meaning, I apprehend, of the qualification which Mr Erskine adjects to the general statement of the doctrine, and to the doctrine with that qualification I unhesitatingly subscribe.' It may be that Erskine was dealing principally with questions of surface drainage; but there seems no reason why a principle applicable to surface water, and to operations upon the surface of land, should not be applied to operations under ground and to water which is found there. And, accordingly, I find that the principle has been adopted in several cases in England as the rule for decision. The first of these cases is Baird v. Williamson, 13th November 1863, 15 C. B. (N. E.), 376. There the defendant pumped water out of his mine, which was the upper mine, into a level trough, whence it flowed into the plaintiff's mine, which it never could have reached but for the pumping. In deciding the case, Erle, C. J., said,—'The owners of the higher mine have a right to work the whole mine in the usual and proper manner for the purpose of getting out any kind of mineral in any part of that mine; and they are not liable for any water which flows by gravitation into an adjoining mine from works so conducted. We think that the law was correctly laid down to that effect in Smith v. Kenrick.' Then he goes on to contrast that case with an operation of man made for the purpose of introducing foreign water on his own lands, and he goes on to say,—'The defendants, as occupiers of the higher mine, have no right to be active agents in sending water into the lower mine. The plaintiffs, as occupiers of the lower mine, are subject to no servitude of receiving water conducted by man from the higher mine. Each mine-owner has all rights of property in his mine, and among them the right to get all minerals therefrom, provided he works with skill and in the usual manner. And if, while the occupier of a higher mine exercises that right, nature causes water to flow to a lower mine, he is not responsible for this operation of nature.'

"Now, in the case of Smith v. Kenrick, 14th February 1849, 7 C. B., 515, which was thus adopted by the Court in Baird v. Williamson, an upper owner had worked out his coal, though he knew that the water from his workings must of necessity flow into his neighbour's through holes which his neighbour had made in his own coal. He was held entitled to do that; and Creswell, J., said,—'It would seem to be the natural right of each of the owners of two adjoining coal-mines, neither being subject to any servitude to the other, to work his own in the manner most convenient and beneficial to himself, although the natural consequence may be that some prejudice will accrue to the owner of the adjoining mine so long as that does not arise from the neglect or malicious conduct of the party.'

"Then, in Rylands v. Fletcher, July 1868, L. R., English and Irish App. (H. L.), vol. iii. p. 330, which contains the most authoritative exposition of the law, the defendant had made an artificial reservoir on his ground, and brought the water into his workings, whence it flowed into his neighbour's, and he was

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

due regard to the interests of his underground neighbours. The evidence shewed that he had worked it out in an improper manner, that he had taken more out than was consistent with the safety of the surface, and held responsible for that. In giving judgment Lord Chancellor Cairns said,—'The principles on which this case must be determined appear to me to be extremely simple. The defendants, treating them as the owners or occupiers of the close on which the reservoir was constructed, might lawfully have used that close for any purpose for which it might, in the ordinary course of the enjoyment of land, be used; and if, in what I may term the natural user of that land, there had been any accumulation of water, either on the surface or under ground, and if, by the operation of the laws of nature, that accumulation of water had passed off into the close occupied by the plaintiff, the plaintiff could not have complained that that result had taken place. If he had desired to guard himself against it, it would have lain upon him to have done so by leaving or by interposing some barrier between his close and the close of the defendants in order to have prevented that operation of the laws of nature.

"'As an illustration of that principle I may refer to a case which was cited in the argument before your Lordships—the case of Smith v. Kenrick, in the Court of Common Pleas.

"'On the other hand, if the defendants, not stopping at the natural use of their close, had desired to use it for any purpose, which I may term a non-natural use, for the purpose of introducing into the close that which, in its natural condition, was not in or upon it, for the purpose of introducing water, either above or below ground, in quantities and in a manner not the result of any work or operation on or under the land, and if, in consequence of their doing so, or in consequence of any imperfection in the mode of their doing so, the water came to escape, and so pass off into the close of the plaintiff, then it appears to me that that which the defendants were doing they were doing at their own peril, and if, in the course of their doing it, the evil arose to which I have referred—the evil, namely, of the escape of the water, and its passing away to the close of the plaintiff and injuring the plaintiff, then, for the consequence of that, in my opinion, the defendants would be liable. As the case of Smith v. Kenrick is an illustration of the first principle to which I have referred, so also the second principle to which I have referred is well illustrated by another case in the same Court—the case of Baird v. Williamson—which was also cited in the argument at the bar.'

"The next two cases (to which I do not think it necessary to refer more particularly, because they are merely illustrations of these principles) are Crompton v. Lee, 4th November 1874, L. R., 19 Equity Cases, 115; and Smith v. Fletcher, 11th February 1874, L. R., 9 Exchequer Cases, p. 64,—the question in the latter case being left to the jury whether what was done by the defendants was done by them in the ordinary, reasonable, and proper mode of working the mine.

"The main question, therefore, in the present case is, were the operations of the defender conducted by him in the usual reasonable and proper mode of working his mine? I think that after the evidence of Mr Landale, one of the witnesses for the pursuers—and the evidence, indeed, of all the witnesses—it is impossible to say that the workings of the Ell coal at the out-crop (because that is said by the pursuers to be the origo mali) were not done in the usual reasonable and proper—and, indeed, as Mr Landale says—in the necessary manner. It was an obligation imposed upon the defender in his lease that he should work out his coal to the out-crop; and Mr Landale, who superintends these matters for Mr Houldsworth, the landlord, seems to have gone with him to the ground, and arranged that it should be worked out in this particular manner, which he says was the usual manner of working it out. The object of both landlord and tenant was to get as much coal as possible, and the only way of doing so was by removing the pillars. Owing to the proximity of the out-crop of the coal to the surface, and the friable nature of the roof, it was impossible to take out every pillar—or at least to take out every pillar in its order—and the consequence was that some pillars remained while the ground crushed in round about them. That that he had made no attempt to restore the surface, and obviate the results of its subsidence. That result undoubtedly was, that during the last three or four years the pursuers' workings had been flooded with a resulted in inequalities, and in some instances in holes, in the surface of the ground. I think the pursuers have undoubtedly proved that, through the sits thus occasioned, water to some extent found it way into the defender's mine. But I do not think it is proved that very much found its way there, and Mr Landale is clear that little or none of that water found its way into the pursuers' mines. Still I think that some of the water did find its way to the pursuers' mines, and the pursuers are entitled to the benefit of that consideration, whatever it may be worth. I think, however, that the pursuers have failed to prove that any water entered the sits except what fell upon the surface of the subsided ground in the shape of rain or snow. It therefore appears to me that, so far as regards the mining operations of the defender, they are proved to have been usual, reasonable, and necessary operations, and to have been performed in the usual and proper course of working this mine. There does not appear to me to be any proof whatever of anything like æmulatio vicini in his working, or of any undue interference with the rights of his neighbour, Mr Wilson. No doubt Mr Landale said it would have been more neighbourly if he had deferred the excavation of the pillars at the dook or lower part of the Ell coal waste, where the Caledonian Railway forms the barrier between the fields of the pursuers and defender, until a later period of his lease; but Mr Landale also admitted that there was no impropriety in working it out in that way, that it was a very tempting piece of coal to take out, and that he (Mr Landale), who regularly inspected the workings on behalf of Mr Houldsworth, the common landlord of the pursuers and defender, never objected to it, but, on the contrary, was quite satisfied with the way in which the defender had conducted the operations as tenant. I therefore think that the proof is in favour of the defender upon that matter. He has not, in my opinion, overstretched his rights; indeed, everything seems to have been done by the defender which he was bound to do—and even more, because he seems to have taken certain precautions to prevent, so far as possible, the surface water from higher ground from going down to the pursuers' coal-field. The catch-drain, to which many of the witnesses refer as having been made immediately above the sits at the out-crop of the Ell coal, appears, no doubt, to have been made by the landlord; but that, I suppose, was done by arrangement between the landlord and the defender. And it certainly prevented a great deal of water from flowing down which would naturally have flowed down into those sits, but which must have been carried away by the catch-drain, and so been kept out of the sits. But, besides that, I think there can be no doubt that a considerable part of the water in the defender's Ell workings, from whatever source it comes, is carried off into a lodgment which has been referred to at the side of the pit No. 1, and from that it finds its way down to the defender's Main coal, whence it is pumped up to the surface, and carried away entirely from the pursuers' mine.

No. 55. Jan. 8, 1876. Wilsons v. Waddell.

"But even assuming that the whole of the surface water which finds its way through the sits into the defender's Ell workings is not so disposed of, and that a part, or even the whole, finds its way into the pursuers' coal-field, the question remains, Is there any duty upon the defender to do anything more? Is it his duty either to fill up the sits which have been made, or to take the water which enters by these sits into the bottom of his own works, and then pump it up again? Now, I do not see any duty incumbent upon him to fill up the sits. The object of filling up sits is, in the general case, to restore the surface so that it may be used again for agricultural purposes. But that is a matter in which the tenant of the coal has no interest, unless the landlord and the tenant of the surface require the restoration. In a coal-field adjoining the defender's, belonging to the same landlord, and tenanted by a person named Boyd, it has been proved that sits were filled up, but that the landlord and his mining engineer came to the conclusion that it was a mistake to do so, and that it was better for the sake of the estate to leave the ground as it had fallen in and to plant it.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

quantity of water which was not proper mine water, but which was water introduced from the surface into the defender's workings, and allowed to collect in his waste in such a manner as to force its way into the pursuers' workings, and put them to great inconvenience and expense. Undoubtedly a proprietor might give to a tenant whose lease was earlier in date greater privileges than to one whose lease was later. But, apart from special stipulations, the rights of conterminous tenants were just the same as those of conterminous and independent proprietors. Though the defender's lease was earlier in date than the pursuers', he could point to nothing in it which gave him any special privilege, except the obligation to work out the Ell coal to the out-crop, which, he contended, entitled him to do so to the injury of the pursuers. But his obligation so to work out the seam could give him no right which the proprietor himself had not—could not entitle him to work in an improper manner, to the injury of the inferior tenant. The question must therefore be dealt with as if it had occurred between two conterminous proprietors. Now, the rights and liabilities of superior and inferior heritor were the same below ground as on the surface. The superior tenant above ground was entitled to send down and the inferior heritor was bound to receive the natural run of surface water, whether from streams or from natural or agricultural drainage. So the superior heritor below ground was entitled to send down and the inferior heritor was bound to receive the natural run of underground water, even when arising from the drainage of mining operations. But there was no legal obligation on the inferior heritor below ground to receive the run of surface water, directed into his mine artificially or as the

---

And accordingly they resolved that the sits on the defender's coal-field should not be filled up. But, apart from this, I can see no obligation upon the tenant of the coal-mine, who has done his duty under the lease in working his coal out to the out-crop, to do anything in the way of restoring the surface, if his landlord does not call upon him to do so; and if water finds its way in by the operations of nature—the water from the heavens, for really, I think, that is all that is proved to come in this particular case—if it finds its way into the inner workings in that manner, that is just the result of the proper working of the mine, and the defender is not to be held responsible for it. Nor do I see any reason for calling upon him to pump out water which does his own workings no harm, and does not interfere with his winning the coal. He does, as I have said, all that is necessary for his own purposes, and in the usual and proper manner, and that, I think, is all that he is bound to do.

"It is right to say that Mr Landale, whose testimony is entitled to great weight in this case, is of opinion that of the water which finds its way from the defender's Ell workings into the pursuers' coal-field a very small quantity is surface water, and that the bulk of it is the natural product of the coal and surrounding strata, and that he attributes the influx of water not to the sits at the out-crop, which the pursuers blame, but to the removal of the pillars in the defender's waste at the dip of the Ell workings, 46 fathoms under ground, an operation which the defender was quite entitled to perform. It is, further, not immaterial to observe that the alleged increase of water in the pursuers' mine was contemporaneous not only with the sits caused by the defender working out his Ell coal at the out-crop, but also with the pursuers' own operations, by which they excavated a large portion of the coal under the Caledonian Railway, which by their lease was intended to form a barrier between their coal-field and that of the defender. Mr Landale, no doubt, thinks that enough coal was left to form a sufficient barrier, but very many of the other witnesses are satisfied that if the pursuers had not wrought out the coal under the railway little or no water would have permeated to their mine.

"On the whole, I think that the pursuers have failed to prove their averments, and that the defender must be assoilzied, with expenses."

No. 55.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

result of improper and negligent working. That was a burden which the law did not impose on him. If the defender's contention was sustained, there was nothing which could prevent him interrupting the course of a surface stream or river and letting its volume into the pursuers' mine, to the entire destruction of his workings. None of the authorities referred to on the other side touched the case. They all dealt with surface water running on the surface, or with underground water running underground.[1]

Argued for the defender;—He was bound by his lease to take out the Ell coal to the out-crop. His lease was prior in date to the pursuers', and the pursuers, in taking their lease, must be held to have undertaken the risk of injury to the subject let to them from operations which the superior tenant was already bound to the common landlord to perform. At any rate, if they had any claim it was not against the defender, but against the common landlord. But there was nothing in the evidence to shew that the working of the defender in the Ell seam, from his commencement at the waste adjoining the railway to the out-crop, had not been proper, regular, and usual. The filling up of sits which must necessarily occur is not an invariable practice, and the proprietor, from having tried it with no good effect in adjoining coal-fields, had desired that it should not be done, as he believed it to be a mere waste of time and labour. Further, the inferior proprietor or tenant underground was bound to receive all water that came down to him as the drainage of superior workings properly carried on. That was all the burden which, in the present case, the pursuers had to bear. The water which came down to them was just the drainage which resulted from the proper working of the defender's mine. That some portion of the water, and that must be a very small one, came more directly from the surface, made no matter. The pursuers had no grounds for their distinction between surface and underground water. All water was the same; its atoms were going in a perpetual circle. They were drawn up to the heavens and again descended on the surface of the earth, whence they found their way by percolation to the strata below ground. It made no difference that the water dripped in through crevices in the surface, instead of gradually percolating through. But there was another point to be considered: Even on the assumption that injury had occurred to the pursuers through the fault of the defender, the pursuers had themselves materially contributed to that injury by working away the barrier between the two coal-fields. Had they left the barrier of the coal beneath the railway and five yards on either side, which was contemplated by all parties when the leases of 1855 and 1860 were entered into, there would have been sufficient to keep out the water of which the pursuers were now complaining, and to retain it in the defender's waste. They were therefore guilty of contributory fault, without which the injury complained of would not have been suffered. They were therefore barred from recovering in this action.[1]

[1] Stair, 2, 7, 8; Ersk. 2, 9, 2; Dig. 39, 3, 1 (13); Campbell v. Bryson, Dec. 16, 1864, 3 Macph. 254, 37 Scot. Jur. 121; Baird v. Williamson, Nov. 13, 1863, 15 Scott's C. B. Rep. (new ser.) 376; Fletcher v. Rylands, May 14, 1866, L. R., 1 Ex. 265, and July 17, 1868, L. R., 3 Eng. and Ir. Ap. 330; Smith v. Fletcher, Feb. 11, 1874, L. R., 9 Ex. 64; Crompton v. Lea, Nov. 25, 1874, L. R., 19 Eq. 115; Samuel v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., Dec. 12, 1850, 13 D. 312, 23 Scot. Jur. 125; Cowan v. Lord Kinnaird, Dec. 15, 1865, 4 Macph. 236, 38 Scot. Jur. 131; Bald v. Alloa Coal Co. and E. of Mar, May 30, 1854, 16 D. 870, 26 Scot. Jur. 437; Irvine v. Leadhills Mining Co., March 11, 1856, 18 D. 833 (vide p. 841); Blair v. Hunter, Finlay, and Co., Nov. 29, 1870, 9 Macph. 204, 43 Scot. Jur. 169; Mackenzie v. Woddrop, Jan. 24, 1854, 16 D. 381, 26 Scot. Jur. 180; Hamilton v. Turner and Monklands Iron Co., July 19, 1867, 5 Macph. 1086, 39 Scot. Jur. 621; Brand v. Bell's Trustees, Nov. 6, 1872, 11 Macph. 42, 45 Scot. Jur. 34.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

At advising—

LORD ORMIDALE.—In this case some questions of importance have been raised in relation to the respective rights of the pursuers and the defender as coterminous lessees of different parts of the same coal-field.

The leases of both parties are held from Mr Houldsworth of Coltness. The defender's lease is considerably earlier in date than the pursuers', being for nineteen years from Martinmas 1855, while the pursuers' is for nineteen years from Martinmas 1860.

The defender's workings are situated on the north to the rise, and the pursuers' on the south to the dip. The Caledonian railway passes between them, from west to east.

The pursuers are expressly taken bound by their lease "not to work, without first obtaining the sanction of the landlord, any of the coal within five yards of the boundary of the subjects let or of the Caledonian railway." In like manner the defender is bound by one of the conditions of his lease "not to work any of the minerals within five yards of the boundaries of the subjects let." Having regard to these boundaries and to the explanations given at the debate in connection with plans and other evidence, the barrier or ground contemplated to exist between the two collieries in question extended in breadth to at least 40 yards.

The pursuers conclude against the defender, inter alia, for £2000 of damages; and the grounds of their action, as stated in the third article of their condescendence, are to the effect that "the defender's operations in working out his said coals have caused the ground above the same to subside over an area of five acres, and the said subsided ground forms a basin into which surface water from an area of about twenty acres falls; and the said water having no other escape, owing to the failure of the defender to make provision for its passing on, passes down through the said ground, by means of breaks, holes, or sits in the same, caused by its having subsided as aforesaid, into the coal workings or wastes of the defender, in which it collects, and thence through the barrier or wall into the mines or workings of the pursuers." On the other hand, the defender, while he generally denies the pursuers' statements, and maintains that his own workings have been regular and proper, avers, in his answer to the second article of the condescendence, "that the pursuers, whose mineral field lies along the line of the railway on the south or south-west side thereof, have at various times and in different localities worked out the barrier stipulated under their lease to be left unwrought, namely, the coal under the ground occupied by the railway, the result of which operations has been to admit of the access of water to the pursuers' workings, not only from the workings of the defender, but also from those occupied by the Coltness Iron Company and those formerly occupied by William Boyd and G. Simpson, mineral tenants of Mr Houldsworth, all situated to [1] Smith v. Kenrick, Feb. 14, 1849, 7 Scott's C. B. Rep. 515; Chasemore v. Richards, July 27, 1859, 7 Clark's H. of L. Rep. 349 (Lord Ch. Chelmsford's judgment); Rawstron v. Taylor, June 23, 1855, 11 Hurl. and Gor. Ex. Rep. 369; Acton v. Blundell, 1843, 12 Mee. and Wels. 324; Aitken v. Dewar, 1734, Elch. voce Property, 1, and 2 Bell's Ill. 119; Broadbent v. Ramsbotham, Jan. 12, 1856, 11 Hurl. and Gor. Ex. Rep. 602.

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

the rise of the pursuers' mineral field." And, in reference to this statement, the defender's fifth plea is, that "the influx of water complained of being due to the pursuers' own operations, the defender is entitled to absolvitor."

How far the respective statements of the parties have been established depends on the view that may be taken of the proof. Without deeming it necessary to enter into a minute examination or analysis of the proof, I think it sufficiently shews, 1st, that in consequence of the defender's operations to the rise at the out-crop of the Ell coal, a considerable subsidence of the ground and numerous sits or holes occurred; 2d, that the defender took no means, or, at any rate, no effectual means, for filling up or securing the sits or holes so caused; and 3d, that the consequence was the coming down into his workings of a larger quantity of surface water, which, finding its way through the division barrier, passed on into the pursuers' workings, to their loss and damage. If the case had rested there I should have been disposed to adopt a different view from that of the Lord Ordinary, and to have held that the defender was liable in reparation to the pursuers. But in saying so I do not feel that I require to question the general principle of law upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeds. On the contrary, I concur with him in holding that, as a general principle, every one is entitled to use and enjoy his own property in every lawful way he pleases. This principle is not, however, to be taken as of universal or unqualified application. On the contrary, while every one is, as a general rule, entitled to use and enjoy his own property in every lawful way he pleases, he can only do so subject to the qualification that he does not unnecessarily, and by operations of an unusual and improper description, injure his neighbours or their property. As stated by Mr Bell (Prin., sec. 964), the absolute use of property is subject to many well known and well established limitations. While, therefore, an upper heritor is entitled, in the usual and proper cultivation of his lands, to collect into drains the water arising thereon and pass it down upon the lands of another situated at a lower level, as illustrated by the recent case of Campbell v. Bryson, Dec. 16, 1864, 3 Macph. 254, he is not entitled so to construct works as to collect the water on his property into a large and unusual quantity, and then, either purposely or owing to its not having been sufficiently secured or safely carried away, to allow it to overflow on adjoining lands, to the injury and damage of the owner or occupier thereof, as illustrated by the case of Samuel v. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, March 3, 1849, 11 D. 968, and Dec. 12, 1850, 13 D. 312. Accordingly, in the present instance, I cannot hold that the defender, as long as he confined his operations within the boundaries of his own portion of the coal-field, and so long as these operations were in themselves of a usual, reasonable, and proper character, could be made answerable for loss or damage arising to the pursuers as lessees of that portion of the coal-field situated at a lower level in consequence of water coming down into it from his (the defender's) mineral field situated above, providing that the water so coming down was only the natural and necessary product of the higher field. But if the water so coming down and causing loss and damage to the pursuers, as lessees of the minerals situated at the lower level, was not the natural product of and did not arise in the defender's mine, but was foreign water, so to speak, introduced into his mine from the surface, through operations of the defender carried on in an unusual, unreasonable, and improper manner, and thence passed into the pursuers' workings, I should hold it clear that the defender would be liable in the consequences. The case of Smith v. Fletcher and others, Feb. 11, 1874, Law

Reports, 9 Exch. Cases, p. 64, is an authority in point, for in that case, which was very similar in its circumstances to the present, it was held by the Court that the question for the jury was, "whether what was done by the defendants was done by them in the ordinary reasonable and proper mode of working the mine."

Applying the principles to which I have now adverted to the present case it appears to me, on the proof, that there was negligence and blame imputable to the defender in allowing the sits or holes in the ground which, in consequence of his operations, had subsided at the surface, to remain open and unsecured so as to admit large quantities of water, not the natural product of his mine, into his workings, and thence to pass on into the workings of the pursuers, to their loss and damage; or, in other words, I think the proof shews that, in not filling up and securing the sits or holes, his operations were not usual, reasonable, or proper. Mr Robertson, the pursuers' engineer, says:—"I observed that the defender's workings at and near the out-crop of the Ell seam had caused the ground to subside in a very irregular manner. There were large holes in it. The irregularity had been caused by the Ell pillars underneath having been taken out in an irregular manner." And he then proceeds to explain how, in consequence, a very large quantity of water entered the defender's mine which would not otherwise have been there, and thence passed through the barrier into the pursuers' workings. And he afterwards states:—"In practice, it is contrary to regular and good working to allow irregular sits or holes to remain at the out-crop." And—"So far as I saw, there had been nothing unusual or improper in the defender's working of the coal; but, with regard to the crop working and leaving these open sits, it had been decidedly improper." And afterwards—"The object in filling up sits is to keep the surface water out, so as to prevent it interfering with the working of contiguous collieries." Mr Landale, the landlord's engineer, as I read his evidence, substantially corroborates Mr Robertson, and I would especially refer to what he says. When asked if it is "consistent with usage that surface water should be introduced into mines," he answers, "No." Mr David Rankine, another engineer, says—"The rain water that gets into these pits goes into Waddell's (the defender's) Ell coal workings. I have frequently seen ground pitted, not so bad as this, however, but I never saw ground allowed to remain in such a state. It is generally filled up." There is more evidence to the same effect, and there is no direct or sufficient contradiction of it anywhere that I can discover.

I am not, however, to be understood as saying that the defender was not entitled to work out the whole coal of his field to the very out-crop, and, in the course of his operations for that purpose, to create sits or holes, and thereby introduce, irrespective of the pursuers or their interests, into his own mine, any quantity of water he pleased, provided he secured it there, and prevented it passing down into the pursuers' workings; but not having done this, I could have entertained very little doubt, having regard to the authorities which were referred to at the debate, that, if the case had been left there, he would have been liable to the pursuers for the injurious consequences thereby sustained by them. Thus, in the case of Fletcher v. Rylands and another, as decided in the Exchequer Chamber (Law Reports, 1 Ex. Cases, p. 265), and House of Lords (Law Reports, 3 English and Irish Appeals, p. 330), it was held (1) that where the owner of land, without wilfulness or negligence, uses his land in the ordinary manner of its use, though mischief should thereby be occasioned to his neighbour, he will not be held liable in damages; but (2) that if he brings upon his land anything which would not naturally come upon it, and which is in itself dangerous and may become mischievous if not kept under proper control, though in doing so he may act without personal wilfulness or negligence, he will be liable in damages for any mischief thereby occasioned; and (3) that on these principles the owner of a mill situated above mine workings who, on constructing a reservoir on his own ground, by neglecting to secure and fill up certain old shafts or openings, allowed a quantity of water to go down into the mine below, was held liable in the damages thereby occasioned. The ground upon which this liability was found is explained by the Lord Chancellor, where he says that if the defendants, not stopping at the natural use of their close, had desired to use it for the purpose of introducing water which in its natural condition was not in or upon it, "and if, in consequence of their doing so, or in consequence of any imperfection in the mode of their doing so, the water came to escape and to pass off into the close of the plaintiff, then it appears to me that that which the defendants were doing they were doing at their own peril; and if, in the course of their doing it, the evil arose to which I have referred—the evil, namely, of the escape of water, and its passing away to the close of the plaintiff, and injuring the plaintiff—then for the consequences of that, in my opinion, the defendants would be liable."

No. 55.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

The principle of decision in that case applies, I think, to the circumstances of the present. Here, as in it, what may be called foreign water—that is, water which did not naturally arise in or was the natural product of the defender's mine—accumulated on the ground above, which had subsided, and in which there were openings or sits caused by his operations, in the conduct of which he had neglected the usual reasonable and proper precautions, was introduced or allowed to come into his mine, and thence to pass into the pursuers', to their loss and damage. For that loss and damage, therefore, I would have been disposed to hold the defender liable were it not for the pursuers' own acts, now to be noticed, which appear to me to have been of such a description as to bar and preclude their claim for reparation.

It has been clearly proved, I think, that the pursuers, in place of keeping within the boundaries of their own coal-field, and leaving the barrier betwixt it and the coal-field of the defender intact and untouched, which if they had done no loss or damage would have arisen to them, not only encroached on that barrier, but in the course of their operations worked nearly through and destroyed it. On this point it might be sufficient to refer to the evidence of the engineer, William Robertson, their own witness, who says, in answer to a question from the Court, "If a barrier had been left between the coal-fields of the pursuers and defender of the full width of the railway and five yards on each side, I think it would have kept the water pretty well out. I do not think the pursuers would have been troubled with water in that case. I was in the pursuers' workings immediately to the south of the railway. According to the plan the five yards barrier upon their side has not been left. It is all out, and, besides that, the coal under the railway has been cut into from the pursuers' side. There has also been similar working from the defender's side. The plans shew that the barrier mentioned in the leases has been disregarded by both parties. Through the barrier being reduced in this way the passage of water is very much facilitated." Mr Telfer, the pursuers' manager, and also a witness called and examined for them, says,—"I do not know of any agreement by which the pursuers wrought out some of the coal under the railway, but I remember working out coal there. We wrought out the coal under the railway opposite the defender's waste north-westwards from the Waterloo Road, which crosses the railway between Benthead and Overtown. We finished our workings under the railway opposite the defender's waste a few months ago." And although this witness, the pursuers' own manager, goes on afterwards to state that the coming in of water from the defender's waste did not increase through the encroachment on the barrier, I must, from the nature of such an operation, as well as from the evidence of other witnesses, hold he is mistaken in this. Mr Landale the engineer, also called as a witness for the pursuers, removes indeed any doubt that could be entertained on the subject.

I cannot therefore have any hesitation in holding that the pursuers seriously encroached upon the barrier that ought to have been left between them and the defender's mine, and that such encroachment was, to a great extent, if not entirely, the cause of the inroad of water upon them, of which they complain. And if so, they must be held to have brought the mischief upon themselves, and are consequently barred in law from maintaining the claim for damages now concluded for by them in the present action. Nor do I think it of any consequence that the defender also encroached on the barrier, of which there is some evidence, although scarcely enough to be altogether relied on, for beyond all question the pursuers, if they were not the sole transgressors in this respect, were so to by far the greater extent, and cannot, therefore, maintain a claim for loss or damage resulting from their own contributory fault.

It was argued, however, for the pursuers that as they, by separate agreement dated 16th August 1870 with their landlord, obtained his permission to work out the coal under the railway, their doing so cannot be any fault on their part. I am unable to concur in this view. The landlord's permission may be a good answer by the pursuers to any claim of damages against them at his instance, but I am unable to see how it can avail them in the present dispute with the defender, who was no party to the alleged agreement. It was, besides, entered into by the pursuers and their landlord long subsequent to the defender's lease, and after a great deal of water had, in the knowledge of the pursuers, accumulated in his waste. It must therefore, I think, be considered, as in a question with the defender and in reference to his rights and interests, a reckless and improper proceeding on the part of the pursuers, with or without the permission of their landlord, to interfere, as they did, with the barrier between their and the defender's workings.

The result is that in my opinion the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to, although not for the reasons assigned by him.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have come to the same conclusion, although perhaps on somewhat wider grounds, and I agree that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, must be affirmed.

I agree with the opinion just expressed by Lord Ormidale, that the pursuers have failed to prove that the loss and injury which they have sustained on account of the water which has flowed into the pursuers' workings from the workings of the defender, which are at a higher level, has been occasioned by the fault of the defender. The pursuers were bound to trace the damage complained of directly to the defender's fault,—that is, to shew that the damage was occasioned solely and directly by the illegal conduct of the defender,—and, I think, the pursuers have failed to do this. On the contrary, I agree in thinking that to some extent at least the pursuers have themselves contributed to or facilitated the flow of water of which they complain. Instead of leaving the broad barrier below the railway, which naturally separates the upper part of the coal from the lower, and leaving 5 yards in addition of unwrought mineral, probably making in all a barrier of from 30 to 40 yards, the pursuers have chosen, under special bargain with the landlord, to work out the whole, or nearly the whole, barrier under the railway, and it is impossible to doubt that there being now no barrier or only a very thin barrier from the rise to the dip portions of the seam, water from the upper portion must flow directly and freely into the pursuers' workings.

No. 55.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

But I am prepared to rest the judgment upon a broader ground. I think that the defender in everything he did in working the upper seams, that is, the seams to the rise from the railway, has acted legally, and that although the consequence of such legal working may be that additional water finds its way into the workings to the dip from the railway the defender is not answerable for this, and not liable in damages to the pursuers.

Admittedly where a dipping seam or seams of coal belong to different proprietors or are let to different tenants without any special stipulation as to water the lower part of the seam must receive all the water that flows naturally into it from the upper part, and if the proprietor or tenant of the upper part works out the whole coal therein he may do so without leaving pillars or without making any provision whatever for the water which may naturally accumulate in or flow through the wastes. If the whole coal is taken out either by the longwall system or by finally removing the pillars this will cause subsidence and dislocate the upper strata to a greater or less degree, so as to occasion a much greater percolation of water, which will necessarily find its way to the lower workings, than would have been the case had the coal been left unwrought, or if the wastes had been supported by pillars. Still this is just one of the natural burdens which lower coal workings must sustain. They must take the water that comes in the course of ordinary legal working, be it more or less, and no claim will arise though the quantity of water be increased by the workings of the upper coal owner.

Accordingly, in the present case, it was ultimately conceded in argument, and, whether conceded or not, I think it is quite clear in law, that the pursuers have no claim whatever against the defender on account of the defender having first taken out the coal in the dook, and then removed the dook pillars. It is plain, on the evidence, that this operation largely increased the flow of water into the pursuers' workings, chiefly by dislocating the superjacent strata, and also by creating a reservoir, as it were, a great accumulation of water, with great pressure of the water, which ultimately forced its way through the barrier. Still, the defender's workings being legitimate, no claim for damage can result.

In like manner the other workings of the defender seems to me to have been equally legal, equally within the powers and rights as mineral tenant, and equally incapable of founding a claim of damages at the pursuers' instance. I think this is the result of the evidence. The defender did nothing that he could have been interdicted from doing—nothing unusual or improper, so far as merely working the minerals is concerned.

Ultimately the point chiefly relied on by the pursuers was that the defender, in working out his coal to or very near the surface, broke up the surface of the ground so as not only to destroy the whole agricultural drains but so as to leave deep pits or gullies, or, as they are sometimes called in the evidence, plumps or ditches, over a considerable extent of surface—that the defender failed to repair the drainage, and failed to fill up these pits or gullies, plumps or ditches, so that the rain water falling in or near the fields where the surface was so destroyed found its way into the coal workings of the defender, and from thence into the inferior coal workings of the pursuers.

No. 55.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

It is of this water, this surface water flowing in through the sits or plumps, that the pursuers complain, and on account of this they claim damages. I am of opinion that this claim is not well founded.

It was hardly contended,—I think it cannot successfully be contended,—that the defender was not entitled to break down the surface, or to crack and rend it by taking out the coal at or near the out-crop. I think it is clear that the defender was entitled to take out every ounce of coal to the very surface,—that is, to the very out-crop,—however much this operation might injure the surface. With the question of surface or agricultural damage the pursuers have nothing to do. Now, according to the evidence, the coal at the out-crop could not be taken out without producing serious injury to the surface to a greater or less degree, and ultimately the pursuers' contention was that after these pits or gullies were made the defender was bound to have filled them up again so as to prevent rain water from flowing into them, and from them into the workings.

Now, I cannot find grounds in law sufficient to lay this obligation on the defender. I take the matter in steps. Thus: Suppose the surface at and near the out-crop had never been drained at all, that is, had no agricultural drains constructed. Of course it can never be maintained that a proprietor is bound, or could be compelled to make agricultural drains in his own ground for the sole benefit or behoof of a neighbouring mineral owner. In like manner, and as the next step, suppose that the previously existing agricultural drains have been cracked or destroyed by the subsidence from the mineral workings below: an adjoining mineral owner could never compel the replacement or repair of these agricultural drains if the proprietors of the injured surface refused to do so. Now, this failure or declinature to repair the agricultural drains is really part of what the pursuers complain of in the present case. The agricultural drains near the out-crop were broken and dislocated, and were not repaired. No doubt it is usual to repair such drains, and this is the ordinary practice, but then this is done for the benefit of the surface, or of the farmer, and not in the least in the interest of an adjoining mineral owner. The adjoining mineral owner has nothing to do with this, although, if the drains were repaired, he would derive benefit by water being carried off that would otherwise reach his workings.

Now, to take the last step, is the case different when, by means of legal mineral workings, not only are the agricultural drains destroyed, but besides cracks and rents, it may be of considerable size, are made in the surface of the ground: Can a neighbouring mineral owner who has no right either to that surface or to the minerals immediately below it, insist that these cracks and rents shall be filled up at the expense of the miner who made them, or of his landlord? I think not. They may increase the water which reaches the neighbouring mines, and which would otherwise flow somewhere else over the surface, but this is an accidental burden which the inferior mine-owner must bear.

No. 55.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Wilsons v. Waddell.

For,—and this is the essential point,—no water goes down these sits or cracks but the natural rain water of the field where they are situated. This seems to me to be the cardinal distinction. If the defender, by breaking up his own surface, had tapped a river or a streamlet, or any established flow of water coming from a distance, the case would have been otherwise. So, if the defender had tapped a lake, a pond, or a reservoir, he would have been bound to keep it from entering his pits, if by so doing it would reach the pursuers' workings. But there is no such rule with the raindrops which fall on the surface above the defender's own workings. There is no obligation to carry these raindrops—the natural rainfall of that surface—anywhere else. In the sense of this argument the rainfall of the defender's surface, that is, the surface above the mines, is not "foreign water" wrongfully introduced. It is natural water belonging to the surface, and which the defender is under no obligation to prevent from percolating below. In the present case there is no question regarding any other water than the natural rainfall of the field at the out-crop. The defender and his landlord have arranged, for their own benefit, to leave that field with disturbed and unrestored surface,—in short, to sacrifice the surface, as it is called, as that surface agriculturally is not worth the restoration. I think they are entitled to do so without being liable in damages to the pursuers.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the first ground of judgment stated by Lord Gifford. My opinion is the same as that of Lord Ormidale. I could not hold that the working of the defender has been entirely regular. On the contrary, there is a good deal of evidence tending to shew that it has not been in accordance with ordinary custom. But the pursuers have failed to trace the damage they have sustained to the defender's conduct; and besides, I think they themselves are to blame for a great portion of it, by reason of the way in which they have dealt with the coal barrier at the railway.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

HENRY BUCHAN, S.S.C.—JOHN GILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 56.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

JAMES HOULDSWORTH, Pursuer.—D.-F. Watson—Balfour—Mackintosh. WILLIAM BAIN AND OTHERS (Alexander Brand's Trustees), Defenders.—Asher—Moncreiff.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Minerals—Refusal to remove—Violent profits—Bona fide consumption—Reparation—Damages.—It was agreed between the landlord and tenant of a colliery that in the event of the tenant's death during the currency of the lease the landlord should be entitled to resume possession of the colliery, "if he should at any time be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives" of the tenant. The tenant having died, the landlord, twelve months thereafter, intimated by letter to his representatives that he was dissatisfied with their working of the colliery, and had resolved to resume possession thereof in terms of the agreement. The tenant's representatives refused to cede possession, and defended an action raised against them by the landlord, on the grounds (1) that the landlord was bound to prove a reasonable cause of dissatisfaction with their working; (2) that in point of fact no reasonable cause for dissatisfaction existed; and (3) that the landlord's expression of dissatisfaction was not made in bona fide. The Lord Ordinary gave judgment against the representatives of the tenant, and, on their reclaiming, his interlocutor was adhered to by the Inner-House. In a second action at the instance of the landlord against the tenant's representatives concluding for a sum of £10,000 in respect that having wrongfully retained possession they were liable in violent profits, and, separatim, that the landlord having suffered loss by their wrongful retention of possession they were liable to him in damages, held (1) that the landlord's remedy against the defenders was not a claim for violent profits but for damages for breach of contract in not removing in terms of the agreement, and (2) that in the circumstances he was entitled to damages.

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

Bona fide Consumption.—Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the rules as to bona fide possession and consumption, as a defence against a claim for violent profits, to be deduced from the judgments of the House of Lords in regard to the Queensberry leases (2 Shaw's App. p. 43, et seq.), and from the series of decisions which have followed, were, first, that where the possession has commenced in good faith, it lies with the true owner to shew when it ceases to be in good faith before the right to demand violent profits can prevail; second, that when possession has been continued during a litigation regarding the title of the possessor, it is sufficient to support the possessor's plea of bona fides that he had a probabilis causa litigandi; and third, that these principles are equally applicable whether the possession be challenged in respect of want of title in the possessor's author, or in respect of the nature and conditions of his own right.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

SEQUEL of case reported May 18, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 683.

The late Robert Brand was tenant under the pursuer, James Houldsworth of Coltness, of the Greenhead Ell coal and fire-clay in a portion of the estate of Coltness. The rights of the parties were defined by lease dated 9th and 28th November 1867 and minute of agreement dated 5th October 1869, to which the pursuer's father, Henry Houldsworth, and Robert Brand were parties. This latter deed provided,—"First, that on the event of the death of the said Robert Brand during the currency of the lease the landlord is hereby empowered, if he so wishes, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery and other subjects of the lease, at a valuation as afterwards provided for, if he should at any time be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand."

Robert Brand died on 26th January 1873, having conveyed his whole means and estate to trustees for behoof of his son, Robert Brand junior.

Robert Brand junior died on 3d July 1873, a minor and unmarried, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. The lease of the colliery was, however, claimed by his uncle, Alexander Brand, the immediate younger brother of Robert Brand senior, as being heritage, and therefore not carried by the settlement of Robert Brand junior.

Alexander Brand died on 5th November 1873, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole means and estate to the defenders, William Bain and others, as trustees.

On 19th January 1874 the colliery, which had been, since the death of Robert Brand senior on 26th January 1873, managed by his trustees, was handed over, by agreement among the parties interested, to the trustees of Alexander Brand, who thereafter worked it for behoof of the trust-estate under their management.

On 3d February 1874 the pursuer, James Houldsworth, by his agents, Messrs Murray, Beith, and Murray, W.S., addressed to each of the defenders the following letter:—"Sir, We beg leave to intimate to you, as one of the trustees of the late Alexander Brand, miner, residing in Wishaw, that Mr Houldsworth of Coltness is dissatisfied with the working of the Greenhead Colliery by the representatives of the late Mr Robert Brand, and has resolved to resume possession thereof, in accordance with the power to that effect contained in the minute of agreement entered into between himself and the late Mr Robert Brand, dated 5th October 1869.

No. 56.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

"You are aware that Mr David Landale, M.E., Edinburgh, on the part of Mr Houldsworth, and Mr John Mackenzie, M.E., Glasgow, on the part of Mr Brand's representatives, are, by the minute of agreement, appointed arbiters for valuing the pits, plant, and others, connected with the said colliery, and we have to intimate that we have placed the principal minute of agreement in the hands of Mr Landale, and a copy of it in the hands of Mr Mackenzie, and have asked them to name an oversman in case of their differing in opinion, and also to fix an early day for proceeding with the valuation.—Yours, &c."

The defenders disputed Mr Houldsworth's right to resume possession, and accordingly Mr Houldsworth, on 25th April 1874, raised an action to have his right to enter on and resume possession of the minerals declared, and to have the defenders ordained to concur in having a valuation of the colliery plant, as provided for in the agreement of 5th October 1869, proceeded with, and to remove. To this action the defenders entered appearance, and lodged defences, in which they maintained (1) that according to the legal effect and construction of the clause in the minute of agreement founded on by Mr Houldsworth he was bound to prove a reasonable cause of dissatisfaction; (2) that in point of fact there was no reasonable cause for dissatisfaction; and (3) that the dissatisfaction expressed by Mr Houldsworth was not in reality and bona fide entertained by him, but was only assumed for his own purposes.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary (Shand), on 15th January 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by minute of agreement dated 5th October 1869, entered into between the pursuer, proprietor of the estate of Coltness, and the late Robert Brand, coalmaster, Wishaw, with reference to the lease of Greenhead Colliery, then current, and which had been granted to the said Robert Brand, and Jonathan Hyslop, coalmaster, Wishaw, it was provided, inter alia, that in the event of the death of the said Robert Brand, the pursuer was thereby empowered, if he so wished, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery, and other subjects of the said lease of the Greenhead Colliery at a valuation as therein provided for, if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working of the colliery: Finds that the said Robert Brand died on 26th January 1873: Finds that, in exercise of the powers conferred on him by said minute of agreement, the pursuer, by letter dated 3d February 1874, sent by his directions and authority by his agents to the defenders, intimated that he was dissatisfied with the working of the said colliery by the representatives of the said Robert Brand, and had resolved to resume possession of the colliery in accordance with the power to that effect contained in said minute of agreement: Finds that the defenders have failed to instruct that the pursuer was not at the date of the said notice truly dissatisfied with the working of said colliery by the representatives of the said Robert Brand, and that the said notice was not given by the pursuer in bona fide: Therefore decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, ordains the defenders to concur with the pursuer in taking steps for having a valuation of the plant and machinery connected with the colliery, including waggons, if any, ascertained, in terms of the said minute of agreement, and decerns ad interim: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

The defenders reclaimed, but on 18th May 1875 the Second Division refused their reclaiming note, and adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted the cause back to him.

The present action was raised on 25th May 1875 by James Houlds-

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

worth of Coltness, with consent and concurrence of Mrs Jessie Robertson or Brand, widow of Robert Brand senior, to whom, at the date of the intimation of 3d February 1874, he had agreed to let the colliery, against the defenders, Alexander Brand's trustees, concluding that they should be decerned to make payment to him of £10,000.

In support of the conclusion of this action the pursuer stated;—(Cond. 15) "The retention by the defenders of possession of the said colliery subsequent to the pursuer's said notice of 3d February 1874 was wrongful and without right or title. By and through their said retention of possession the defenders have been enabled to make large profits by the working of the said colliery. The said profits are violent profits, and amount to not less than the sum of £10,000. The pursuer has sustained loss, injury, and damage not less than is represented by that amount, by and through the said wrongful proceedings of the defenders." *

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having wrongfully retained possession of the said colliery after their right to do so had ceased, and after being duly called upon to cede possession to the pursuer, are liable for violent profits to the amount sued for. (2) Separatim, the pursuer having suffered loss and damage to the amount sued for by the defenders' wrongful retention of possession, he is entitled to decree, as concluded for.

The defenders denied that they were liable either for violent profits or damages, and averred that they had "acted throughout with perfect bona fides, believing that there were no grounds for dissatisfaction on the part of the landlord, and that he was not entitled to put an end to the lease."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The question of the pursuer's right to terminate said lease having been one attended with difficulty, and the defenders having retained possession of the subjects let in the bona fide belief that the lease could not be terminated without their consent, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary, on 26th July 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that from and after the 15th day of January 1875, being the date of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, Shand, decerning in terms of the declaratory conclusions in the action of declarator and removing at the instance of the pursuer against the present defenders and others, the defenders have wrongfully retained possession of the pursuer's colliery of which they were the tenants: Finds that the defenders are liable for violent profits in respect of the retention of possession as aforesaid from the said 15th January 1875 to the day of their removal, due allowance being made in estimating such profits for the time occupied by the valuation of the plant and machinery, in terms of said interlocutor of Lord Shand, provided the valuation has not been or shall not be unduly protracted or obstructed on the part of the defenders; and before further answer appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses; grants leave to both parties or either of them to reclaim against this interlocutor if so advised." †

* After the judgment of the Second Division on 18th May 1875 in the former action at Mr Houldsworth's instance the defenders intimated that they were ready to remove from the colliery so soon as the valuation of the plant and machinery had been completed, and the amount thereof paid to them, as provided for in the minute of 5th October 1869. The necessary steps for having the valuation proceeded with were taken, and the valuation was in course of being made while the present action was proceeding, but the valuation had not been completed, nor had the defenders removed from the colliery at the date of this judgment.

† NOTE.— . . . . . "In the present action the pursuer sues the defenders

No. 56.

an. 8, 1876.
Ioouldsworth
. Brand's
'rustees.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—(1) This was not a lease of an agricultural subject yielding fruits. It was rather a sale than a lease, under which the grantee was entitled not merely to use and enjoy the subject salva rei substantia, but to consume and carry away what was pars soli. There was no case which dealt with violent profits in relation to a case of this sort except that of the Duchess of Roxburgh (Feb. 17, 1815, F.C.), which was decided in very special circumstances. And in a case like this the grantee must be much more strictly dealt with, else the granter may lose not only the enjoyment of his subject for a period, but the very subject itself.[1] (2) The defenders had no probabilis causa litigandi in opposing the pursuer's for £10,000, which, he says, represents the amount due by the defenders as violent profits from the date of the notice on 3d February 1874, or as damages caused by the wrongous retention of possession since that time. The defenders plead that their opposition to the action of declarator and removing was made and continued in the bona fide belief that the lease could not be put an end to without their consent; and that as the questions raised were attended with difficulty, their retention was not wrongous, and they are not liable either for violent profits or for damages.

---

"The authorities referred to both by the pursuer and by the defenders are the well-known cases of the Queensberry leases and the Durris leases, and one or two others of similar character, which are all cited in a note to Mr Nicolson's edition of Erskine, ii. vi., sec. 54. The result of these cases appears to be that the liability of a tenant for violent profits depends upon his bona fides, and is always a question of circumstances; and in such questions it is not material whether the validity or subsistence of the case depends upon the title of the landlord to grant the lease, or upon the construction of the lease itself. See the opinion of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Carnegie v. Scott, 9th December 1830, 4 W. and S., 431.

"The rule which seems to have been applied in all these cases was, that where the judgment of the Court of Session sustaining the leases was appealed to the House of Lords and reversed, the liability for violent profits did not begin till the date of the judgment of the House of Lords; but where the Court of Session had reduced the leases, and their judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords, the liability was held to begin at the date of the judgment of the Court of Session. I can see no good reason why a similar rule should not be applied to cases like the present, where the Lord Ordinary has decided that the landlord was entitled to terminate the lease, and the Inner-House have affirmed the judgment. I am therefore of opinion that the bona fides of the defenders must be held to have ceased at the date of the adverse interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on 15th January 1875, and that they are liable for violent profits—in other words, for damages for wrongous retention of possession from that date. On the other hand, I do not think that, in the circumstances of this case, the pursuer is entitled to claim violent profits from the date of his notice in February 1874. The Lord Ordinary who decided the declarator found considerable difficulty in giving the pursuer the decree he asked; and I think the defenders, in their fiduciary and tutorial capacities, were fairly entitled to try the question, but they were not bound to carry the litigation into the Inner-House. What shall be held to be the amount due by the defenders as violent profits or damages must be the subject of proof, and I think that in fixing the amount the time occupied by the valuation, if conducted without unreasonable delay or obstruction on the part of the defenders, must be taken into account. I do not think that the defenders are bound to cede possession until the plant and machinery are valued and paid for, and accordingly decree of removing has not been pronounced by Lord Shand; but, on the other hand, they are not entitled to be unnecessarily tardy in proceeding with the valuation."

[1] Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees, Jan. 23, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 368; Cairns v. Howden, Dec. 15, 1870, 9 Macph. 284, 43 Scot. Jur. 134.

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

former action. They had full means of knowledge, and could not help knowing that the pursuer had good ground of dissatisfaction. There was no question of construction on which they were entitled to a judgment. (3) It therefore came to this, that in order to set up their own bona fides the defenders were obliged to prove the pursuer's mala fides. Now, they had failed even to throw suspicion upon the pursuer's bona fides in the matter, as was clear from the opinions of the Court in the former action. They were liable therefore in violent profits from the date of the notice of 3d February 1874, or at least from the date of the summons in the former action. They had been held wrong throughout, and it was only in cases where the defender had succeeded in getting at least one judgment in his favour that liability for violent profits had ever been postponed.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—Before finding the defenders liable in violent profits the Court must be satisfied that they were in mala fide in continuing possession,—that there was conscientia rei alienæ.[2] If, and so long as, they had probabilis causa litigandi, they were entitled to continue possession. Now, at the date of the pursuer's notice, 3d February 1874, and at the date of raising the summons in the former action, 25th April 1874, the defenders clearly had a probabilis causa litigandi. It was one thing to hold a possessor who has no title, whose title was intrinsically null, and another thing to find a possessor whose title is voidable merely, liable in violent profits. In this case the question whether the defenders' title was voidable depended upon a question of construction of documents, and a question of construction was in the same position as an extrinsic objection to title.[3] The objector's interpretation must be established to be correct. Now, the grounds on which the defenders resisted the pursuer's objection were that he was bound to shew reasonable grounds for his expressed dissatisfaction, that no such reasonable grounds existed in fact, and that he did not really entertain any bona fide dissatisfaction. The conduct of the pursuer and his correspondence, produced in the first action, gave the defenders good grounds for believing that the pursuer really had nothing to object to in their working, and was not in bona fide in expressing dissatisfaction. The remaining point was whether under the agreement of 1869 he was bound to shew reasonable grounds for his expressed dissatisfaction or not. This was a fair question to try. It was one which, the Lord Ordinary had admitted, was attended with difficulty, and on which he gave his judgment with evident hesitation. Not only therefore were the defenders, in their capacity as trustees, entitled but bound to take the judgment of the Lord Ordinary and also of the Inner-House before they ceded possession of a valuable portion of the estate entrusted to them. Until the judgment of the Inner-House on 18th May 1875, therefore, they could not be held in mala fide or liable in violent profits, and immediately after that date, namely, on 25th May 1875, they had offered to cede possession as soon as the requisite valuations, &c., stipulated in the deed of 1869, could be completed.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case which is the sequel of a former one, in which we found that the defenders, as mineral tenants under the pursuer, were bound to remove in terms of a minute of agreement entered into between the

---

[1] Innes v. Duke of Gordon's Executors, Nov. 10, 1830, 4 W. and S. 305.

[2] Duke of Queensberry's Executors v. Symington, March 10, 1824, 2 S. App. 80 (Lord Chancellor's opinion, p. 90); Hunter, vol. ii. p. 493.

[3] Carnegie v. Scott, Dec. 9, 1830, 4 W. and S. 431.

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

pursuer's father and the defenders' author. We held that the pursuer, as landlord, had exercised his right legally and effectually. Mr Houldsworth now concludes against the defenders for £10,000. He does not say in his summons precisely on what grounds his demand is made. But in his pleas in law he says that the defenders having wrongfully retained possession are liable in violent profits to the amount sued for; and separatim, that, having suffered damage to the amount sued for by reason of the defenders' wrongful retention of possession, he is entitled to decree as concluded for. The Lord Ordinary has found the defenders liable in violent profits from the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the former action at Mr Houldsworth's instance, but not before that date.

The question is attended with considerable difficulty. I find myself in the position of agreeing entirely in the exposition of the law contained in the note of the Lord Ordinary, and even in his application of it to the defence here stated, in some of its aspects, and yet being unable to concur in the result at which he has arrived.

The doctrine by which one who has no right to possess is protected by his reasonable and honest belief in the validity of his right, from a demand by the true owner for fruits reaped and consumed, is primarily applicable to rights in land, and the produce of the soil. "Bona fide possessor fructus facit perceptos et consumptos suos" is the expression of the rule on which the doctrine proceeds, and it is obviously directed to fruits which are periodically produced, and which from their nature are consumed as they arise. The rule has, however, received a wide effect, but the branch of it which we are here considering is the application of it as a defence by a possessor, against a demand by an owner, for violent profits,—that is, a claim at the instance of the owner for a penal accounting for fruits reaped and profits obtained by a possessor who has refused or failed to remove at his stipulated term, or who has possessed throughout without a valid title. Violent profits are profits acquired by violence—by an intruder without colour of law, who must account on the strictest footing. Since the well-known judgments of the House of Lords in the Queensberry leases, and the series of decisions which followed, there has really been no uncertainty as to the law on this subject, or the rules laid down by authority for our guidance. They may be stated thus,—First, when the possession has commenced in good faith it lies with the true owner to shew when it ceased to be so before the right to demand violent profits can prevail. Secondly, when possession has been continued during a litigation regarding the title of the possessor, it is sufficient to support the possessor's plea of bona fides that he had probabilis causa litigandi; and third, that the principle is equally applicable, whether the possession be challenged in respect of want of title in the possessor's author, or in respect of the nature and conditions of his own right. In regard to the first of these rules, as to the burden of proof, it was clearly announced by the House of Lords as the ground of decision in the cases regarding the Queensberry leases; and I cannot better express the rule itself, or the import of the judgment of the House of Lords as universally accepted, than by quoting the words of Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle in the case of Carnegie v. Scott in 1827. "None of your Lordships can doubt," he said, and with the entire acquiescence of the Court, "the general principle, now unalterably fixed by a series rerum judicatarum in this Court, and deliberately confirmed in the Queensberry and March cases (which proceeded on the general principle); and the party pursuing therefore must shew that his opponent was in mala fide." As to the second rule, it is laid down in specific terms by Erskine, that in a prosecution for violent profits the decree will be restricted to the yearly tack-duty, if the tenant has a probabilis causa litigandi, and this rule has been uniformly followed. In regard to the third of these rules a struggle was made in several cases which occurred shortly after the decisions in the Queensberry and March cases to limit the application of this principle of bona fide possession to cases in which the title of the tenant's author was challenged; but these attempts were uniformly unsuccessful, and the reverse has now been conclusively fixed by a uniform series of judgments, especially the case of Brisbane's Trustees v. Lead (7 S. 65) in 1828, and the judgment of Lord Brougham in the case of Carnegie in 1830, which has set the question at rest. The case of Brisbane is of itself conclusive, for the challenge there proceeded on a condition contained in the tenant's own tack, by which the landlord reserved right to feu portions of the farm, and the bona fides of the tenant was sustained to protect him from a demand for violent profits, although he had continued in possession six years after the challenge until the expiration of the tack. Lord Brougham's judgment in the case of Carnegie, however, leaves no room for question. He says, after speaking of objections to the author's title,—"But there is also another head on which the lease is not valid to convey the interest sought to be established by it, and that is, that the construction of the lease itself in point of law does not give the right contended for to the lessee; but I do not see, on principle, any distinction whatever between those sources of invalidity in the title of the lessee."—(4 W. and S. 440).

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

As regards the application of these principles to the plea of bona fides in this case, I see no reason whatever to doubt that the defenders had a probabilis causa litigandi. Their defence, although one in its result, consisted of three branches. First, they pleaded that the disputed clause in the lease put on the landlord the obligation of proving a reasonable ground of dissatisfaction, and this they maintained on the legal effect and construction of the condition. Secondly, they maintained in point of fact, on the proof, that there was no reasonable ground for his dissatisfaction; and, lastly, they maintained that the landlord's dissatisfaction was feigned, and not genuine, and this ground they supported, partly as a necessary consequence or corollary from the absence of reasonable ground of dissatisfaction, and partly on the fact that a similar notice had been served on them some months before, at a time when no dissatisfaction had been expressed, and when, as appeared afterwards, it was at least doubtful whether any was entertained by the landlord.

We repelled these pleas after argument, and for reasons expressed in a very anxious advising, in which we all delivered full opinions. I was of opinion, on the first ground, that the landlord was not bound to allege or prove any reason for his dissatisfaction, although the precise scope and construction of the condition was far from being free of difficulty. On the second, I thought the landlord had good reason to be dissatisfied; and on the third, that the landlord had entirely vindicated his good faith in the transaction. But in common with the Lord Ordinary, and, as I understood, the rest of your Lordships, I thought, and still think, that the case deserved and required the full consideration it received. The Lord Ordinary expressed the difficulty he had experienced. One of your Lordships in speaking of the condition of the lease, said, in emphatic terms, that the clause was very peculiar, and that it was not easy to understand exactly what the parties intended; and another of my brethren stated that he arrived at his conclusion latterly without any doubt. In short, it never occurred to me to regard the litigation otherwise than as raising questions of moment, which the parties were well entitled to try.

No. 56.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

The Lord Ordinary has given the defence of bona fide possession the most restricted effect of which it is capable, in limiting it to the period prior to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in January 1875. It can be of no moment, as regards this period, that there were no conflicting decisions subsequently. These, had they occurred, might have extended the period to which the plea applied, but they could have no other effect. In the well-known case of the Durris leases, as in many others, the losing party never had a judgment in his favour; nevertheless, he was only found bound to account from the date of the decree of the Court setting aside his lease.

I am therefore of opinion that in so far as this is an action for violent profits the defence of bona fide possession is sufficient to protect the tenants until their title was the subject of decision. But I had an impression throughout the argument, and am now quite satisfied, that the true claim of the landlord here is not one for violent profits in any sense; that it is not necessary for him to assail the tenant as mere intruders, but that his demand truly rests on a breach of a mercantile contract, of which the defenders have been guilty, and to the consequences of which bona fides never can be a defence. The pursuer's claim, therefore, arises on his second plea in law, and is limited to the actual loss which he can shew that he has sustained by the defenders' failure to remove in terms of their contract. To such a claim for reparation it is irrelevant to allege that the defenders read the contract otherwise. It is enough that their reading of it was wrong, and that they acted on their error to the injury of the other party to the contract. I forbear to inquire, for it is not necessary to do so, how far the analogy of a proper agricultural lease will extend in all its effects to a lease of a subject which yields no periodical produce, which has no reproductive power, and under which the tenant appropriates not the increment or fruits of the property, but the property itself. Questions of difficulty under this head may arise, and I reserve my opinion on them. But here the true interest which alone the landlord has any just claim to assert is so obvious that it requires no subtle distinction or analogies to establish it. He was deprived of the advantage of being able to let the mineral field on a new lease, which, indeed, seems to have been provisionally concluded, and the intended tenant is a consenter to the action. For the amount of any increased lordship or rent which he might thereby have obtained I think his claim is unanswerable, and that, in truth, is the measure of any legitimate interest he has in the action. I propose, therefore, that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and find that the pursuer is entitled to recover from the defenders damages for such injury as he may have sustained through the wrongful retention of possession by the defenders, and before further answer allow a proof to both parties in regard to the amount of such damage.

Lord Ormidale.—The present action is a sequel to the judgment pronounced by this Court in May last (4th series, Court of Session Cases, vol. ii. p. 683), in a former suit between the same parties, in which it was found that the present pursuer, Mr Houldsworth, was entitled to terminate the mineral lease in question by his intimating to the tenants his dissatisfaction with the working thereof; and it is not disputed that such intimation was given on 3d February 1874. It was accordingly held by the Lord Ordinary in the former action, by interlocutor dated 15th January 1875, affirmed by the Inner-House on 18th May thereafter, that the lease had come to an end, and that the defenders were bound to cede possession to the pursuer, and also to make over to him the whole plant of the colliery as soon as the value thereof could be ascertained.

In the present action the pursuer, Mr Houldsworth, founding upon the judgment in the former suit, concludes against the defenders for £10,000, which, as he explains in article 15 of his condescendence, is the amount of violent profits or loss and damage to which he is entitled in respect of the defenders' retention of the colliery subsequent to the intimation given to them on 3d February 1874. The defenders resist this conclusion, and maintain that they are not, in the circumstances, liable in violent profits or damages for the time they retained possession, or, at any rate, not prior to the judgment by the Inner-House of date 18th May 1875, when, at the soonest, according to their view, it can be held that their bona fides in retaining possession ceased.

The Lord Ordinary by his interlocutor now under review has found that the defenders have wrongfully retained possession of the pursuer's colliery since 15th January 1875, the date of the Lord Ordinary's judgment against them in the former suit, and has found them liable in violent profits accordingly. In this interlocutor the defenders have acquiesced, but the pursuer has reclaimed, and contends that he is entitled to violent profits or damages as from the 3d February 1874, when the formal intimation of his dissatisfaction with the working of the colliery and his resolution to resume possession was given.

In determining the question thus raised it is necessary to keep in view the relative positions of the parties, and the nature of their respective rights. The pursuer is landlord and the defenders are his tenants, and they are both parties directly to the agreement or contract of lease under which they stand in that relative position. The dispute has also arisen directly between themselves in reference to their respective rights under their contract, and not in consequence of the emergence of any third party with some other and better right. Neither does the claim of the pursuer relate to the fruits of a subject which has been allowed, without objection by the rightful owner, to be reaped and consumed in good faith on a colourable title by another. The pursuer's claim has reference exclusively to the time subsequent to the termination of the only right the defenders had, a right which the pursuer was entitled to terminate at the time and in the manner he did. It was so determined by the judgment of the Court in the former action, on a consideration of the import and effect, or in other words, the true meaning and construction of the contract or agreement of the parties.

In one, and I think I may say, the ordinary and prima facie view, therefore, of the question now to be determined, arising as I have explained, it does not readily occur why, on the one hand, the pursuer should not be entitled to the full benefit of his agreement or contract with the defenders, and why, on the other hand, the defenders should not be subjected in the consequences of their failure to implement that agreement or contract. Such, undoubtedly, is the ordinary law and rule of contracts. At the same time, I am not to dispute that the defenders might possibly have a good defence to the claim, in whole or in part, now made against them by the pursuer. But the only ground on which they maintain they have such a defence is the difficulty which attended the question, whether the pursuer was, or was not, entitled to terminate the lease

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

at the time and in the manner he did. It rather appears to me, however, that the difficulty which arose on that point in the former litigation was attributable in some, if not in a great measure, to the defenders themselves. Their contention was maintained on two grounds,—1st, on the ground that the working of the colliery had been conducted by them in a regular and satisfactory manner; and 2dly, and chiefly, on the ground that the pursuer was not in truth dissatisfied, but had stated he was so in mala fide, for the purpose of serving a sinister object. The pursuer denied the accuracy of these averments, and the Lord Ordinary and the Court held that they were ill-founded. It is obvious, indeed, from the report of the case, that had it not been for the defenders' allegation of mala fides against the pursuer, judgment would have gone against them without any proof, and in a comparatively short time.

Having regard, then, to a defence so put forward, and so disposed of, in the former suit, I cannot help thinking that it was one which, to say the least of it, is not now entitled to be regarded with much favour. The defenders could not fail, I think, to have known the nature of their operations in the management of the colliery, and that they were not of a description to give satisfaction to the pursuer, and as their allegation to the effect that they had "ascertained" that his intimation of the termination of the lease was made in bad faith proved erroneous, they must be held to have made it, if not recklessly and wantonly, without due inquiry and knowledge.

In this state of matters I must own my inability to see how the defence to the present action can be sustained. The Queensberry and Durris lease cases referred to by the Lord Ordinary do not appear to me to be in point, for in these cases the tenants held leases which were not only in themselves ex facie regular and unobjectionable, but had been allowed to subsist for a series of years, during which they expended their capital and paid their rents without complaint or notice of objection from any one. Not only so, but in a reduction of the Queensberry leases (2 Sh. App. 43 and 80), on the grounds that they had been granted by heirs of entail in excess of their powers, in respect of their extraordinary duration, grassum, diminution of rental, and other objections, this Court by a large majority sustained the leases, and it was only on appeal to the House of Lords that they were reduced. In these circumstances, which contrast in a remarkable manner with those of the present case, it is not surprising that it should have been held both by this Court and the House of Lords that the tenants were protected by bona fides from payment of violent profits prior to the judgment of the House of Lords. I cannot, therefore, hold that the Queensberry case gives the requisite, or, indeed, any support to the defenders' contention in the present case. The Durris case, again (Carnegie v. Scott, 1 Shaw's App. 114, and 6 Sh. Court of Session Reports, 206), involved a question of great difficulty, of such difficulty that it was only ultimately determined against the tenant in the House of Lords, where a previous judgment in his favour by the Court of Session was reversed, and therefore he was subjected in violent profits only from the date of the reversal. And with reference to the case of the Duchess of Roxburghe, 17th February 1817, F. C., it has to be remarked that it was not that of a lease at all, and did not arise betwixt landlord and tenant. It was the case of a widow drawing the rents of certain quarries situated within her locality lands for several years without objection, but who at once ceased to do so on a challenge being intimated. It was therefore held that she was protected against bygones in respect they were bona fide percepti

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

et consumpti. In the present case, all the pursuer asks is that the defenders should account to him from the date when intimation of the termination of their lease was made to them. There was, besides, another peculiarity in the Roxburghe case, which appears to have made a strong impression on the Court, viz., that the Duchess had drawn the profits of the quarries through the sub-factor on the estate, and was, therefore, in the language of one of the Judges, entrapped into doing so.

I am unable, therefore, to see anything sufficient in the authorities which were chiefly relied on by the defenders to support their defence to the present action, to the extent, at least, to which it has been urged. On the contrary, it appears to me that their defence has no solid foundation to rest upon, either as regards the facts or the law. They have been wrong throughout. They were wrong in the former action in asserting that the working of the colliery was in all respects unobjectionable, and that the pursuer had in mala fide stated he was dissatisfied in order to accomplish a sinister purpose. And these grounds of defence having been found to be ill-founded in the former action, a new and different one is, for the first time, brought forward in the defenders' second plea in law in the present action, to the effect that "they retained possession of the subjects let in the bona fide belief that the lease could not be terminated without their consent." But this plea the defenders did not even attempt to support at the debate. The result, therefore, is that the defenders must be held to have been unsuccessful in every plea or point put forward or attempted to be made by them throughout the litigation.

In these circumstances, and for the reasons I have now stated, I am of opinion that the defenders ought to be held liable since the date of citation in the former action, which appears, from the messenger's execution of the summons, to have been the 29th of April 1874, when, if not previously, the conscientia rei alienæ on their part must, I think, be held to have commenced, and their bona fides to have ceased. In this way the defenders are allowed nearly three months after the date of the pursuer's intimation to them that their lease had terminated to make all necessary preparations for ceding possession. In place, however, of the defenders being subjected in violent profits, which in its strict technical sense is, I think, inapplicable to the present case, it would, in my judgment, be more consistent with the true circumstances and justice of the case that they should be found liable merely in damages, leaving, of course, the amount to be afterwards ascertained in the course of the process, or, in other words, that they should be found liable in the loss which the pursuer may be able to instruct has been sustained by him in consequence of his having been kept out of possession of the subjects in question since the above mentioned date of citation.

LORD GIFFORD.—As this case has been presented in argument it involves some questions of nicety and difficulty. In particular, we have had a very elaborate and ingenious argument upon that rule of law which entitles a landlord to exact from his tenant penal damages under the name of violent profits in cases where the tenant has wrongfully refused to remove from the subject let, and where, in the eye of law, he has wrongfully or violently retained possession. There has also been much ingenious discussion upon another rule of law under which, in certain cases, a possessor of a subject to which he has no right is nevertheless allowed to retain as his own the fruits of that subject, upon the ground that,

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

although he had no right to the subject, yet he, on reasonable grounds, believed that he had a right, and in that belief received and used as his own the fruits which the subject produced. From considerations of equity, the law holds that, although a bona fide possessor must give up the subject possessed when the true proprietor thereof, or where one having a better title than himself comes forward, yet, as to the bygone fruits or profits thereof which the possessor has received and expended while his bona fides continued, these the bona fide possessor is entitled to retain. Nice questions also arise, and these also, to a considerable extent, have been discussed in the present case, as to the date or period when bona fide possession shall be held to cease, and when the full fruits or profits must be paid or restored to the party really entitled thereto.

The argument on these questions was most interesting, and, to some extent, the Lord Ordinary has entered upon and decided the questions argued; but after very full consideration, I have come to be of opinion with your Lordships that none of these questions really arise in the present case, but that the true rights of the parties, pursuer and defenders, in this action are governed and fall to be regulated by rules much simpler and much better defined—that is to say, by the rules which apply to the enforcement and breach of mutual contracts.

The whole questions depend upon the terms and construction of a mineral lease between the late Mr Houldsworth and the defenders' authors, dated in 1867, and relative agreement, and although, to certain effects, a right of tenancy was thereby created, the real transaction, as has often been remarked, was an actual sale of the minerals, with a right to carry them away, and not a mere right to use an heritable subject salva rei substantia. At all events, the special stipulations upon which the present questions turn are really stipulations in a commercial or mercantile contract, and do not arise from the ordinary or common law relation of landlord and tenant.

The summons in the present case concludes for a slump amount, which, the pursuer says, the defenders are bound to pay him. The amount claimed is stated on record alternatively to be either the amount of violent profits in which the defenders are liable for having illegally maintained possession of the colliery under the lease after the lease had really come to an end, or otherwise the amount of damages in which the defenders are liable for having, in breach of the contract of lease, refused to cede possession when the landlord, in terms of the contract itself, had brought the lease to an end. Accordingly, the pursuer has two alternative pleas—(1) that he is entitled to the sum claimed as violent profits, or (2) that he is entitled thereto in name of damages for breach of contract.

Now, I am of opinion that the second of these alternative pleas embodies the true ground upon which the pursuer's action must rest. I think the only claim which the pursuer can make in the circumstances stated is substantially a claim of damages for breach of contract. I think that the pursuer has relevantly stated such a claim of damages. I am also of opinion that the pursuer has proved the breach of contract by the judgments which have been already pronounced between the parties, and by the admissions on record,—I mean, of course, the admission that the defenders have continued to possess and work the coal subsequent to the period when, as the Court have now finally found, the lease had been validly and effectually terminated by the landlord; and in this view it appears to me that the only question now remaining for decision is the assessment of the damages, if any, which the pursuer has sustained in consequence of the defenders' refusal to give up possession at the date when, in law, the lease came to an end.

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

By the agreement between the parties, dated 5th October 1869, the landlord, the late Mr Houldsworth, stipulated, and the defenders or their authors assented to the stipulation, that in the event of the death of Robert Brand (the tenant) the landlord should have power to resume possession of the colliery at a valuation of the stock and plant, if he should at any time thereafter (that is, after Mr Brand's death) be dissatisfied with the working thereof by Mr Brand's representatives. Admittedly this was a valid and binding contract between the parties, and there never has been any dispute between the parties, nor could there be, that this stipulation is binding upon both parties according to its true intent and meaning, whatever that may be. The only difference between the parties, which, indeed, has formed the subject of the past litigation, is as to the true meaning of this stipulation, and as to whether the landlord did or did not truly terminate the lease in terms thereof. The first question, the construction of the stipulation, is a question of law—the second question is, whether the landlord was really dissatisfied with the working when he gave notice to terminate the lease, and this is a question of fact.

The landlord, acting under the agreement, gave notice of his dissatisfaction on 3d February 1874, and intimated that he was to resume possession, and he called upon Brand's trustees to concur in having the plant and machinery valued and handed over. Brand's trustees resisted this demand, and after some correspondence the landlord on 25th April 1874 raised an action of declarator and removing to enforce his rights.

A great deal of litigation followed, but ultimately it was held, both by the Lord Ordinary and in this Division, that the landlord had right to terminate the lease as he did in February 1874, that the pleas of the defenders were ill-founded, and that the defenders were bound to have ceded possession of the colliery in February 1874, or as soon thereafter as the necessary valuations could be completed. In point of fact, however, and in consequence of the defenders' resistance and ill-founded pleas, the pursuer did not get possession of the colliery till November 1875, the whole works having been carried on till then by the defenders, and the question now is, on the assumption that the pursuer has suffered loss and damage by being excluded from possession, are the defenders liable in reparation?

I am very clearly of opinion that they are, on the simple ground that they have committed a breach of contract by not ceding possession at the time when they were bound to do so. They have deprived the landlord of his stipulated rights—rights which he specially contracted for—and if this has caused loss the defenders must make it good.

It is quite true that the contract in this case was expressed in somewhat doubtful and ambiguous terms, and I am not surprised at the dispute and difference which arose regarding it. Its legal meaning and effect was only determined after a serious litigation, and after very full discussion, but the meaning of the contract has now been judicially determined. The Court has decided that the landlord was entitled to terminate the lease at any time after Mr Robert Brand's death, if he, the landlord, from whatever cause, or even causelessly, should become dissatisfied with the working of the colliery. We have finally decided that the landlord was not bound to shew that the colliery was being or had been improperly worked, or that the conduct of the lessees was in any degree blameable or remiss, or that he, the landlord, had any ground whatever for dissatisfaction. The bare fact that the landlord was dissatisfied was enough, and whenever that dissatisfaction arose he was entitled to terminate the lease. This was the question of law between the parties, and this was finally decided against the mineral tenants.

No. 56.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

In like manner, the other question between the parties—the question of fact—was whether the landlord was really dissatisfied or not, or whether he was only pretending or feigning a dissatisfaction which he did not really feel,—whether, in short, for it came to that, the landlord was fraudulently and in mala fide alleging that he was dissatisfied, when, in truth, he was nothing of the kind, but was, in fact, perfectly satisfied and perfectly pleased with the whole working of the colliery and with the whole actings of his tenants. This question of fact was keenly contested also; a long proof was led, an extensive recovery of private documents and correspondence obtained, and the point was finally decided, both by the Lord Ordinary and by the Court. It is now fixed, by final judgment of the Court, that the landlord was not merely pretending dissatisfaction, but was actually and really dissatisfied, that he was acting throughout in optima fide, and that he was well entitled to terminate the lease in February 1874, and that he validly and effectually did so. Thus both branches of the former litigation terminated in favour of the landlord, and we must now assume that by refusing to cede possession of the colliery in February 1874 the defenders were guilty of breach of contract. This is clear.

Now, it is no defence whatever against an action of damages for breach of contract to say that the contract was a difficult contract to read, or that it reasonably required a litigation to fix its true meaning. Parties have themselves to blame for making contracts of difficult or doubtful interpretation, and the party who is found to be in the wrong must take the consequences. It would never do to allow a party to commit a breach of contract, and then to exempt him from reparation or damages merely because there was a dispute, reasonable or unreasonable, about the contract's meaning. Such a doctrine would lead both to confusion and to injustice, and if we were to sustain the defenders' pleas in the present case it would afford a very good instance of such injustice, for in the present case we are told, and in the present argument we may assume, not only that the landlord, the pursuer, has suffered great loss by being excluded from his colliery for nearly two years, but also that the defenders have made great gain and very large profits by having wrongfully continued to work the colliery during all that period. The landlord may be liable, for aught we know, in serious claims of damage to new tenants, against which he would have no defence. Now, who is to suffer that loss? Surely not the landlord, who has been right throughout in all his contentions, both in law and in fact, but the defenders, who have been wrong in all their contentions—who have relied upon bad law, and upon false, or at least unproved averments in point of fact. It would be giving a premium to litigation, perhaps even to dishonest litigation, to allow the unsuccessful litigant not only to throw the whole loss of a broken contract upon his successful opponent, who from the first was truly reading and rightly observing the contract, but also to pocket the unjust gains which, by means of a groundless litigation, he has succeeded in getting, by defying and breaking his obligations. This would be to reward the man who is wrong at the expense of the man who is right, and to offer a temptation to every

No. 56.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

contractor to get up questions, under cover of which he might, not only without loss, but to his own great gain, repudiate his contract.

I do not think I am trenching in the least upon the doctrine of bona fide possession and fruits in bona fide received and consumed. I am not aware that that doctrine has ever been applied as between contracting parties, and in cases of mutual, and especially of mercantile contracts, and I shrink from giving the doctrine the extension which is now contended for, an extension of which it would be difficult to define either the limits or the consequences. I think the doctrine is totally inapplicable to the present case.

I really do not think it is necessary or relevant to consider whether the defenders, in resisting the landlord's demand (a demand now found to be just), were acting in bona fide or not. Almost all litigants think they are right, and litigants often maintain the most extravagant views in optima fide; so far as their own conscience is concerned—they honestly think they are right—but this is nothing to the purpose. If they have bound themselves to do something and fail to do it they will be liable in damages, however honestly or innocently they have been mistaken or misadvised as to what their obligation was. Honest mistake or misapprehension is no defence to an action for breach of contract, and the honesty of a bad defence does not even save the litigant from having to pay the whole expenses of the litigation. Bona fides, therefore, seems to me to have really nothing to do with the question. It is now fixed that the defenders were bound, legally bound, to have ceded possession of the colliery in February 1874; they resisted doing so till November 1875. They were wrong, legally wrong; and whatever they thought, they must make good the actual loss and damage which their wrongful act has caused to the pursuer.

At the same time I cannot help adding, that looking to the nature of the pleas upon which the defenders relied in maintaining possession of the colliery, I do not think they are in a very favourable position, to say the least of it, for now alleging bona fides. Their main plea was that the landlord was in mala fide in resuming the colliery. They said that he was only pretending dissatisfaction with the working, but that he was not really dissatisfied. In short, they maintained that the landlord was making a fraudulent use of the provision which enabled him to resume possession; and this allegation of fraud against the landlord—for it was nothing less—is the allegation by means of which they have succeeded in keeping the landlord out of his rights for nearly two years. It is rather strong in the defenders to say, after entirely failing in this allegation of fraud,—Oh! we made the allegation in bona fide, and therefore we shall not only keep the lucrum and profits which our false allegation has enabled us to make in the meantime, but we will leave the landlord himself to bear the loss which he has sustained by our wrongful breach of contract.

Suppose the landlord, after giving the notice to the defenders which it has now been held validly terminated the lease, had let the colliery to a new tenant, and undertaken to give possession to the new tenant at the next term: If he failed to do so he would be liable in damages to the new tenant, and it would be no defence that he was prevented from doing so by the bona fide resistance of the present defenders. It seems plain, also, that if the present defenders were wrong in maintaining possession, however much they acted in good faith, they must relieve the pursuer of the damages which he would be subjected in to his new tenant, who had been wrongously kept out. In short, I think I may say that, when breach of contract has been committed and damages result, the bona fides or honest belief of the party who commits the breach can never excuse him from making good the loss.

No. 56. Jan. 8, 1876. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the defenders, having wrongfully retained possession of the colliery in question after the period at which they were bound to remove, are liable to the pursuers in reparation for such injury as has been thereby occasioned to him: And before farther answer, allow a proof to both parties in regard to the amount of damages thereby incurred: Find the defenders liable in expenses since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against, reserving in the meantime all other questions of expenses."

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 57. Jan. 8, 1876. Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

JAMES HENDERSON SENIOR'S TRUSTEES, First Parties.—M'Laren—Innes.
MRS MARY WATSON or HENDERSON (James Henderson junior's General Disponee), Second Party.—M'Laren—Innes.
MRS AGNES WOOD or HENDERSON and OTHERS (David Henderson senior's Trustees), Third Parties.—M'Laren—Innes.
MRS AGNES WOOD OR HENDERSON (John Gray Henderson's Universal Legatee), Fourth Party.—M'Laren—Innes.
MRS AGNES WOOD OR HENDERSON AND ANOTHER (David Henderson junior and Janetta Henderson's Tutors), Fifth Parties.—Lee—Moncreiff.

Succession—Testament—Vesting.—A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow out of the free income of his estate an annuity of £150, and to divide the surplus annual income of his whole estate equally among his three sons nominatim, the lawful issue of any deceasing being entitled to their parent's share. He further directed his trustees to divide the residue equally among his three sons "or the survivors of them, at such times and in such manner" as his trustees might think proper.

Held that the residue vested in the sons at the testator's death.

Succession—Testament—Implied Direction to Convey.—The testator further directed his trustees on the death of his widow "to hold for and pay over to" his eldest son, whom failing, to his lawful children, equally among them, the free rents of a special heritable subject. After a similar provision for each of his two younger sons the testator directed that in the event of any of his sons dying and leaving issue the trustees should "hold and apply the free annual rents of the property hereby directed to be conveyed to such of my said sons for behoof of such child or children" until the youngest attained the age of twenty-one, when the property should be conveyed to or divided among such children equally.

Held (diss. Lord Gifford) that there was an implied direction to convey the three properties to the testator's three sons respectively in fee, and that their right vested at the testator's death.

D DIVISION. R.

JAMES HENDERSON senior died on 28th May 1869, leaving a trust-settlement conveying his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for, inter alia, the following purposes, viz.,—"In the third place, in the event of my said spouse surviving me, I direct my said trustees to pay to her an annuity of £150 sterling, payable out of the free income of my said estates, heritable and moveable: . . . . In the fourth place, I direct and appoint my said trustees, after fulfilling the provisions contained in the first, second, and third articles hereof, and after making provision for . . . . and all other disbursements during the lifetime of my said spouse, to divide the surplus annual income of all of my said heritable and moveable estates equally among my children aftermentioned, and that at such times and

No. 57.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

in such manner as to them may seem proper, and in the event of the death of any one or more of my said children, leaving lawful issue, such lawful issue shall be entitled to receive the share of said surplus which would have fallen to his or her parent had such parent survived; and upon the death of my said spouse, or, should she predecease me, upon my decease, my said trustees shall hold for and pay over to my said son, James Henderson, whom failing, to his lawful children, equally between or among them, the free rents, after deducting interest on bonds and all other charges of that tenement of land belonging to me, situated in Florence Street, Hutchesontown, Glasgow; and in the said event I also direct and appoint my said trustees"—(then followed similar special provisions in favour of the testator's sons, David Henderson and John Gray Henderson, and their children, with reference respectively to two other separate heritable properties, one in William Street, Anderston, Glasgow, and the other in Albert Drive, Queen's Park, Glasgow):—"Farther, I hereby authorise and empower my said trustees either to collect the rents of said respective properties or to appoint a factor to do so, or to allow each or any of my said sons to collect the rents of and manage the properties in which they are respectively interested, and that so long as my said trustees may think proper.

"In the fifth place, in the event of any of my said sons dying leaving a child or children I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees to hold and apply the free annualrents of the property hereby directed to be conveyed to such of my said sons, for behoof of such child or children, until the youngest of them shall attain the age of twenty-one years complete, when the property shall be conveyed to, or, in the option of my said trustees, sold, and the free proceeds thereof, after deducting expenses, sums secured on bond over said property, and expenses, shall be divided equally amongst them if more than one; declaring, however, that in the event of any of my said beneficiaries predeceasing me without leaving lawful issue, the share and interest in my said estates which would have fallen to such beneficiary is hereby declared to form part of the residue of my said estates, and shall be divided as after-mentioned. In the sixth place, in the event of the said John Gray Henderson surviving me, I direct and appoint my said trustees, at my death, to assign, dispone, convey, and make over to him a bond and disposition in security, granted in my favour by William Weir, builder in Glasgow, for £400. . . . . In the seventh place, I direct and appoint my said trustees to divide the residue of my said heritable and moveable estate equally amongst my said children, or the survivors of them, at such times and in such manner as my said trustees may think proper."

The testator left a widow, Mrs Agnes Wood or Henderson, and three sons, James Henderson junior, David Henderson senior, and John Gray Henderson.

James Henderson senior's estate consisted of the three heritable properties specially disposed of under provisions four and five of his settlement, and of another heritable property acquired after the date of his settlement, together with certain moveable funds.

In consequence of the death of all James Henderson senior's sons before their mother certain questions arose amongst their representatives with regard to their interest in his succession.

The first set of questions turned upon the period of vesting of the residue of the trust estate. The first four parties to this special case, being the trustees of James Henderson senior, and the representatives of his three sons, contended that the residue of James Henderson senior's estate vested a morte testatoris; the fifth parties contended that it did not vest

No. 57. Jan. 8, 1876. Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

until the death of the testator's widow. The Court ordered this question to be first argued.[1]

At advising on 11th December 1875,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The solution of the questions laid before the Court in this special case depends on the construction of a complicated and imperfect settlement, and one not easy to be interpreted. The first of these questions,—namely, whether the residue of the testator's trust-estate vested at his death, or whether vesting is postponed till the death of his widow,—depends on a general view of the instrument as a whole, and on the conclusions to be drawn therefrom.

Now, the scope of the deed is as follows:—Mr Henderson, the testator, had two purposes in view,—firstly, to provide for his widow, and secondly, to provide for his three sons. That is, shortly, the object of the deed. But the mode in which it is carried out is very complicated. Mr Henderson first provides an annuity of £150, which is largely within the income of the trust-estate, to his widow; and he also makes a special provision for one son, John Gray Henderson. Then, as regards the remainder of the income and of the capital, he directs his trustees to divide the surplus income among his children, and the issue of any deceasing, and that at such times and in such manner as to them may seem proper; and after separately disposing of three special subjects, to divide the residue equally among his children, or the survivors of them, at such times and in such manner as they, the trustees, may think proper.

Now, the question is, did this provision of residue vest at the death of the testator, or does it not vest until the death of the widow?

In the general case it may be said, first, that in mortis causa deeds the presumption is for vesting a morte testatoris; second, that this presumption is not necessarily overcome by the interposition of a liferent; third, that vesting a morte testatoris is more readily presumed where there are no ulterior interests provided for either directly or contingently.

In my opinion in the case of Elliot v. Bowhill (June 21, 1873, 11 Macph. 735, 45 Scot. Jur. 446) I made reference to two judgments of considerable importance, that of Lord Corehouse in the case of Forbes v. Luckie (Jan. 26, 1838, 16 S. 374, 10 Scot. Jur. 227), and that of Lord Moncreiff in the case of Provan (Jan. 14, 1840, 2 D. 298, 12 Scot. Jur. 257). I quote that of Lord Corehouse again, in order to compare it with the most recent exposition of the law in the House of Lords. His Lordship says,—"I do not think that the fee of the residue was prevented from vesting in these children, either by the circumstance that the term of paying to each child its respective share was postponed until after the death of the liferentrix who survived the testator, or by the circumstance that a trust by executors was interposed for carrying into effect

[1] Authorities referred to.—Laing v. Barclay, July 20, 1865, 3 Macph. 1143, 38 Scot. Jur. 95; Leighton v. Leighton, March 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 561, 39 Scot. Jur. 283; Graham's Trustees v. Graham, May 26, 1868, 6 Macph. 820, 40 Scot. Jur. 452; Aitken's Trustee v. Wright, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 275, 44 Scot. Jur. 164; Jamieson v. Allardice, May 30, 1872, 10 Macph. 755; Allan's Trustees v. Allan, Dec. 12, 1872, 11 Macph. 216, 45 Scot. Jur. 144; Elliot v. Bowhill, June 21, 1873, 11 Macph. 735, 45 Scot. Jur. 446; Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, 24 D. (H. of L.) 1, 34 Scot. Jur. 270, 4 Macq. 314.

the intentions of the testator, or finally, by the circumstance that the bequest of the residue was conceived in favour of a class of persons, and not in favour of certain individuals nominatim."

Now, the last expression of opinion on the general canons of construction in such cases is to be found in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Millar v. Finlay's Trustees (Feb. 25, 1875, ante, vol. ii. H. of L. 1). His Lordship says,—"It also accords with that which now has been in this country a cardinal rule of construction, namely, that where you find interests given to a class, but the payment postponed for the purpose of letting in preceding life-interests, the interests so given in remainder are vested immediately, and are not postponed until the time of the payment." Therefore we may take that general rule of construction to have been finally settled.

The opinion of Lord Moncreiff in the case of Provan has also a material bearing on this case with reference to the point of ulterior interest. He says,—"Where there is no such ulterior substitution the principle adopted has been that the right vests though the term of payment is postponed."

I may add that in regard to interposed interests, such as liferents, the question always is, whether there is any person other than the liferenter himself in whose interest vesting is postponed till the death of the liferenter. If there is not, postponement of the vesting is not necessary, and is not to be presumed.

Lastly, where the sole interposed interest is not a liferent so as to exhaust the annual revenue, but only a burden on the annual revenue, the presumption in favour of vesting becomes still stronger. These general principles do not admit of doubt.

In some respects the present is a strong case for their application in favour of vesting. As regards the form which the provisions of the deed take, whatever the object of postponing the term of payment may have been, there were no ulterior objects to be benefited by it. Neither is the question of vesting affected by the provisions, such as they are, in regard to the predecease of the children. In the second place, the widow's annuity fell far short of the annual produce of the estate. And, lastly, the residuary clause is conceived in favour of the children and of no other parties whatsoever.

Had these been the only elements for consideration I should have had no doubt as to the vesting. But there are two other points which raise a certain amount of difficulty. There is, first, the provision in the fourth purpose for the distribution of the accruing income. Now, that income was to be the surplus income of the whole estate, including the special subjects afterwards disposed of after paying the widow's annuity. The terms of the provision are as follows:—(Reads fourth purpose of settlement, quoted supra, p. 320). Now, unquestionably, that looks at first sight as if the trustees were to retain the whole corpus of the estate during the life of the widow, and merely to divide any surplus revenue. And the provision that in the event of the death of any of the children leaving lawful issue, such issue should be entitled to the share of the surplus income which would have fallen to the deceasing parent, would imply that otherwise a child dying during the period of distribution of the surplus income, that is, during the widow's life, would not transmit his share of income to his issue. This would introduce an element of great difficulty, were it not that throughout the deed where the death or predecease of the children is spoken of it is predecease of the testator that is meant.

But the main difficulty arises from the provision in the residue clause itself,

No. 57.
an. 8, 1876.
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

—"I direct and appoint my said trustees to divide the residue of my said heritable and moveable estate equally amongst my said children, or the survivors of them, at such times and in such manner as my said trustees may think proper." Now, it is a general principle, acknowledged in England, that where there are words of survivorship adjected to a residue clause they must be held to apply to the time of distribution, unless it is clear that they apply to the death of the testator. Decisions on the point have varied, but it is now fixed by the judgment in Young v. Robertson, Feb. 14, 1862, H. L., 4 Macq., 314—(See Lord Chancellor's judgment). If, then, that rule applies, the words of the residue clause point in favour of postponement of vesting. It was accordingly argued very strongly that the trustees were bound to divide the residue at the widow's death, and that the survivorship clause applied to that period. To that argument I cannot give effect. I think the survivorship clause applies, and can only apply to the death of the testator, because I think it was in the power of the trustees to make a division at any time after the death of the testator that they thought proper. Now, if the trustees had thought proper at the death of the testator to divide the whole moveable estate, leaving the heritable property to answer the widow's annuity, I see nothing in the deed to prevent them. If they could, then there can be no doubt that the moveable estate vested a morte testatoris. In this view the terms of the deed are sufficient to take the case out of the general rule of law above stated.

I am therefore for finding that the residue of the trust estate vested a morte testatoris.

Lord Ormidale and Lord Gifford also held that the right to residue vested at the testator's death.

Lord Neaves was absent.

Parties were subsequently heard upon the remaining question,—"Did the three subjects specially destined (in the 4th and 5th purposes) vest in the testator's sons respectively a morte testatoris?"

At advising on 8th January 1876,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case we have already decided that the residue of the trust-estate vested a morte testatoris, and consequently that the residue is divisible among the representatives of the three sons who have deceased.

The question now remains with regard to the three heritable subjects specially destined, whether they also vested a morte testatoris.

Our finding that the residue vested a morte testatoris has a considerable bearing on this question, for it is not easy to see what grounds there are for arriving at the conclusion that the testator intended to fix a period of vesting for these special subjects different from that appointed for the residue of his estate.

There are two views which may be taken on this point. The first is that these special subjects vested, like the residue, a morte testatoris. The second is that nothing but a liferent was provided to the children of the testator, and that the fee was intended to vest in their children, the testator's grandchildren, and, in the event of any of the testator's children having no issue, then to fall either into residue or intestacy. Neither of these views is free from difficulty and uncertainty. But I have come to the conclusion that the real intention of the

No. 57.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

testator was that those special subjects should vest as at his death, and that all the other provisions were made simply with a view of meeting the contingency of any of his sons predeceasing him.

The provision with regard to the first of these special subjects is as follows :—"Upon the death of my said spouse, or, should she predecease me, upon my decease, my said trustees shall hold for and pay over to my said son James Henderson, whom failing, to his lawful children, equally between or among them, the free rents, after deducting interest on bonds and all other charges, of that tenement of land belonging to me situated in Florence Street, Hutchesontown, Glasgow." Now, I am of opinion that that clause contains the whole provisions with regard to this particular subject, as events have turned out. The question is whether that is a provision of fee to the individual sons, or whether it only gives them a liferent. If it does not give a liferent allenarly it manifestly gives a fee. True, there are no words of direct conveyance of the fee. But this is not material or conclusive. The real intention of the testator, as I gather it from the deed generally, and from the analogy of the clause of distribution of the surplus income, and of the residue clause, was to leave a wide discretion in the hands of the trustees as to the time of payment or conveyance, and that that is the explanation of the absence of any express direction to convey.

The trustees are directed to hold for and pay over the free rents. Under this direction they could convey at any time after the widow's death. Then, there is a conditional institution, "to my said son James Henderson, whom failing, to his lawful children," which appears to me wholly irreconcileable with the idea that the sons are only to have a liferent. In the event of James Henderson failing, that is, predeceasing the testator, the trustees were to hold for his children as conditional institutes.

That is the view which I take of the clause disposing of these special subjects. What follows refers solely to circumstances which have not emerged,—"In the fifth place, in the event of any of my said sons dying leaving a child or children, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees to hold and apply the free annual rents of the property hereby directed to be conveyed to such of my said sons, for behoof of such child or children, until the youngest of them shall attain the age of twenty-one years complete, when the property shall be conveyed to, or, in the option of my said trustees, sold, and the free proceeds thereof . . . . shall be divided equally amongst them if more than one." Now, has that event happened? I think not. The event in which that direction was to take effect was the death of the son, leaving issue, before the death of the testator. But this is put beyond all doubt by the second limb of the clause,—"Declaring, however, that in the event of any of my said beneficiaries predeceasing me without leaving lawful issue the share and interest in my said estates which would have fallen to such beneficiary is hereby declared to form part of the residue of my said estates, and shall be divided as after-mentioned." Therefore, reading the whole clause together it is, I think, clear that the testator's intention was that if his sons failed, that is, predeceased him, leaving issue, that issue was to step in and the trustees were to hold till the youngest attained twenty-one—that if his sons failed without leaving issue the properties destined to them respectively were to fall into residue—but that if his sons survived him they were to take as from his death, though the conveyance was postponed till the death of his widow.

No. 57.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

The other contention, that the sons were only to enjoy a liferent, involves this absurdity, that the trustees must go on holding even though there may be no fiar—and this though the general provision of residue is to vest a morte testatoris. The testator, I think, contemplated nothing of the kind, and, accordingly, although without disguising the difficulty I have experienced in coming to a conclusion, I am of opinion that these special subjects vested the same as the residue, a morte testatoris.

LORD ORMIDALE.—It having been already held by the Court, in answer to the first query, that the residue of Mr Henderson senior's estate vested at his death, the second, third, and fourth queries are thereby superseded.

In regard to the fifth question, I am of opinion that the subjects to which it refers as specially destined vested in the testator's sons respectively a morte testatoris. I am unable to see how any other conclusion can be come to consistently with the fact that all of the testator's sons survived him, and with the declaration in the fifth purpose of the testator's settlement to the effect that "in the event of any of my said beneficiaries predeceasing me without leaving lawful issue the share and interests in my said estates which would have fallen to such beneficiary is hereby declared to form part of the residue of my said estates, and shall be divided as after-mentioned." According to this declaration it was only in the event of his sons, or any of them, predeceasing the testator that the subjects in question were intended by the testator to fall into and be divided as residue; but as no such event happened, that is to say, as none of his sons predeceased the testator, none of the subjects specially destined to them can be held to have fallen into and to be divisible as residue. But then it was objected, as I understood the argument for some of the parties, that there was no express destination at all of the fee of the subjects referred to, and in a literal sense this is true, for undoubtedly the testator's settlement is defective in that respect. Having regard, however, to the whole scope and tenor of the settlement, and particularly its fourth and fifth purposes, I think that on the principle of implied, if not of express destination, it must be held that the three sons had right respectively to the fee or corpus of the special subjects in question. This view is supported and illustrated by various cases which are referred to by Mr M'Laren in his work on Wills, p. 327, et seq. On any other footing the result would be that the fee of the special subjects in question must be held as undisposed of altogether by the testator, and to constitute intestate succession, a result which is not to be arrived at if it can on any reasonable ground be avoided.

LORD GIFFORD.—At the former advising of this case, on 11th December last, the final judgment of the Court was that the general residue of the trust-estate of James Henderson senior vested a morte testatoris,—that is, immediately on the death of the truster one-third of that general residue then vested in each of the three sons who survived the testator, and this must now be taken to be the law of the will in question.

This cardinal point having been fixed, we had an additional argument on the remaining points of the case, especially as these were affected by the decision as to the vesting of the residue, and in the course of the argument both parties found it necessary to remodel the questions put in the special case, so as really to obtain from the Court available and practical rules to regulate the distribution of the estate. The amended questions now before the Court have been sustained and substituted for those originally put.

No. 57.

Jan. 8, 1876.
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

The first four questions, as they now stand, are already answered by the decision formerly pronounced. As the general residue (whatever that general residue may ultimately embrace or consist of) vested a morte testatoris, then there was no lapsing of that residue by the sons having predeceased the widow, and the partial distribution already made by the trustees is valid and effectual.

The remaining five questions as put in the amended case relate to difficulties as to what subjects do and what subjects do not fall under the general residue of the testator's estate, and as to the special bequests and special provisions of heritable subjects contained in the trust-deed, as to which, or as to some of which, it is doubtful what is to become of them, or whether they have lapsed into the general residue or not. The chief of these special legacies, or special provisions, are the three separate heritages specially destined in the deed.

Now, in reference to these three special heritable subjects, I am sorry that I have found myself unable to concur in the view taken by your Lordships. I am of opinion that as special bequests, or special provisions, these special heritages did not vest in the three sons of the testator at the testator's death. As I read the deed, the subjects are not given to the testator's sons at all. All that the testator gives to his sons is the rents of these special subjects after his widow's death. The fee of the property is not given to the sons; on the contrary, the trustees are specially directed to hold and to pay the rents even after the death of the respective sons, and to continue to apply the rents, but still only the rents, for behoof of the lawful children of each son, and that until the youngest of such children respectively,—that is, of the three families of grandchildren respectively,—shall attain the age of twenty-one. It is only when this event happens,—the majority of the youngest grandchild,—that the fee of these special subjects is disposed of, for it is only then that the properties are to be conveyed to the respective families of grandchildren, or to be sold and the proceeds divided among them.

Now, I do not think that this bequest or provision gave anything whatever to the immediate sons of the testator, excepting an interim right to rents. I view the fee as provided conditionally to the grandchildren, and to them alone. I think the provisions, so far as concerns the fee of the special heritages, are really conditional bequests to the testator's grandchildren, and to the grandchildren alone,—conditional, that is, if there should be any child of the respective sons alive when the time of payment, or of conveyance, shall arrive, and as there is interposed all the machinery of an effectual subsisting trust I think a bequest or provision of this nature is quite valid.

It is true that a bequest or provision to a father in liferent, and to his unborn children in fee, vests an instant fee in the father, and the children take nothing but a bare spes successionis, unless there be some restrictive words, such as "liferent allenarly," which restrict the father's right and exclude him from the fee. But this is a somewhat arbitrary rule, introduced from a supposed necessity that a fee cannot be in pendente, but must instantly vest somewhere, and the rule only applies to cases where there is a conveyance or disposition to the father himself in liferent. It has never been applied to cases where there is no conveyance at all to the father, but where a subject is vested in trustees who are directed to hold and keep it, and to pay the rents for a time, or for his lifetime, to a father, and only upon the father's death, or upon some other event mentioned, to convey the fee to his children. A direction like this has always been held equivalent to restrictive words—the arbitrary rule has no place, and the intention of the testator receives effect, which is, that the father shall only receive the rents, and shall have no power to defeat his children's right to the fee.

No. 57.
Jan. 8, 1876.
Henderson's Trustees v. Henderson.

If, therefore, all Mr Henderson's three sons had survived, and were yet alive, I should say that these three special subjects had vested in none of them, that none of the sons had right to defeat the rights of the grandchildren, and that the fee was vested in the trustees for behoof of the grandchildren if they should survive the appointed time of conveyance.

But all the sons, although they survived the testator, have now deceased, two of them without issue, and the third son leaving two children. I am of opinion that by the death without issue of the two sons who left no issue the special subjects destined to them have lapsed and fallen into residue. The fee of these two special subjects was intended for and given to grandchildren who have never existed, and who now can never exist. The condition, therefore, has failed; the provision is simply a lapsed legacy, and the subject of it falls, not into intestacy—for there is a general and universal settlement—but into residue, just like other lapsed legacies. As to the third subject,—as David, the third son, has left issue, I am of opinion that the trustees must continue to hold for David's children, and in exact terms of the deed. They must convey to these children, or sell for their behoof, when the youngest of them attains majority, and not till then. The result is that, in my opinion, two of the special subjects have fallen into residue, and belong with it, one-third to those in right of each son. The third special subject must be held still for David's children. I regret, therefore, to be obliged to differ from your Lordships.

Lord Neaves was absent.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find, 1st, that under the settlement of James Henderson senior the residue of his estates vested at his death; 2d, that the three subjects specially destined vested in the testator's sons respectively a morte testatoris."

M'Ewen & Carment, W.S.—Wilson & Dunlop, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58.
Jan. 13, 1876.
Gibson and Stewart v. Brown and Co.

Gibson and Stewart, Petitioners.—Asher—Brand.
Brown and Company, Respondents.—Balfour—Jameson.

Contract—Compensation—Damages—Petition for Sale.—A storekeeper received a quantity of corn from a merchant to be stored. There was no written contract. After re-delivering the greater part, the storekeeper retained the remainder, and presented a petition to the Sheriff for warrant to sell it, and apply the proceeds towards payment of warehouse rent and storage charges for the corn, which the merchant refused to pay. The merchant stated as a counter claim damage to a greater amount done to the corn re-delivered, owing to the neglect of the storekeeper. The counter claim for damage having been restricted to the amount of the petitioners' claim, held that it might competently be stated as a set off, both claims being rested on stipulations of the same implied contract, and objection that it was an attempt to set off an illiquid against a liquid claim repelled.

Question, Whether, if one of the stipulations had been in writing, but not the other, the one could have been set off against the other.

Question, whether a larger counter claim could have been partly set off and partly reserved.

No. 58.

Jan. 13, 1876.

Gibson and Stewart v. Brown and Co.

1ST DIVISION.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

M.

Compensation.—Held that the petition for warrant to sell the respondents' goods and to appropriate the proceeds was, as regarded the plea of compensation, in the same position as a petitory action for payment of money.

THIS was a petition to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire by Gibson and Stewart, storekeepers, Glasgow, against Brown and Company, starch manufacturers there. It set forth that in June and July 1872 the petitioners received into their stores 2000 bolls of Indian corn from the respondents, of which 1792 bolls had been re-delivered; that the respondents were owing storage charges to the petitioners for receiving, hoisting, turning and weighing the corn, amounting in all to £111, which they refused to pay; and the petition prayed for warrant to sell the remainder of the corn, and to apply the proceeds pro tanto in liquidation of the charges.

The respondents did not deny that the charges were reasonable, but stated that the corn which had been re-delivered was damaged to the extent of £125 by the petitioners' failure duly to turn it, and otherwise take sufficient care in storing it.

They pleaded;—(2) The said corn having, through the fault of the petitioners, been damaged to the extent of at least £125, they are liable therefor; and the respondents are entitled to deduct the same from the rent and charges due to them.

The petitioners pleaded;—(1) The petitioners have a right of lien or retention over the goods in question in their possession for the rent and charges applicable to the whole parcel stored. (2) The claim of damage stated in the defences is illiquid, and cannot be set off against the petitioners' claim for rent and charges.

The corn was sold of consent, reserving the rights of parties.

The Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof, and found that the respondents had failed to prove their counter claim of damages.

On appeal, the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the grain in question was stored in the pursuers' stores for the time specified in the petition, and that their proper charges therefor are £111, 4s. 10d.: Finds that it was the pursuers' duty to have said grain properly stored and turned while in their hands, but that they failed in that duty, in consequence of which the grain deteriorated in quality and value, and the defenders suffered loss to an extent equal to, if not greater, than the pursuers' said claim: Therefore sustains the defences to that extent and effect: Finds that the pursuers were not justified in refusing to deliver the portion of the said grain which they retained under their lien for store charges, and that the price thereof falls to be paid to the defenders: Accordingly appoints the clerk of the Court to pay to them the sum consigned: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses," &c.

The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the petitioners;—It was incompetent to set off an illiquid against a liquid claim.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—This was a case of failure to fulfil one of the stipulations of a mutual and entire contract, and damages arising from that failure might be pleaded as a counter claim to the petitioners' claim founded on other stipulations of the same contract.[2] The cases

[1] Scottish North-Eastern Railway Coy. v. Napier, March 10, 1859, 21 D. 700, 31 Scot. Jur. 350; Mackie v. Riddell, Nov. 20, 1874, ante, vol. ii. 115.

[2] Taylor v. Forbes, Dec. 2, 1830, 9 S. 113, 3 Scot. Jur. 67; Stewart v. Campbell, Nov. 12, 1834, 13 S. 7, 7 Scot. Jur. 30; Johnston v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. 646, 33 Scot. Jur. 335; Macbride v. Hamilton and Son, June 11, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 775.

No. 58.
Jan. 13, 1876.
Gibson and Stewart v. Brown and Co.

quoted on the other side were cases of two separate contracts. The prayer of the petition was more comprehensive than the conclusions of a petitory action, but it contained all the elements of a petitory action.

The respondents by minute restricted their counter claim for damages to £111, 4s. 10d., the amount of the petitioners' claim.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no real difficulty in this case when it is thoroughly examined, but it belongs to a class of cases which raise points of some delicacy, and therefore we found it necessary to have a full argument.

The petitioners are storekeepers, and the respondents are merchants who import grain. In June and July 1872 the respondents delivered at the storekeepers' premises two thousand bolls of Indian corn for the purpose of being stored. There was no written contract, and no express verbal contract, but the act of delivery created an implied contract, for the terms of which we must resort to the usage of trade and the ordinary rate of charges.

Accordingly, we find it is not disputed on the one hand that the storekeepers were entitled to charge for receiving the corn at the rate of 5s. per hundred bolls, for hoisting 3s., 1s. 6d. for turning the grain every time it was turned, also to make certain charges for weighing the grain when it was delivered out, and for warehouse rent.

On the other hand, the petitioners were bound to take due care for the safe custody and proper treatment of the grain, and under the head of proper treatment is included turning it, in order to prevent its heating or becoming injured. Thus the contract has its terms settled by usage merely. Therefore a claim on the one side or the other founded on breach of the contract depends on proof of usage, and could not be otherwise established unless admitted, and if the storekeeper brings an action it is open to the merchant to dispute his charges.

If this were an action for payment, the pursuer would be put to prove his case, and, in the same way, if the merchant were to allege in such an action as he does here that the storekeeper has not done his part, but ill-treated the grain by omitting to turn it, and in other respects, that claim of damages arising out of the same mutual contract would constitute a good counter claim which could be pleaded by the defender.

The peculiarity of this case is that it is a petition to enforce a lien or right of retention. The petitioners have retained a portion of the corn, and they ask that it should be sold, and the proceeds applied in extinction pro tanto of their claim.

At first sight this does create considerable embarrassment, and the embarrassment which is caused by the form of procedure is aggravated by the circumstance that the claim of damages exceeds the claim of the petitioners.

The Sheriff appears to have thought that the one claim might be set against the other without ascertaining the amount of the counter claim, beyond the fact that it was at least equal to the petitioners' demand.

But this difficulty has been removed to some extent now that the respondents have restricted their claim of damages to the amount of the petitioners' demand, discharging all farther claim.

That being so, and looking to the fact that the prayer of the petition, though it takes the form of asking for a warrant to sell, would operate, if granted, payment in money of their claim, I do not see sufficient ground for making a

No. 58.
Jan. 13, 1876.
Gibson and Stewart v. Brown and Co.

distinction between the question as it arises here, and in a proper petitory action. If I am right in that, and if it is clear that the two claims arise out of stipulations in the same mutual contract, the only question remaining in point of law is, whether the law applicable to cases of express contract is equally applicable where all the terms of the contract are ascertained by usage merely.

On full consideration, I do not find any sufficient reason for drawing a distinction. If, on the one side, the stipulations were express, while on the other they arose only by implication, the matter would have been much more doubtful, but here both the claims stand in the same position in that respect.

Then, if the claim be competent, I do not think there can be much difficulty on the merits. The grain has been injured, and I am of opinion that the respondents have proved that the damage was caused by the failure of the petitioners to perform the duty which lay upon them under the contract. I am therefore for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD DEAS.—No doubt there is here a little embarrassment at first sight in consequence of the peculiar form of the procedure. But it is more apparent than real. The application to the Sheriff set forth that certain charges were due to the petitioners in connection with the corn which had been stored with them, and that they had a lien for these charges over the portion of the corn which still remained with them, and what was craved was warrant to sell the corn and to apply the proceeds towards liquidation of the charges. In that way it was just equivalent to a petitory action for payment of the money. And this is made still more clear when we see that on 21st May 1873 the plea that the application was incompetent was repelled as not being insisted in, and on 30th June same year warrant to sell the grain was granted of consent, so that nothing remained but the question whether the petitioners were entitled to uplift and apply the price in payment of their charges. Then there comes the question whether the fact that the whole contract arises on implication makes any difference in the applicability of the rule, that before a party can insist on implement of a mutual contract he must fulfil his own part of it. I think there is no such difference. It is true that the respondents admit some of the charges, and that comes near to making them liquid, while the claim for damages is illiquid. But although they admit the charges for receiving, hoisting, and weighing, they do not admit the charges for turning and storage, which form the main portions of the dispute.

As to the fact that the claim for damage is in excess of the petitioners' claim, I do not wish it to be understood that I think any difficulty would arise from that circumstance. However, the respondents have restricted their counter claim, so it is unnecessary to go into that point.

On the merits of the claim of damages I agree with your Lordship.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—On the merits, apart from the legal plea, I have nothing to add to what has been already stated. As to the question whether the respondents' plea of compensation can be competently stated, I think that if the claim of the petitioners (whose position is equivalent to that of pursuers) had rested on a written contract which liquidated their claim, then the respondents could not have pleaded compensation against the claim so liquidated, unless the written contract contained elements which brought out the grounds of the compensatory plea. But the petitioners have no ground of action resting on writing.

No. 58.
Jan. 13, 1876.
Gibson and Stewart v. Brown and Co.

They have to prove the terms of the contract, which was not a written one, and in that state of matters the other party, who says it was part of the same contract (and that is not denied), that the storekeeper should keep the grain with such care that it should not be injured, must be entitled to prove it and to plead it. The respondents allege that the grain has not been carefully kept in store, and has been damaged in consequence.

I cannot doubt that they are entitled to state a plea to that effect in defence. Whether the respondents could have pleaded their claim of damages as a defence to the extent of the petitioners' claim, and have reserved it to the extent that it exceeded that claim, is a question which it is not necessary here to decide. I understand that the respondents do not press their claim beyond the demand by the petitioners.

LORD MURE.—This is a case of mutual contract, and the only difference between it and the cases which have been referred to in support of the competency of here pleading compensation is that these were cases of express written contract, which the present is not. But I agree with your Lordship that that does not make any difference in the application of the rule, which is equally applicable to verbal contracts when they are distinctly set forth and proved.

3 Sm. 67

This case appears to me to be in substance identical with that of Taylor v. Forbes, and must, I think, be ruled by that decision. For the pursuers, as storekeepers, are in no different position from the owner of a ship who stores corn in his ship. Now, it was there laid down that the plea of set off in respect of damage done to a cargo by defective stowage was competent against a liquid claim for freight, and in that respect the present respondents are in a more favourable position than the defenders were in the case of Taylor, because the rent and charges here claimed were not liquid at the time of closing the record. I see, moreover, that the amount of damages in the case of Taylor was greater than the claim for freight, so that, in this respect also, the case is an authority in favour of what the Sheriff has done.

On the merits, I have no difficulty in concurring.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the grain in question was stored in the petitioners' (appellants') stores for the period specified in the petition, and that their proper charges therefor are £111, 4s. 10d.: Find that it was the duty of the petitioners to have said grain properly stored and turned while in their hands, but that they failed in that duty, in consequence of which the grain deteriorated in quality and value: Find that the respondents suffered loss thereby, which they are entitled to set off as a counter claim in compensation of the petitioners' said claim: Find that the respondents by the said minute, No. 31 of process, have restricted their counter claim for said loss to the sum of £111, 4s. 10d., which is held to be the full amount thereof, and, being of the same amount as the petitioners' said claim, there remains no balance due to or by either party in connection with said storage: Find, in these circumstances, that the petitioners were not justified in refusing to deliver the portion of the said grain which they retained under their lien for store charges: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses," &c.

DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876.

Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

THE SCOTTISH HERITABLE SECURITY COMPANY (LIMITED), Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Keir.

ALLAN, CAMPBELL, AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Kinnear—H. Johnston.

Poinding the Ground—Right in Security—Ex facie absolute Disposition.—Held that a creditor holding a recorded ex facie absolute disposition to lands belonging to his debtor was not entitled to use the diligence of poinding of the ground although he had granted a back-letter declaring that he held the lands merely in security for his debt, his relation to the lands being that of a feudal proprietor and not of a creditor, and there being no debitum fundi.

Observed, that the recording of the back-letter in the Register of Sasines would not have altered the creditor's position as feudal proprietor of the lands.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THE SCOTTISH HERITABLE SECURITY COMPANY (LIMITED) advanced to Messrs Allan, Campbell, and Company, manufacturers, Newburgh, Fife, the sum of £1500, to be repaid by instalments. A personal bond dated 13th April 1874 was granted by the borrowers as a firm and as individuals.*

* The personal bond bore that Allan, Campbell, and Company, and the individual partners of that firm, as trustees for their copartnership, in consideration that the Scottish Heritable Security Company "have agreed to lend us the sum of £1500 sterling, on condition of our granting these presents in manner underwritten, and of our, the said John Carmichael Allan and Douglas Campbell junior, conveying to the said company for their further security certain subjects and others belonging to us as trustees foresaid, situated near the west shore of Newburgh, and lying within the parish of Newburgh and county of Fife, by absolute disposition to be held by the said Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited), under obligation to re-dispone the same to us, and the survivor of us, and the heir of the survivor, as trustees and trustee for our said firm, or our assignees or successors, on payment of the whole sums due, or that may become due, under these presents." The bond then acknowledged receiving the £1500; and proceeded,—"Therefore we, the said Allan, Campbell, and Company, and we, the said John Carmichael Allan and Douglas Campbell junior, as partners of our said firm, and as individuals, hereby bind and oblige ourselves, and our respective heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, and the whole property, stock, and effects of our said firm, all jointly and severally, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to pay to the said Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited)" interest at the rate of 6 per cent from the date of the deed to the term of Whitsunday, and the sum of £103, 10s. half-yearly thereafter until the term of Whitsunday 1884, after which the payments were to terminate. They also bound themselves to pay interest at the rate of 15 per cent on all arrears of these half-yearly payments; and added,—"And farther declaring that nothing herein contained shall be held to affect the right and power of the said Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited), in the event of any payment of interest or half-yearly instalment remaining at any time unpaid, to take all proceedings against us or our foresaids, by diligence or otherwise, for enforcing payment of whatever sum may be then due." They also bound themselves to relieve the security company of all feu-duties, public and parochial burdens, repairs, and premiums of insurance. The bond then continued,—"And it is hereby specially provided and declared that the said Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited) shall have all the rights and powers of absolute proprietors in and over the said subjects and others conveyed by the said disposition so long as any part of the loan remains unpaid, and shall have full power at any time during the continuance of the said loan, or any part thereof, and without any other or further authority than is herein contained, to enter into possession of the said subjects and others, to draw the rents thereof, to output and input tenants, to grant tacks or leases of the said subjects, or any part thereof, at such rents and for such periods of endurance as they may think proper, to appoint factors, and generally to exer-

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

Of the same date the borrowers granted an absolute disposition of certain heritable subjects in Newburgh. The disposition bore to be for onerous causes, and was unqualified.

This disposition was duly recorded on 16th April 1874, and on the same day Mr Moffat, the manager of the Heritable Security Company, executed a back-letter addressed to Allan, Campbell, and Company, in which, after referring to the above absolute disposition of 13th April 1874, he stated that although that disposition was ex facie absolute, it was truly granted in security of £1500 and other sums contained in the bond, upon repayment of which the company would reconvey the subjects to them. This letter was duly forwarded to Allan, Campbell, and Company, and received by them.

Allan, Campbell, and Company remained in possession of the subjects referred to in the disposition, and paid the interest at the rate of 6 per cent due between 13th April and Whitsunday 1874, but they did not pay the instalment of £103, 10s. due at Martinmas 1874, nor did they make any other payments. Notice that the company intended to enter into possession of the subjects in fourteen days in terms of the personal bond was accordingly given, but nothing followed thereon.

The manager of the Heritable Security Company on 1st February 1875 executed a duplicate of the back-letter above mentioned, and recorded it in the Register of Sasines on 2d February.

Of the same date a summons of poinding the ground was raised at the instance of the security company against Allan, Campbell, and Company.

The pursuers pleaded;—The pursuers being, in virtue of the documents set forth, creditors in a debt which is debitum fundi are entitled to decree of poinding the ground as concluded for, with expenses.

Allan, Campbell, and Company lodged defences, and pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent, in respect the pursuers are barred by the nature of

---

cise the whole powers of absolute proprietors in and over the said subjects and others," and in the event of their so doing, to be only liable in omissions and not in exact diligence; "provided always, that before entering into possession of the said subjects and others as aforesaid the said company shall be bound, through their manager, to give us and our foresaids fourteen days' previous intimation of their intention to do so; and it is further hereby specially provided and declared that in the event of us or our foresaids failing to make due and punctual payment of the interest of the said sum of £1500, and of the said half-yearly payments of £103, 10s., or increase thereof, as the same falls due, or to implement any of the other obligations hereby undertaken by us, the said Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited) shall be entitled forthwith to take all proceedings against us or our foresaids competent by the law of Scotland, by diligence or otherwise, for recovery of whatever sums, principal, interest, expenses, and other payments or disbursements may then be due by us or our foresaids; and in the event of us or our foresaids allowing one full half year's payment of £103, 10s., or any part thereof, or the interest of the said sum of £1500, or any part thereof, to remain unpaid for two months after the date when the same shall fall due and be payable, then and in that event it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited) or their foresaids, upon giving us or our foresaids one month's intimation in writing, under the hand of their manager, without any further intimation or process of law whatever, to sell the said subjects, and that either by public roup or private bargain," and to grant dispositions, which, with all other deeds granted by the company, were to be good and valid without the consent or concurrence of Allan, Campbell, and Company; "and on receiving payment of the sums that may be due and arranged as aforesaid, the said company shall be bound, at our expense, to reconvey and dispone the said subjects to us and to our foresaids as we may require."

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876.

Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

their titles from having recourse to poinding the ground. (2) The debt due by the defenders, Allan, Campbell, and Company and John Carmichael Allan, to the pursuers, not being debitum fundi, an action of poinding the ground is incompetent. (3) The recording by the pursuers at their own hands, on 2d February 1875, of a duplicate of the back-letter granted by them on 16th April 1874, without the consent of the defenders, Allan, Campbell, and Company, and John Carmichael Allan, was illegal, and did not create the debt due by the said defenders to the pursuers a debitum fundi, and an action of poinding the ground is therefore incompetent thereon. (4) Under the whole deeds constituting their security the pursuers had, at the date of raising the action, all the rights and powers of absolute proprietors in and over the subjects embraced in the conclusions, and the action is therefore incompetent. (5) Having, in virtue of the powers conferred on them by the personal bond, given fourteen days' notice to the defenders that they were to enter into possession, and the fourteen days having expired before the summons was raised, the pursuers were barred from raising the present action.

The Lord Ordinary, on 2d July 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the sum for which the pursuers conclude that warrant for poinding the ground should be granted is not debitum fundi; and separatim (2) that the title of the pursuers to the ground, the moveables on which are the subjects to be attached by the proposed diligence, being a disposition ex facie absolute, is that not of creditors but of proprietors, and consequently is not a foundation for the diligence of poinding the ground: Therefore sustains the second plea in law, and also the first plea in law for the defenders, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, of which allows an account to be given in, and remits," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The pursuers are creditors under a personal bond for £1500, and they are infeft in the heritable subjects described in the summons on an ex facie absolute disposition. The reality of the situation, however, is that they are not out-and-out proprietors, but must reconvey the property on receiving payment of their debt. A back-letter establishing this obligation was granted immediately after infeftment was taken, but this document never was recorded. A duplicate, however, written out and signed by the manager of the pursuers' company was recorded by the pursuers the day before the present action was instituted. No authority for this proceeding was given by the defenders, who consequently contend that the pleas of parties relative to the competency of poinding the ground must be disposed of as they would have been if the back-letter had not been recorded. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the solution of this question is not necessary for the decision of the cause.

"1. There is no doubt that a debt for which the ground can be poinded must be debitum fundi, and hence the first question here is, whether that due to the pursuers is a debt of this description. The bond for £1500 is only a personal bond, and the disposition is not the constitution of any debt whatever. Nor would the recording of the back-letter accomplish that which the disposition leaves unperformed, all which would thence ensue being merely the limitation of the sum for which the property conveyed could be retained to the debt as it stood when the back-letter was recorded. The amount of that debt behoved to be otherwise established. Quite true, through the instrumentality of the disposition security is in effect afforded. But how? Not by the imposition of the debt as a burden upon subjects belonging to the debtors, but by the right to withhold these subjects from the debtors till the debt is paid or otherwise extinguished. They can demand retrocession only after this condition has been fulfilled, but till payment and retrocession the subjects are not theirs but their creditors'. This, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, involves the conclusion that the debt is in legal acceptance not debitum fundi, because the opposite view would

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876. Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

The Heritable Security Company reclaimed, and argued;—There were three classes of persons holding heritable rights who stood in different relations to poinding of the ground—(1) those who were proprietors holding the radical right; (2) those who held a title inferior but assimilated to a property title; (3) those who held mere incumbrances. Admitting that poinding of the ground was competent only to the last class, the present case came under that category. The Court were bound to look at the substance of the transaction, and the substance of this transaction was a mere incumbrance.[1] This was necessarily known to the defenders, who were the debtors, no third parties being involved. But even if third parties were involved, the real nature of the transaction was made apparent on the records by the registration of the back-bond. The defenders could not plead that that was their deed, which they alone had right to record. The pursuers, as creditors, were entitled at any moment to disclose to the public the real nature of their title, and the true account of the transaction between them and their debtors.

The law relied on by the defenders was founded entirely on the case of Garthland.[2] In that case the poinding creditor was a wadsetter, and had entered into actual possession of the lands so far as to grant a tack of them to the reverser. The legal effect of this was just the same as setting a tack of them to any third party. Actual possession was held by the creditor through his tenant. But that case did not support the make the debt a burden or charge upon the property, not of the debtors, but of the creditors.

---

"2. Proprietors cannot poind their own ground, and if the pursuers are proprietors in the sense of this rule, they as such are excluded from recourse to that diligence. In a matter of this kind, the actual title, the Lord Ordinary thinks, is all that can be regarded. In heritable securities, properly so called, the debtor is proprietor and the creditor only incumbrancer. But where an ex facie absolute disposition has been granted the property no longer remains with the debtor. He has been feudally divested, his creditor has been invested, and there must be a formal reconveyance before the estate can be restored. The ground, according to the title, is the ground of the disponee, the tenants are his tenants, and if he refrains from doing all that an owner might, in the levying of rents and in the management of the property, all that can be said is that he refrains from doing things which are within his competency. His infeftment gave him real, actual, and corporal possession, and there is no other sasine of the property. This is the view of the law which received the sanction of the Court in the well known case of Garthland v. Lord Jedburgh, 2d March 1632, Mor. 10,545-6. That decision is the foundation of all the dicta to be found in the books on this subject, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the doctrine for which it is the authority is well explained in Ross' Lectures, vol. ii. p. 431, where it is laid down 'that no title upon which a man may enter into the natural possession of land can be a foundation for the diligence of poinding the ground, and hence the holders of adjudications, liferent rights, wadsetters, and others of that class, cannot demand the ground to be poinded. They must enter like other landlords, and if the tenants will not pay them, the possessory action of mails and duties is the proper step to be taken.' Analogous passages are to be found in other books of authority, as, for example, in Erskine, b. 4, t. 1, s. 11. What is thus presented is, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, the law by which, in so far at least as the first of the defenders' pleas is concerned, the present action must be determined.

"The reasons which have now been explained are those by which the Lord Ordinary has been led to pronounce the prefixed interlocutor."

[1] Gardyne v. Royal Bank, March 8, 1851, 13 D. 912, 23 Scot. Jur. 410, H. of L. May 13, 1853, 15 D., H. of L. 45, 25 Scot. Jur. 399, 1 Macq. 358.

[2] Garthland v. Lord Jedburgh, 1632, M. 10,545-6.

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

extension of the doctrine attempted here, where the substance of the transaction was admittedly an incumbrance merely, and where there had been no possession either actual or even fictitious given, or alleged to be given, to the creditor.[1] This case, therefore, wanted what was essentially necessary to bring it under the rule of Garthland, and of the doctrine of law founded on that case, namely, actual possession on a title to possess.

Argued for the respondents;—1. The pursuers' title was absolute. The back-letter had never been recorded. The pursuers had no right to record it. It was not their deed, but the defenders'; in the defenders' possession, and under the defenders' control. It was not necessary to complete the pursuers' title or strengthen their security. What the pursuers had put on record was another deed altogether, which had never been delivered. Even supposing the back-letter had been recorded, it would not have limited the pursuers' absolute title. It would only have feudalised in the defenders a right of reversion which had previously been personal.

2. Poinding of the ground was a diligence or distress originally available only to the superior against his vassal. Instead of taking the extreme course of resuming the land, the superior could seize and retain moveables to distress the vassal into fulfilment of his obligation. But the diligence did not transfer anything. It only effected a compulsory nexus for the purpose of coercing the distressed person into performance. The right to avail himself of it was in course of time extended to the heritable creditor. In both cases, poinding supplied the place of possession.[2]

3. Poinding of the ground was only competent to a heritable creditor who held a debitum fundi.[3] Where a debt was debitum fundi, the land personified was considered the debtor. The land was bound and continued bound, though the personal obligation of the owner might cease.[4] The ground being the debtor, poinding of the ground was just an attachment of the moveable effects found on the ground, and so, fictione juris, assumed to belong to it.

4. The creation of a separate feudal estate, made real by infeftment (the property remaining feudally vested as before), was an essential element in all the different classes of debt which were debita fundi.[5] But the pursuers' security in the present case wanted all the characteristics of a debitum fundi. Their title was absolute. They had not an estate which was feudally made a burden on another estate. The disposition constituted no debt against the land; neither did the back-letter, whether recorded or not. It only gave a right of reversion. So absolute was the pursuers' title, that if the defenders were to take benefit by the back-letter a re-conveyance was necessary. The debt due by the defenders to the pursuers was constituted by the personal bond, and not by any security affecting the lands by infeftment, so as to make the land the debtor, and lay the foundation for a poinding of the ground.

5. The object of the pursuers in taking their security in the form of an ex facie absolute disposition was to make their position different from that of a mere incumbrancer, to give them rights and powers which an ordinary heritable creditor had not. Having contracted for extraordinary

---

[1] Henderson v. Wallace, Jan. 7, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 272.

[2] Ross' Lect. ii. 392, et seq.

[3] Ersk. iii. 6, 20, and iv. 1, 11; Ross' Lect. ii. 401.

[4] Peddie v. Scot's Trustees, Feb. 27, 1846, 8 D. 560, 18 Scot. Jur. 578; Small v. Millar, Feb. 3, 1849, 11 D. 495, 21 Scot. Jur. 143; Gardyne v. Royal Bank, supra, p. 336, note 1.

[5] Bank. ii. 5, 18; Stair, iv. 23, 5, and 35, 24; Menzies (1856), 794, et seq.

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876. Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

rights and powers, they could not avail themselves also of the remedies peculiar to ordinary heritable creditors. In all questions as to the validity of diligence the debtor was entitled to the benefit strictissimi juris. The creditor must be held to have relinquished legal diligence otherwise competent to him, but inconsistent with the form of his security.[1]

6. Ross' statement that "no title upon which a man may enter into the natural possession of the land can be a foundation for the diligence of poinding the ground,"[2] contained the true statement of the law on the subject. Erskine's doctrine,[3] though apparently requiring actual, not merely potential possession, was really the same, as might be seen from the following analogies—(1) Poinding of the ground, which was competent to a superior for his retour duties before citation, was incompetent after citation, whether the superior had entered into possession or not, because he might enter into possession.[4] (2) Poinding of the ground was incompetent to an adjudger, even though he held his decree for the sake of preference merely, and never entered into possession. (3) Poinding of the ground was incompetent to a wadsetter, though he did not enter into possession himself, but allowed the reverser to remain in possession under a back-tack. The case of Garthland[5] was, mutatis mutandis, the same as the present. The ex facie absolute disposition could not be distinguished from the wadset, nor the back-letter from the back-tack.

But, 7, the pursuers' security covered not only the money debt contained in the personal bond, but also several prestations connected with the property, till all which were fulfilled they were under no obligation to reconvey. And not only that, but their security also covered all future debts incurred by the defenders to them, on bond, bill, open account, or in any manner of way, prior to the recording of the back-letter.[6] If they could poind the ground for the money debt, they could equally do so for any of these prestations, or for any subsequent debt incurred, of which there could be no trace in their title or in the original document of debt. There could be no saying in that case where the right to poind the ground was to stop.

On these grounds, the respondents contended that poinding of the ground was incompetent in the present case.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of poinding the ground which the Lord Ordinary has dismissed upon two grounds. In the first place, that the sum for which the pursuers conclude that warrant for poinding should be granted is not debitum fundi; and secondly, that the title of the pursuers to the ground, the moveables on which are to be attached, being a disposition ex facie absolute, is that not of creditors but of proprietors, and consequently is not a foundation for the diligence of poinding the ground. I agree with his Lordship in both grounds of judgment.

The writings which constitute the relation between the two parties and which

---

[1] Wylie v. Scottish Heritable Securities Investment Company, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 253, 44 Scot. Jur. 150.

[2] Ross' Lect. ii. 431.

[3] Ersk. iv. 1, 11.

[4] Stair, ii. 4, 22; Ersk. ii. 5, 42.

[5] Supra, p. 336, note 2.

[6] Ross' Leading Cases, Land Rights, vol. 2, p 721, et seq.

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876. Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

define their rights and liabilities are three in number. The first is a personal bond by the defenders in favour of the Scottish Heritable Security Company acknowledging receipt of a loan of £1500, and binding themselves to repay that loan. That bond contains no disposition of heritable subjects, and nothing in the shape of a heritable security at all. Therefore, in so far as the bond itself is concerned, it is nothing but a personal bond. No doubt it contains certain statements and declarations about an absolute disposition which is at the same time granted by the defenders in favour of the pursuer, but that does not in the least degree affect the character of the obligation itself, which is contained in the bond for repayment of the money, which, being clothed with no heritable security of any kind, remains, as I have already said, a purely personal obligation. Now, that of itself furnishes sufficient ground for the judgment of the Lord Ordinary under the first head of his interlocutor. This is not debitum fundi, and therefore it cannot be the foundation of a process of poinding the ground.

But it is quite right that we should proceed, as his Lordship has done, to consider what is the title of the pursuers to the heritable subject, whether that title is not the title of absolute proprietors and so is not a title which can afford them the remedy that they here seek to use. I have already said that the personal bond contains reference to the disposition in favour of the pursuers, and it provides a number of things which are exceedingly unnecessary, because they would have been all implied or effected by means of the absolute disposition which was granted in favour of the pursuers, without being expressed, as they are on the face of this personal bond. For example, it is specially provided and declared that the Scottish Heritable Security Company shall have "all the rights and powers of absolute proprietors in and over the said subjects and others conveyed by the said disposition so long as any part of the loan remains unpaid, and shall have full power at any time during the continuance of the said loan or any part thereof, and without any other or future authority than is herein contained, to enter into possession of the said subjects and others, to draw the rents thereof, to output and input tenants, to grant tacks or leases of the said subjects or any part thereof at such rents and for such periods of endurance as they may think proper, to appoint factors, and generally to exercise the whole powers of absolute proprietors in and over the said subjects and others." Then it is further provided that in the event of the borrowers running into arrear of the annual payments of interest, it shall be in the power of the pursuers to sell the subjects; and there are some other clauses of a similar tendency and effect. Now, it seems to me that these were very unnecessary clauses to introduce into this personal bond, because the whole of the powers thereby expressly given to the pursuers were given them by the disposition of the subjects ex facie absolute which was at the same time executed. When infeftment was taken upon that disposition, or when the equivalent proceeding of recording the conveyance in the Register of Sasines had been completed, the pursuers became avowedly the proprietors of these subjects, and entitled to use all the powers of proprietors. They could do anything with the subjects they pleased. They had an absolute right of ownership of the subjects. Nor was this in the slightest degree affected in so far as powers were concerned by the back-bond which was granted by the pursuers in favour of the defenders, and which declared that the subjects, although conveyed by a disposition ex facie absolute, were in truth conveyed as in security only of the advance of £1500 made by the company—i.e., by the

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876. Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

pursuers to the defenders, and for the due fulfilment of the whole obligations contained in the bond granted to the company. And by that same back-letter the pursuers undertake that upon the advances and all sums that may become due under the said bond being repaid, and the whole claims of the company under the same being fully satisfied, the company shall re-dispone the said subjects and others to the defenders. It is said that this back-bond was recorded, and that the recording of the back-bond so qualified the infeftment upon the absolute disposition that the pursuers were no longer upon the face of the records absolute proprietors of the subjects, but only heritable creditors. Now, that I consider to be quite unsound in law, on the assumption that the back-bond was recorded. But I take leave to doubt whether this back-bond was recorded at all. The back-bond remained naturally, and as it was intended to do, in the hands of the defenders, in whose favour it was granted, and to whom it was delivered, and that back-bond so delivered to them was never recorded. But it seems that the manager of the company executed a duplicate of it, and sent that to the record. Now, that was not the back-bond which had been granted and delivered to the defenders, and which is the only proper back-bond in this transaction. And therefore I am humbly of opinion that the back-bond was not recorded. But, for the reason I have already given, I do not think it of any consequence whether it was recorded or not. The back-bond did nothing more than this—it shewed that under certain conditions the present proprietors of the subjects,—the Heritable Security Company,—were bound to convey the subjects to somebody else; but it did not make them one bit the less for the time absolute proprietors of the subjects. They were no doubt under an obligation to reconvey them to the party from whom they had acquired, but the mode of their acquisition remained the same; it was by disposition absolute. It is not an incumbrance upon lands that is created by such a disposition, because an incumbrance can be discharged, but this infeftment of the pursuers cannot be discharged. It can only be extinguished by a conveyance, and if by a conveyance to the original owner to whom the money has been advanced, it is a re-conveyance no doubt, and it is a re-conveyance in terms of an obligation contained in the back-bond. But that does not in the slightest decree affect the position of the pursuers as proprietors of the subjects. By means of their infeftment they are put in possession of the subject, because infeftment is the solemn and legal mode of taking civil possession of heritage, and if they refrained from drawing the rents, that was of their own accord, for they were just as much entitled to draw the rents payable by tenants as any other absolute proprietor was. They were entitled, without any of the provisions of that personal bond, to let leases of the subjects, and to deal with the estate in every respect as their own. They required no process of law to enable them to enter into possession as it is called, and if they had proposed an action of maills and duties, for example, for the purpose of enabling them to uplift the rents, it would have been an idle formality, and indeed incompetent, because it is only an incumbrancer that requires to use a process of maills and duties in order to give him a title in a question with the tenant to uplift the rents. But these absolute owners were just as much entitled to uplift the rents of these subjects as any singular successor deriving his right from the former owner. Now, that being the nature of their title, the question comes to be, whether a party so situated can poind the ground; and I am humbly of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that he cannot. The authorities upon that subject are perfectly clear and distinct. Poinding the ground is not a diligence proper to an owner at all. He cannot poind his own ground, as it is expressed, and therefore upon that second reason assigned by the Lord Ordinary for his judgment I am entirely in accordance with him also. I am for adhering to the interlocutor.

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

LORD DEAS.—The nature of the transaction out of which this question arises seems to be this:—The Heritable Security Company, in April 1874, agreed to give a loan of £1500 to the defenders,—the lending of money at a pretty high rate of interest being, as I understand, an important part of the business of the company. It is stipulated in the bond that the £1500 should be repaid by half-yearly instalments of £103, 10s. each, the first payment to be made at Martinmas 1874. The money had been advanced so recently as April of that year, and the effect of that system of lending is to enable the company to lend upon what ordinary lenders would consider inadequate security, because the company no sooner lend the money with one hand than they begin to gather it in with the other. The interest payable is to be five per cent, or a higher rate when the current rate of interest is higher; but if there be any delay in repaying the half-yearly instalments of the capital then the interest payable is to be fifteen per cent. In accounting for the rents the lenders are neither to be liable for omissions nor bound to do strict diligence, and, as regards repayment of the debt, principal, interest, disbursements, and expenses, it is stipulated that the amount shall be sufficiently ascertained by a certificate under the hands of the manager of the company for the time being, "and the amount stated in such certificate shall, without any other voucher or instruction thereof, constitute a charge" against the debtors, "and no suspension shall pass upon a charge for payment thereof, or upon any other threatened proceeding at the instance of the said company, except on consignation of the amount in said certificate only." These stringent conditions are analogous to those which were brought under our notice in the case of Wylie v. The Heritable Securities Investment Association, 22d December 1871, 10 Macph. 253. And when we find that they are here attempted to be carried out by a sort of mongrel combination of, I may say, all the different kinds of voluntary securities which have been hitherto known in our practice in a separate form, but in a separate form only, it is the duty of the Court to make sure that the bondholders are within the law before sanctioning such a combination, by which debtors may be subjected to unusual hardship, and other creditors who have trusted to heritable securities conceived in the terms hitherto alone regarded as legitimate may be placed at a disadvantage.

Now, laying aside judicial securities, which are not here in question, we all know that voluntary securities are divided into two great classes—the one in which the deed (which may be in various forms) avows itself on the face of it to be a security merely, the other an ex facie absolute disposition, which is usually accompanied by a back-letter or back-obligation declaring it to be a security merely. This last is in many respects more favourable for the creditor and less favourable for the debtor than any of those forms in which it appears ex facie of the deed that it is a security merely. The holder of the ex facie absolute disposition, when followed by infeftment, or, what is now the same thing, when the deed is recorded in the Register of Sasines, appears before the world as absolute proprietor. Even if the back-letter or back-obligation be also recorded in that register, heritable creditors whose rights bear ex facie to be securities merely cannot interfere until not only the particular debt specified in the back-letter or back-obligation is fully satisfied, but until all other debts, of whatever amount, contracted either before or after that debt, and whether immediately connected with it or not, are fully paid and satisfied. A debtor is not generally willing to grant such a deed, which ex facie divests him absolutely of his estate, and has effects like these, as well as others which I need not enumerate. His necessities may, however, lead him to do it. But I take it that while the law concedes all that I have said to the holder of such a deed, he can only have the advantages which have been immemorially recognised by our law and practice as attending that form of security. The law does not allow the creditor to create a form of deed never known in practice before, by which he shall have at one and the same time all the advantages of an heritable creditor under a bond and disposition in security, and all the advantages of an heritable creditor who holds under an absolute disposition and back-bond. That would be carrying his powers over the debtor, and his preference over all other creditors holding heritable securities, voluntary or judicial, to an extent which in our law and practice has never yet been recognised, and which has not even expediency to recommend it. But that is what is proposed to be done here, and I agree with your Lordship that we cannot possibly sanction it.

No. 59.
Jan. 14, 1876.
Scottish Heritable Security Co. v Allan, Campbell, and Co.

The only argument we have heard in support of it is, that although the deed contains a conveyance ex facie absolute, the company are, after all, mere security holders, and therefore are entitled to all the benefits and remedies of security holders, such being the real nature of the transaction. A conclusive answer to that is, that it has been settled for centuries that the thing cannot be done. It is undoubted law that a proprietor cannot poind his own ground, and it was decided more than two hundred years ago that this law is applicable to one who, although in reality an heritable creditor, holds his security in the form of an absolute conveyance. It is not necessary to go for this doctrine beyond the case of Garthland, decided in March 1632, Mor. 10,545. Spottiswoode's report of that case is this:—"The Lord Jedburgh having wadset to the Laird of Garthland some land received a back-tack for payment of 1200 merks yearly. Garthland raised a summons against him for payment of the back tack-duty, wherein he concluded likewise to have the ground poinded for it for all years to come. Which conclusion the Lords would not sustain, for the pursuer, being infeft in the property, could not seek his own ground to be poinded for anything due to him out of the said lands." There is a much longer and fuller report on the next page by Durie, in which, among other explanations, it is mentioned,—"This cause being called in præsentia dominorum the decision here noted was renewed, and it was found that the heritor could not desire the goods of his tacksman, nor of his sub-tenant, to be poinded by this pursuit for the tack-duty, but that he might and ought to pursue personally therefor." The whole practice and the whole authorities for the past centuries since that time have been conform to what is there laid down, and whatever, therefore, might be said about this being a mere form of title, it is settled that, in this very matter of poinding of the ground, the heritable creditor is exactly in the same position as if he were the undoubted and out and out proprietor, and there had been no loan transaction at all. If he could poind the ground he would be in a position to exclude all other heritable creditors as well as personal creditors, so long as he thought proper to exercise that right; because, as was decided in several of the cases, and laid down by Lord Stair, the poinding of the ground gives a man a paramount and enduring right. It is not only good against all prior debts and prior

No. 59.
Jan. 14, 1876.
Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

parties but it is good against singular successors, and does not require even to be transferred against heirs. It is a constant continuing right that sets all the world at defiance in favour of that particular creditor. I am clearly of opinion with your Lordship that it is beyond all doubt that those parties who choose to take their title in the form now in question, while they are entitled to all the rights and diligences belonging to that form of title, are not entitled to the inconsistent position of having also all the rights and remedies of an ex facie heritable creditor. The Lord Ordinary puts this as the second question, but I think it is truly the first question, because it goes to this, that this debt is not a debitum fundi. In order to a debt being debitum fundi it must be a debt upon the face of the feudal title. It would be so if this were an ordinary heritable security, but it is just because this is not an ordinary heritable security,—because the title of the party is not the title of an ordinary heritable creditor, but the title of a proprietor,—that it becomes perfectly clear that this is not a debitum fundi. It is laid down by Lord Stair, and all the authorities, that a debitum fundi,—that is to say, a debt made real upon the property,—is necessary to found the diligence of poinding the ground. But to say that a man, whose title in its form is that of a proprietor, has a right to poind the ground, is just to say that he is at one and the same time proprietor and not proprietor. I think what are called two grounds of judgment resolve truly into one and the same ground, but whichever way you take it the result is equally conclusive.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I feel rather reluctant also to separate the two grounds. I do not by any means venture to differ from your Lordship's view that this is not a debitum fundi, but I rather think that the grounds for holding that it is not a debitum fundi very much depend upon the other question, which is one of much interest. I am unable to see anything to distinguish the principle of this case from the principle laid down in the case of Garthland, so long ago as 1632. If there had been no recorded back-bond, this was an absolute disposition of the premises by the borrower of the money to the lender of the money.

The mode by which the borrower who has given an absolute bond protects himself is by recording the back-letter, which qualifies and makes the apparent proprietor in the position truly of an heritable creditor. In this case the proceeding in regard to the matter is a very singular one. I impute not the slightest blame to this company. They are doing a business which is in itself perfectly fair and honourable, and which they are quite entitled to conduct, and they are quite entitled to make their securities as perfect as they can make them, but when they had got the heritable disposition, and granted a back-bond, which they did on 16th April 1874, they gave one back-letter only to the borrowers of the money. The borrowers did not record that back-bond, and what did the lenders do? On the 1st of February they signed another letter, and that other letter, which they called a duplicate, they recorded on the 2d February. Now, I do not blame them for the motive, which is very obvious. If they had not signed that back-letter and recorded it they would have held an absolute disposition to this property, and they could not have poinded the ground upon that. They do not themselves profess that they could have done so; and so they first grant and then record a new back-letter, which they call a duplicate; and this they did in order to give them the rights of a creditor in addition to the rights of a proprietor, which they previously had, for as the proprietors they could not have used the diligence of poinding the ground. Therefore this granting and recording the back-letter by them was simply done to combine in their persons the inconsistent rights of a proprietor and of a creditor. Now, that I do not think they can do according to law. The case of Garthland was very well considered very long ago, and all our recent authorities, Mr Ross, Mr Bell, and Mr Duff, allude to the case as a standard authority, which I never in the least doubted. As Mr Ross says in his Lectures, —"No title upon which a man may enter into the natural possession of land can be a foundation for the diligence of poinding the ground," or, as it is put in the judgment itself, the owner of the ground cannot poind his own ground. Now, these parties were truly the owners of the ground, unless the borrower of the money held the back-letter and recorded the back-letter to qualify the right. The recording of their own back-letter was an attempt, which I think the law cannot sanction, to clothe themselves with the two inconsistent rights. That view, I think, really disposes of both points, because clearly there could be no debitum fundi when the party who calls himself the creditor held the rights to the subjects himself. There was no burden upon the property of another. The lender of the money and the holder of the bond was also the proprietor, and there could be no debitum fundi. Therefore I think that truly the two questions turn on the one point, and taking it in that composite view, I am very clearly of the same opinion as your Lordship.

No. 59.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

Lord Mure.—In the discussion of this case it was not disputed by either party, and it may be assumed as settled law—(1) That an heritable creditor, as holder of a debitum fundi burdening the land of his debtor, is entitled to have recourse to poinding of the ground in order to operate payment of his debt; and (2) that this remedy is not open to a proprietor, because it is held to be incompetent for a party to poind ground belonging to himself. The law is so laid down by Mr Erskine in the passage which has been referred to by the Lord Ordinary in his note; and there are other authorities to the same effect.

In the present case the pursuers' title is not that of heritable creditors by bond and disposition in security in the ordinary form, but is ex facie that of absolute proprietors, with a separate back-bond or letter of reversion. The parties do not seem to be at one as to the date when the back-letter was granted, or as to whether it has been duly recorded. But it was not disputed by the defenders that such a letter had been granted; and it seems to be admitted that the transaction was substantially that of a security for debt, and intended to be so. Such being the nature and character of the transaction, it has been strongly contended on the part of the pursuers that they were entitled to the same remedies for the recovery of their debt as other heritable creditors, including that of an action for poinding the ground.

The question thus raised is, in a general point of view, one of very considerable importance, and is, I think, attended with nicety; and if the matter were still open I should have had some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the substance of this transaction was to be disregarded, and that because the title of the creditor was ex facie that of a proprietor he was not in a position to sue a poinding of the ground. But the question is, in my opinion, no longer an open one. For it seems to have for long been held that parties whose titles are ex facie absolute, although they may not be out-and-out proprietors, such as life-renters and wadsetters, are not entitled to have recourse to a poinding of the ground, but must operate payment of their debts in some other way. That was decided as regards a wadsetter in 1632, in the case of Garthland, referred to by the Lord Ordinary. Now, a wadset is defined to be "a conveyance of land in pledge for or in satisfaction of a debt or obligation, with a reserved power to the debtor to recover the lands on payment or performance;" and that I apprehend is substantially the position of the pursuers in this case. Upon the authority of the case of Garthland, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

No. 59.
Jan. 14, 1876.
Scottish Heritable Security Co. v. Allan, Campbell, and Co.

THE COURT adhered.

STUART & CHEYNE, W.S.—LEBURN, HENDERSON, & WILSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 60.
Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

VISCOUNT FINCASTLE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Watson—Keir.
THE EARL OF DUNMORE, Defender.—Fraser—Kinnear.
CATHERINE COUNTESS DOWAGER OF DUNMORE AND ANOTHER (Earl of Dunmore's Trustees), Defenders.—Crichton.
JAMES CAMPBELL TAIT AND OTHERS, Defenders.—MacLean.

Entail—Disentail—Reduction of Disentail—Entail Acts 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, sec. 1, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec. 24.—An heir of entail in possession of lands held by trustees under an entail dated after 1st August 1848, and born before the date of the tailzie, presented a petition for authority to acquire in fee-simple the entailed lands, and, with the consent of his uncle and two cousins as the three next heirs, obtained from the Lord Ordinary a decree authorising the petitioner to acquire the lands in fee-simple, and ordaining the trustees to convey them to him in fee-simple. After completing his title to the lands in fee-simple the proprietor borrowed money over the estate, and granted a bond and disposition in security to a creditor.

In an action of reduction brought by his son, born after these proceedings, held (1) that the petition to acquire in fee-simple was presented without the consents required by law, in respect that the proprietor being heir under a new entail, and born before the date of the entail, could only disentail with consent of an heir-apparent who had attained the age of twenty-five, and therefore that the decree granting warrant to acquire in fee-simple, and the conveyance of the trustees following thereon, fell to be reduced; but (2) (diss. Lord President) that the bond and disposition in security was protected by 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec. 24, which enacts, that after the time allowed for appeal to the House of Lords has elapsed judgments of disentail "shall, as regards third parties acting bona fide on the faith thereof, be no longer reducible on any ground of irregularity, or non-compliance with the provisions of the said recited Act or of this Act, but, in respect of any such ground of challenge, be final and conclusive."

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

THE Earl of Dunmore was heir of entail in possession of the estate of South Harris under an entail on heirs-male dated in 1841. In 1864, after the necessary procedure under the Entail Acts, and with consent of his uncle and cousins, the three next heirs, he executed an instrument of disentail. The consents were given without pecuniary consideration, on the footing that the estate should be sold and other lands purchased and entailed on the same series of heirs as before. Accordingly, in the same year, Lord Dunmore executed a trust-disposition of the estate to the Countess Dowager of Dunmore and Mr John Tait for the above purpose, upon which they were infeft.

In 1869, however, Lord Dunmore presented a petition to the Court for authority to acquire the estate in fee-simple, under the Acts 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, and 31 and 32 Vict. c. 84, calling as respondents his uncle, Sir C. Murray, and two of his sons, being the three next heirs, and the trustees under the trust-disposition of 1864. Deeds of consent were lodged by the three next heirs, and after the usual procedure, and a remit to a man of business to inquire into the facts, the Lord Ordinary, by decree dated 5th February 1870, after narrating that the petitioner had disentailed the estate in 1864, and thereafter conveyed it to trustees, who were still infeft, for certain purposes, granted warrant to Lord Dunmore to acquire the estate in fee-simple, and ordained the trustees to execute a conveyance in his favour.* They did so by deed dated 29th March 1870.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876. Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

In April 1870 Lord Dunmore borrowed £35,000 from Mr J. C. Tait, W.S., for which he granted a bond and disposition in security over the estate.

During these proceedings Lord Dunmore had no heir-apparent. His eldest son, Viscount Fincastle, was born in 1871.

---

* The extract decree, inter alia, narrated "that the petitioner was the before designed Right Honourable Charles Adolphus Earl of Dunmore, who was called as institute under the foresaid destination contained in the trust-deed, and was the party who, if the said southern portion of Harris, still remaining unsold, and held by the said trustees for the purposes specified in the said trust-deed, or any part thereof, had been sold, and the proceeds thereof invested in the purchase of lands, and entailed in terms of the said trust-deed, would have been for the time institute or heir of entail in possession of the same: That the heirs of entail, whose consents, if the said lands held in trust as aforesaid had been sold, and the proceeds thereof invested in lands which had been entailed, would have been required to a disentail thereof, and whose consents were required to the application, were (first), the Honourable Sir Charles Augustus Murray, Knight Commander of the Bath, the uncle of the petitioner, and brother-german of the said deceased Alexander Edward Earl of Dunmore, Her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Lisbon, and presently resident in or near Lisbon, or elsewhere furth of Scotland; (second), Charles James Murray, the eldest son of the said Honourable Sir Charles Augustus Murray, presently residing at Barton Vicarage, Bury St Edmunds, Suffolk, or elsewhere furth of Scotland; and (third), Cecil Henry Alexander Murray, second son of the said Honourable Sir Charles Augustus Murray, presently residing with his said father in or near Lisbon, or elsewhere furth of Scotland, they being the three nearest heirs who for the time would be entitled as aforesaid to succeed in their order successively immediately after the petitioner: That the petitioner was desirous to acquire in fee-simple the foresaid lands and estate held by the said trustees under and by virtue of the said trust-deed, and made the application to their Lordships for authority to acquire in fee-simple the said lands and estates: And which petition prays their Lordships to interpone authority to the proposed transaction, and grant warrant to and authorise the petitioner to acquire in fee-simple the foresaid lands and estate, held in trust as aforesaid, and for that purpose to grant warrant to and ordain the said trustees to make and execute a valid conveyance to the petitioner in fee-simple of the foresaid lands and estate. After sundry procedure, in the course of which" a remit was made to a writer to the signet "to inquire into the facts and circumstances set forth in the petition, and whether the provisions of the Acts of Parliament and Sederunt have been complied with, and to report." . . . . "Sitting in judgment the said Lords, of the date hereof, having considered the report, the petition, and whole proceedings, interponed and hereby interpone authority to the proposed transaction; granted warrant to and authorised, and hereby grant warrant to and authorise the petitioner to acquire in fee-simple the southern half or portion of the lands and estate of Harris, held in trust, as mentioned in the petition; granted warrant to and ordained, and hereby grant warrant to and ordain the Right Honourable Catherine Countess Dowager of Dunmore, and John Tait, the trustees mentioned in the petition, to make and execute a valid conveyance to the petitioner in fee-simple of the foresaid lands and estate, and decerned and hereby decern," &c.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

This was an action by Lord Fincastle, with consent of his father as his administrator, concluding for reduction of (1) the interlocutor of 5th February 1870; (2) the conveyance by the trustees of 29th March 1870; and (3) the bond and disposition in security in favour of Mr J. C. Tait, and assignations thereof, and for declarator that the trust-disposition was still subsisting. Lord Dunmore, the trustees, Sir C. Murray and his two sons, and the creditors under the bond, were called as defenders, and appearance was made for Lord Dunmore, the trustees, and the creditors.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The prayer of the said petition to acquire in fee-simple having been granted without the requisite consents, the interlocutor or decree, dated 5th February 1870, was and is unwarranted, incompetent, and inept, and ought to be reduced as concluded for. (2) The defenders, the Countess Dowager of Dunmore and John Tait, trustees foresaid, not having been in titulo to grant the disposition and conveyance, nor the defender, the Earl of Dunmore, to grant the ratification and discharge contained in the deed dated 29th March 1870, the same are inoperative, and null and void, and as such should be reduced and set aside. (3) The trust-deed dated 21st June 1864 being still in force, and the said defenders, the trustees foresaid, being still bound to execute the trust purposes therein contained, so far as not yet implemented, the pursuer should have decree of declarator and implement as concluded for. (4) As the defender, the Earl of Dunmore, is not and was not at the date of the bond and disposition in security, 12th April 1870, fee-simple proprietor of the lands and others therein mentioned, he was not in titulo to grant the disposition thereof to the defender, James Campbell Tait, contained in that deed, and the same, and the various assignations thereof, should be reduced as and to the extent concluded for.

The defender, Lord Dunmore, pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The disentail effected in 1864 being for the purpose of selling the lands of South Harris with a view to the purchase of other lands to be entailed on the same series of heirs, and the trust-deed having been granted solely with the view of carrying this purpose more completely into effect, the consent necessary to the disentail of the trust property was merely such consent as was requisite to the disentail of the lands in 1864. (3) The defender did not, under the decree dated 9th June 1864, and instrument of disentail thereafter recorded, acquire the lands and estate of South Harris in fee-simple within the meaning of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36.

The trustees pleaded;—(1) The disposition and conveyance executed by the defenders in favour of the Earl of Dunmore having been granted under authority of the decree of the Court, the trust in favour of the defenders was extinguished. (2) The trust having been validly put an end to, the defenders are not bound again to take it up, and to execute the unfulfilled purposes thereof.

The creditors pleaded;—The bond and disposition in security and assignations thereof having been made and taken bona fide on the faith of the decree of disentail, and the said decree not having been appealed from or brought under reduction within the time appointed by law, the said bond and disposition in security, and assignations thereof, are unchallengeable, and ought not to be reduced.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the prayer of the petition for authority to disentail, in which the interlocutor of 5th February 1870, in the first place mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, was pronounced, was granted without the consent required by law, and that the said interlocutor, and the deed or writing dated 25th, 26th, and 29th March, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 1st April 1870, in the second place mentioned in the conclusions of the summons,

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876. Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

are in consequence invalid; but finds, nevertheless, that the bond and disposition in security for the sum of £35,000, with interest and penalties corresponding thereto, and containing in security of said sum, interest, and penalties, a conveyance of the lands and estate of South Harris, described in the conclusions of the summons, granted by the defender, the Earl of Dunmore, in favour of James Campbell Tait, W.S., dated the 12th, and recorded in the division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Inverness the 26th days of April 1870, and the several assignations thereof in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th places mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, are, by virtue of the 24th section of the Act 16 and 17 Victoria, cap. 94,* valid and effectual securities, and that the several sums of money contained in the said bond and disposition in security, and assignations thereof, form valid and effectual charges on the said lands of South Harris and others: Therefore reduces the said interlocutor and deed or writing, and decerns and declares, as regards said writs, in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, but always under the declaration that this decree of reduction shall not prejudice or affect the said bond and disposition in security, and the several assignations thereof, and that the dispositions therein contained shall be held to subsist, in so far as necessary to protect the said bond and disposition in security, and the assignations thereof, and the rights of the creditors therein: Further, assoilzies the said James Campbell Tait," &c., " from the whole conclusions of the summons: Grants warrant to the keeper of the Register of Sasines to mark upon the said register that decree of reduction has been pronounced of the said deed or writing, subject to the exception above mentioned: Finds and declares, but without prejudice to the validity of the said bond and disposition in security, and assignations thereof, that the conveyance made, and the trust constituted by the defender, the Earl of Dunmore, under his trust-disposition, dated 21st June 1864, in favour of the defenders, Catherine Dowager Countess of Dunmore, and John Tait, as his trustees, is operative and subsisting, and decerns and ordains the said two last mentioned defenders to give effect to and forthwith to execute the purposes contained in the said trust-disposition, in so far as the same have not been already implemented by them, subject always to the effect of the said bond and disposition in security and assignations thereof as valid securities on the said estate of South Harris and others: Finds no expenses due, and decerns."

Lord Dunmore reclaimed, and argued;—The consents obtained to the petition to acquire in fee-simple were sufficient. Lord Dunmore was not heir under a new entail made after 1848, but was still under the old entail of 1841. The fetters were not new. They were the old fetters relaxed for a special purpose. Even if it were held that, after the disentail of

---

* Sec. 24. " Every judgment and decree pronounced and that shall be pronounced upon any application under the said recited Act or under this Act, where such judgment or decree has not been or shall not be brought under review of the House of Lords by appeal, or brought under reduction upon any relevant ground during the period within which such judgment or decree might have been appealed from, shall, as regards third parties acting bona fide on the faith thereof, be no longer reducible on any ground of irregularity or non-compliance with the provisions of the said recited Act or of this Act, but in respect of any such ground of challenge, be final and conclusive; and the period during which challenge or appeal is competent under the said recited Act or under this Act, of any such judgment or decree, or of any instrument of disentail or other deed executed in virtue of such judgment or decree, shall not be extended in respect of the minority or want of capacity to act of any person or persons whatever."

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

1864, he was proprietor in fee-simple, he was entitled to revoke his conveyance to the trustees,[1] and he did so by the proceedings in the petition to acquire in fee-simple.

The pursuer argued;—When Lord Dunmore disentailed the estate in 1864 he became fee-simple proprietor. The lands could then have been attached by his creditors. The old entail was at an end, and its fetters were inoperative. By his trust-deed of 1864 he created a new entail. He was then heir of entail in possession under an entail made after 1848, born before the date of the tailzie, and he could not disentail without the consent of an heir-apparent who had attained the age of twenty-five.[2] But the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was wrong in so far as regarded the bond to Mr Tait. The 24th section of 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, did not apply to cases of this kind. This was not a case of "irregularity or non-compliance with the Act." The petitioner was not within the Act at all, and it appeared ex facie of the decree in the petition that that was so.

The creditors argued;—They had acted in bona fide, and were entitled to rely on the decree of the Court, and were fully protected by the 24th section of 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94.

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—There are two questions here,—in the first place, whether the deed now sought to be reduced is a valid disentail, and, in the second place, whether, if it be not so, the heritable securities nevertheless remain good to the creditors. The Lord Ordinary has found in favour of the pursuers of the reduction on the first of these questions, and in favour of the heritable creditors upon the second.

It appears that there was an entail of the estate executed by the father of the present Earl in 1841, and there seems to be no question raised as to the validity of that entail. But it seems equally clear that that entail was done away with by a valid deed of disentail, followed by a trust-disposition, under which the proceedings now challenged took place. I cannot say that I think it admits of any doubt that the entail of 1841 was effectually done away with and extinguished. If so, the consequence was that the trustees of the Earl were acting entirely upon the trust-disposition which he had executed, and this, I think, placed him in the position of not being entitled, under the clauses of the statute quoted in the record, to execute the deed which he did execute without the consent of his heir-apparent for the time being. It is true he had at the time no heir-apparent, but the consequence of that I take to be that he was not in the position in which alone the clauses of the statute quoted entitle an heir of entail to execute such a deed. I need not go into any detail of the enactments. I think it only necessary to say that on that part of the case I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary.

The difficult and delicate question is the second question, whether, notwithstanding that what was thus done was unauthorised by the statute, and consequently reducible, those heritable securities which were granted upon the faith that the proceedings were not reducible are nevertheless to take effect? The Lord Ordinary has found that they are; and the soundness of that judgment depends entirely upon the construction to be put upon section 24 of the statute 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94. That section bears that "every judgment and

---

[1] Lindores v. Stewart, 1714, M. 7735; Scott v. Scott, 1713, M. 15,569.
[2] 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, sec. 1.

No. 60.
Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

decree pronounced and which shall be pronounced upon any application under the said recited Act or under this Act, where such judgment or decree has not been, or shall not be brought under review of the House of Lords by appeal, or brought under reduction upon any relevant ground during the period within which such judgment or decree might have been appealed from, shall, as regards third parties acting bona fide on the faith thereof, be no longer reducible on any ground of irregularity or non-compliance with the provisions of the said recited Act or of this Act, but in respect of any such ground of challenge be final and conclusive; and the period during which challenge or appeal is competent under the said recited Act or under this Act of any such judgment or decree, or of any instrument of disentail or other deed executed in virtue of such judgment or decree, shall not be extended in respect of the minority or want of capacity to act of any person or persons whatever."

Now, it cannot be disputed that no appeal or reduction of the judgment or decree now complained of was instituted within the time mentioned in the enactment which I have just read,—that is to say, within the time during which it was competent to have appealed to the House of Lords against that judgment or decree, and that being so, the question is, whether the heritable creditors are not entitled to say that they are in the position of third parties who acted bona fide upon the faith of that judgment or decree, and so are entitled to the protection given by the statute.

There can be no doubt, I presume, that if third parties choose to take heritable securities within the time allowed for appealing against the judgment or decree they take the risk of that judgment or decree being altered upon appeal, and it may very plausibly be said that that goes a considerable way to shew that the heritable creditors in this case must be held to have taken that risk. But although that may be so, still, if the time for appealing is allowed to lapse without either reduction or appeal being instituted, it does not follow—whatever risk they may have been taking in the interval—that these creditors are not then entitled to the protection given by the statute. I think it would be very difficult to say that creditors who had accepted securities within that time, but with reference to whom no appeal or reduction had been instituted till after the time had expired, were in any worse position than creditors who had taken their securities after the time had expired. Those of the defenders, at all events, who became onerous assignees after the time for appealing had expired, but before the reduction had been instituted, would surely be in the ordinary position of bona fide singular successors, in what, although relating to securities merely, is really a question of heritable rights. The more general question, however, comprehends the original creditors as well as assignees, and just comes to be, what did the Legislature mean by this protecting clause? what was the bona fides with which the Legislature was here dealing? It appears to me that the words "third parties, acting bona fide on the faith thereof," mean third parties acting bona fide upon the faith of the judgment or decree. The word "thereof" plainly refers back to the words "judgment or decree," and this reference is, I think, carried throughout the rest of the sentence. Well, then, what is bona fides in a judgment or decree? The thing required is not bona fides in the proceedings which preceded the judgment or decree, but bona fides in the judgment or decree itself. It appears to me that if the parties bona fide believed the judgment or decree to be a good judgment or decree, that was the kind of bona fides which the statute required. It must be kept in mind that such a judgment or decree is never pronounced without careful investigation and consideration. It is not pronounced lightly, far less as a matter of course, but causa cognita, after the mind of the Court has been applied to the whole matter, including the question whether the applicant is or is not in the position required by the statutes to entitle him so to apply. No one can dispute that in this case the Lord Ordinary applied his mind to this question. It was his undoubted duty to do so. There is no more anxious duty, according to my experience as a Lord Ordinary, which a Judge has to perform, than to deal with petitions under this class of statutes, to see that they are all right and regular, that they come within the terms of the statutes, and that the thing which is proposed to be done is a thing which the law allows to be done. Most unquestionably, therefore, we are to hold that the Lord Ordinary took all these things into consideration, that he made a remit for inquiry in the usual way, and that he had the facts as well as the statutes before him, and if a mistake was made it was a mistake of the Judge, who thought he was pronouncing a sound judgment.

No. 60.
Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

The question then comes to be, was it necessary, to entitle a creditor to plead the statutory bona fides, that he should himself, by his own counsel and agents, make all the investigation and solve all the legal questions which the statutes have committed to the Lord Ordinary, and through him, if he sees difficulty in the case, to the Court. I cannot think that is the meaning of the clause. The matter was committed to a competent Judge, who, it is to be presumed, knew his duty, and performed his duty. There was nothing upon the surface to create suspicion of error or mistake, and this being so, I think it would be an unreasonable construction of the enactment to hold that the creditor was bound to perform over again all that the Judge had already performed, with the chance of arriving at a different conclusion from that at which the Judge had arrived, before being entitled to the benefit of the protecting clause in the statute.

It may appear a little startling at first sight to say that a creditor lending upon heritable security was not bound to look farther, but we must recollect that these statutes as to the law of entail have interfered to an extraordinary extent, and by very complicated enactments, with what had always previously been considered the rights of property; and it is not, to my mind, at all wonderful that, in making these changes, the Legislature should have extended to creditors lending their money on the faith of all being right the privilege and protection of bona fides, in the sense in which I am disposed to construe these words in the enactment. Be this as it may, however, I think such is the fair and sound construction of the clause in dispute; and, although the point is undoubtedly a nice and delicate as well as a novel one, I am on the whole inclined to agree, on that point also, with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur in the decision of the Lord Ordinary. I concur also in the opinion now expressed by Lord Deas.

There can be no doubt that the petition for disentail presented in August 1869 was supported by deeds of consent which were not sufficient in law, as the petitioner had no heir-apparent, and therefore could not have the consent of an heir-apparent. The only consent was not according to the provisions of the statute, and accordingly the interlocutor or decree of the Court was invalid.

It has been so declared, and rightly so, by the Lord Ordinary.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876. Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

But a more difficult question arises in regard to the validity of the bond for £35,000, granted by Lord Dunmore to creditors on the faith of the decree, and accepted in bona fide by the creditors.

I think these bonds were granted and were accepted in bona fide, on the faith of the judgment of the Court. I think that, being held by bona fide third parties, they are within the protection of the statute 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec. 24, and that the Lord Ordinary has rightly found the bond and assignations to be valid and effectual securities.

After the explanations given by Lord Deas I have really little to add.

The petitioner for disentail was the Earl of Dunmore, the heir in possession. The obtaining the proper consents was necessary to the success of the petition; and these consents, believed to be appropriate and sufficient, were obtained after the petition had been presented. These consents are not conditions of the petition, but muniments of the right to demand decree in terms of the prayer. They were required by the Act. The obtaining and producing the consents after the petition was presented, and in course of the procedure, was compliance with the provisions of the Act. The production of insufficient consent was just failure to produce sufficient consent, and was non-compliance with the provisions of the Act, leaving the petition unsupported by the consents which the statute required, and decree on the petition was therefore reducible—reducible within a certain time to all effects, but after a certain time the rights of third parties acting in bona fide are protected. Now, on this petition, regularly presented but insufficiently supported by consents, there was judicial procedure, and a regular decree of Court was pronounced, authorising the acquisition of the estate in fee-simple. On the faith of this decree the bond was executed and accepted, and the assignations granted. All this was done in good faith, in the natural and honest belief that the decree of Court was conclusive.

Now, observe the provisions of the 24th section of the 16th and 17th Vict. c. 94—[reads]. The non-compliance is something different from mere irregularity.

It is also very important to observe what it is that is protected. It is not the procedure, or any step of a party in the procedure. It is the "judgment and decree." Around the judicial deliverance of the Court this protection against reduction is thrown by the statute in every case where third parties have acted in bona fide on the faith of the judgment. It seems to me natural, equitable, and becoming, that a party acting on the faith of a judgment of Court, obtained by an heir of entail in possession, and presented to him as a valid judgment, shall be protected.

The judgment stands till reduced, and this statute of 16 and 17 Vict. declares that, when acted on by third parties, relying on the faith of it in bona fide, it shall not be reducible on any ground of irregularity or non-compliance with the provisions of the Act.

During the debate I asked Lord Dunmore's counsel—"Why did you get consents?" The answer, and the right answer, was, "Because it is so provided by the statute." Then the failure to obtain the proper consents is "non-compliance with the provisions of the Act;" and on the ground of such non-compliance the judgment is assailed. Having been accepted and acted on by third parties in good faith I think that, to their prejudice, it cannot be reduced.

I am at present assuming the good faith of these third parties, and, if so, I am humbly of opinion that the bond and assignations cannot be reduced on the grounds here alleged.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

But it is said or suggested that these creditors were not in bona fide, because they might have discovered, and ought to have discovered, the defective character of the consents, and could have done so by careful and skilful perusal of the judgment and the titles.

I shall only say that, while admitting this question to be attended with some difficulty, I cannot arrive at that conclusion. There are preliminary examinations and reports on these petitions. There was in this case such examination and report before judgment, and the judgment is given, not hastily or without inquiry, but causa cognita on consideration of "the report, petition, and whole proceedings." There is every presumption in favour of a judgment thus pronounced. There is everything to give and to sustain confidence, and nothing to excite suspicion. Nothing has been proved or alleged to throw the least doubt on the good faith of these creditors; and I cannot hold that want of bona fides is to be presumed or lightly implied against creditors accepting a bond granted under such judicial authority, and as the result of such a judgment.

There was no appeal from the decree of disentail, and no reduction instituted within the period allowed by law. It was acted on as valid, was unchallenged, and uncomplained of, and, on the faith of it, in bona fide, money was lent, and this bond accepted. The reduction of the bond, the refusal to bona fide creditors of the protection of the Act of 16 and 17 Victoria, notwithstanding that these creditors acted on the faith of a decree of the Court, would, in my view, be most inequitable; and to let in the principles of equity on the laws of entail is, I think, one of the leading purposes of all recent legislation on the subject.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD MURE.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, and I have not had any difficulty upon the first point, viz., the reduction of the interlocutor of the 5th of February 1870, by which the property in question was authorised to be acquired in fee-simple.

The facts under which this question is raised are few and simple. The original entail under which the estates were held was dated in 1841. There was then a disentail in 1864 at the instance of the present Earl of Dunmore; and that disentail, having been regularly carried through with the requisite consents, the estate was held in fee-simple. In the same year, and as the condition apparently of the consent being given to the disentail, there was a trust-deed executed in favour of certain of the disentailer's relations, by which the estate so disentailed was appointed to be held in trust, with a view to sell portions of it and acquire other lands, and with directions to re-entail the estates.

In 1869 Lord Dunmore, who was born before 1848, presented another application to the Court in order to obtain leave to hold the estates so placed under trust in fee-simple. That was done by him, as the heir of entail in possession of the estate at the time. In the course of the application he obtained the consent of the three nearest heirs, under certain clauses of the statutes authorising disentails, and after due inquiry the interlocutor or judgment now in question was pronounced, authorising him to acquire the lands in fee-simple.

That judgment was pronounced after the procedure which is usually taken in such cases, and after a man of business had been appointed by the Court to inquire into the whole proceedings, and to report whether they were in compliance with the statutes. It further appears, from the appendix which has been laid before us, that, as two of the heirs who were called as respondents in the petition were minors, men of business of experience were appointed to act as their curators, and attend to their interests in the matter. And it also appears that, after due inquiry, a report was made to the Lord Ordinary in the usual way, and that, upon this report, judgment was pronounced, giving right to Lord Dunmore to acquire the lands in fee-simple.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876. Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

This proceeding is now challenged, upon the ground that the requisite consent was not obtained, inasmuch as Lord Dunmore was in the position of a party holding under an entail dated subsequent to 1848, and it was necessary that he should have the consent of an heir-apparent of twenty-five years of age, without which it was incompetent for him to acquire the property in fee-simple. This objection to the procedure, and to the conveyance of the estate in fee-simple following upon the disentail, is, in my opinion, well founded; and I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the pursuer is, to that extent, entitled to reduction.

But a more difficult question is raised under this action relative to the position of the creditors who have advanced money on the estate upon the supposition that it was held in fee-simple; because, if the estate was not disentailed, and there was no right given to Lord Dunmore to acquire it in fee-simple, then unquestionably the security of the creditors is imperilled, unless they can find protection within the provisions of the statutes. The defence of the creditors is rested on the 24th section of the 16th and 17th Vict. c. 94, which provides that "every judgment or decree pronounced" under such an application which is not taken to appeal or brought under reduction within a certain time "shall, as regards third parties acting bona fide on the faith thereof, be no longer reducible on any ground of irregularity, or non-compliance with the provisions of the recited Act or of this Act."

The question, therefore, comes to be, whether, seeing that the proceedings relative to the acquisition of the estates in fee-simple in 1870 have been irregular, and not in compliance with the provisions of the statute as regards the matter of consent, and were therefore invalid, these creditors are entitled to the protection conferred by the statute upon parties acting bona fide on the faith of a judgment so pronounced? I have come to the conclusion that the creditors in the present case are entitled to that protection.

Upon the fact of bona fides I have no doubt whatever. There is no allegation that the creditors were not in bona fide, or that they were not in the firm belief that they were advancing money on a fee-simple estate. In that view the question is reduced to this,—must they be held to have been in mala fide because the irregularity was of a nature which might have been discovered upon looking into the proceedings with a view to the advance of money? Now, if it is to be held as a sufficient reason for creditors not being in bona fide that they could have found out upon examination, and by the advice of skilled lawyers, that the proceedings were irregular, and not in compliance with the requirements of the statute, I do not very well see how there could be bona fides under the statute, in almost any case of this description, where on erroneous judgment has been pronounced, because the examination of legal experts will, in all probability, in most cases detect any mistakes a Court may have made in granting the decree. But I do not think that under this provision of the statute it could have been intended that if the judgment itself bore, as here, to be a judgment of the

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

Supreme Court—of the tribuual authorised by statute to deal with these matters —and to be a judgment pronounced after due inquiry, it was still to be the duty of creditors before they advanced money upon the estates to set on foot an examination into the details of the proceedings which led to the judgment, and into the grounds of the judgment, in order to see whether the Court had not gone wrong in granting leave to disentail. I do not think the Legislature ever intended that, or that the words of the statute force one to adopt that construction. It, on the contrary, humbly appears to me that a creditor is entitled to act, and to rely upon a judgment of the Court pronounced on an application bearing to have been presented and carried through under the statute, although it may turn out that the application was defective in respect of non-compliance with the provisions of the statute relative to consents, and I think that this is a matter as to which creditors are entitled to the protection afforded by the 24th section.

It was strongly contended on the part of the pursuer that the whole proceeding was funditus and ex facie null and void and beyond the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with at all, because Lord Dunmore had then no son, and there could not therefore be an heir-apparent of twenty-five years of age. But this is a difficulty which does not appear to have occurred to the Court when the judgment was pronounced, after due inquiry, as the decree itself bears; and the statute says that every judgment or decree so pronounced and not taken to appeal "shall, as regards third parties acting bona fide on the faith thereof," &c., "be final and conclusive."

We have the judgment in this case (partially quoted, p. 346), which, after setting forth that curators had been appointed to the minor children, and a remit made to a man of business to report, bears that "the Lords having considered the report, the petition, and whole proceedings," interponed their authority thereto. Now, I think that creditors, when advancing money, were entitled to believe this to be a sound judgment, and to make advances on the faith of it, and cannot be held to have been in mala fide because they did not enter into an examination of the proceedings in order to see whether the Court were right or wrong in the judgment they pronounced. The argument which was pressed upon this point appeared to me to come to this, that because, ex facie of the proceedings, there was not any consent of an heir-apparent, the Court had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter; that this was not therefore a mere irregularity or non-compliance" with the statute in the sense of sec. 24, but that, in this view, there was truly no judgment which should have been plain to any man of business advancing money. But this, as I apprehend, does not solve the difficulty. Because, in every case where a Court is exercising a purely statutory jurisdiction, and where there have been irregularities and non-compliance with statutory requisites, the ground upon which such proceedings are generally challenged and set aside is, that the Court had not jurisdiction to act except in the way the statute authorised. To hold, therefore, that the protection given to bona fide creditors by the 24th section of this Act cannot be extended to this case because the objection strikes at the jurisdiction of the Court which pronounced the decree would, in the view I take of it, be in effect to hold that there cannot be any case to which the provisions of the statute relative to the protection of creditors can be applied; and this is, in my opinion, a sufficient answer to the objection, in so far as it is rested on alleged want of jurisdiction in the Court to deal with the matter.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876. Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

I agree therefore with Lord Deas and Lord Ardmillan in holding that the objection taken to the securities granted to the creditors is not well founded, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has found that the interlocutor of 5th February 1870, and the conveyance by the trustees to Lord Dunmore by disposition dated 25th and other days of March 1870, are invalid; and there I agree with his Lordship and with all the Court. But the Lord Ordinary further finds, "nevertheless, that the bond and disposition in security for £35,000, and the various assignations thereof, are, by virtue of the 24th section of the 17th and 18th Vict. cap. 94, valid and effectual securities, and that the several sums of money contained in the said bond and disposition in security and assignations thereof form valid and effectual charges on the said lands of South Harris and others." In regard to this second finding I have the misfortune to differ from all your Lordships and from the Lord Ordinary; and as the question appears to me to be one of great and general importance I must take leave to state the grounds of my opinion somewhat in detail. In the first place, we must ascertain what was the position of the Earl of Dunmore when he proceeded to make the disentail in 1864. He had succeeded as heir of entail and provision to his father under a deed of entail which was executed and recorded in the year 1841, and he was infeft as heir of tailzie and provision under that deed. He was thus in the position of being heir of entail in possession of the estate of South Harris and others under an entail dated prior to the 1st of August 1848, and he was entitled to disentail that estate if he could obtain the requisite consent, under section 2d or section 3d of the Entail Amendment Act. He did obtain the requisite consents, and the category under which he brought himself, among the various categories contained in these two sections, was that of an heir of entail in possession, with the consent of the three nearest heirs. That disentail was regularly and properly carried through; but, although he thereby became fee-simple proprietor for the time, he had carried through this disentail under an arrangement with the three next heirs not to pay them any pecuniary consideration for their consents, but under an obligation undertaken by him that he would re-entail the lands, or rather that he would apply the lands in such a way, by selling them and employing the price in the purchase of new lands, as to secure these new lands under a deed of entail to the same destination of heirs as was contained in the entail of 1841. In implement of this obligation he conveyed the lands of South Harris, which he had disentailed in the manner explained, to two trustees, his mother, the Countess Dowager of Dunmore, and Mr John Tait, and the purposes of that trust are very clearly explained in the 5th and 6th heads of the deed. After providing for some preliminary purposes it provides, —"In the fifth place, I hereby authorise, empower, and direct the said trustees, as soon as it is by them deemed advisable and advantageous, to bring to sale the whole lands and estate and other heritages hereby disponed, and after advertisement of sale thereof in such way and to such extent, having regard to the advertisements already made and being made, the trustees may deem best calculated to effect an advantageous sale or sales (of which they shall be the sole judges), to sell and dispose of the said lands and estate and other heritages hereby disponed, in whole or in part, by public roup or by private bargain." Then the sixth purpose is,—"I hereby authorise and empower, appoint and direct, the said trustees, as opportunities may offer, after the sale or sales of the said lands and estate, and other heritages hereby disponed, of applying the free residue of the said price or prices in the purchase of other lands and heritages in Scotland, to apply the said free residue of the said price or prices in the purchase of such other lands and heritages in Scotland as may be approved of by me, or, failing me, by the said Honourable Charles Augustus Murray; and, failing him, by the said Honourable Henry Anthony Murray; and upon such lands and heritages being so purchased and acquired, and the title of the said trustees thereto being duly made up, I direct and appoint the said trustees forthwith to execute an irrevocable and valid and sufficient disposition and deed of strict entail, one or more, of the said lands and heritages so purchased and acquired, to and in favour of myself, the said Charles Adolphus Earl of Dunmore, and the heirs-male of my body; whom failing, of the said Honourable Charles Augustus Murray," and so forth, repeating the destination in the original entail of 1841.

Now, it was contended in argument that, as this disposition was granted in implement of an arrangement and agreement between Lord Dunmore, on the one part, and the three next heirs of entail upon the other, it was in the power of these parties to put an end to the agreement, and also to discharge this conveyance, or to require the trustees to reconvey, although they were infeft upon this disposition. I do not think any of your Lordships have given the slightest countenance to that contention, and I am not surprised at that, because nothing can be clearer than that the heirs of entail in the destination of the original deed of 1841 acquired a jus quæsitum under the trust-conveyance, and that no parties, not the whole parties to the agreement in implement of which this was granted, could have put an end to this trust. What, then, was the position of Lord Dunmore under this trust-deed? He was no longer fee-simple proprietor. He had divested himself of that character, and he was beneficiary under this trust, and institute in the deed of entail to be executed by the trustees when they had sold South Harris and acquired other lands. He was in the position contemplated by the 27th section of the Entail Amendment Act; and it is very necessary to attend to the precise words of that statute. It provides that, "where any money or other property, real or personal, has been or shall be invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed, or where any land is or shall be directed to be entailed, but the direction has not been carried into effect, it shall be lawful for the party who, if the land had been entailed in terms of the trust, would be the heir in possession of the entailed land, and who in that case might, by virtue of this Act, have acquired to himself such land so purchased, by executing and recording an instrument of disentail as aforesaid, to make summary application to the Court, as hereinafter provided, for warrant and authority for the payment to him of such money or the conveyance to him of such land in fee-simple, and the Court shall, upon such application and with such consents, if any, as would have been required to the acquisition of such land in fee-simple, have power to grant such warrant and authority." In connection with that must be taken the 28th section, which provides that, "for the purposes of this Act, the date at which the deed or writing placing such money or other property under trust or directing land to be entailed first came into operation shall be held to be the date at which the land should have been entailed in terms of the trust, and shall also be held to be the date of any entail to be made hereafter in execution of the trust, whatever be the actual date of such entail."

Now, the date of this deed of trust was 1864, and it came into immediate operation. About that, I suppose, there can be no doubt; but at all events it is very clear that the date of this deed of trust cannot be earlier than the year 1864, and therefore the date of the entail for the purposes of this Act, from the fetters of which Lord Dunmore proceeded to attempt to relieve himself, is not earlier than the year 1864. From that it follows very clearly that Lord Dunmore was then in the position of an heir of entail in possession by the operation of the 27th section of the statute, under a deed of entail made after the 1st of August 1848. I presume so far that cannot be disputed. Now, can an heir of entail, possessing under a deed made after the 1st of August 1848 disentail an estate, and in what circumstances is it possible? That is the inquiry which must always be made in a question of this kind, and the answer to it is to be found in the 1st section of the statute, and, let me add, nowhere else, because the other two sections, the 2d and 3d, which refer to disentailing, are concerned entirely with entails made before the 1st of August 1848. Therefore the simple key to Lord Dunmore's position as he stood after the execution of that trust of 1864 was this, that he could not disentail at all unless he was in the position contemplated by the 1st section of the statute. Now, what does the 1st section of the statute say? It provides that in two cases such a disentail may be made, but in two cases only. In the first place, if the heir was born after the date of the tailzie, and is of full age, and in possession of the entailed estate by virtue of the tailzie, he may disentail without any consents at all; and, in the second place, if he was born before the date of the tailzie, and is of lawful age, and in possession of the estate by virtue of the tailzie, he may disentail. And now I give the very words of the statute:—"With the consent, and not otherwise, of the heir next in succession, being heir-apparent under the entail of the heir in possession, and provided that such consent and such instrument of disentail shall not be valid and effectual unless granted by a person of the age of twenty-five years complete, not subject to any legal incapacity and born after the date of the tailzie to which such instrument applies." Now, Lord Dunmore was not born after the date of the tailzie, and therefore he could not fall within the first part of this section. He was born before and not subsequent to the date of the tailzie, and therefore he is not entitled to disentail—I do not say without the consent of an heir-apparent, but he is not entitled to disentail unless there exists an heir-apparent of the full age of twenty-five years complete, born after the date of the tailzie. It is the existence of such a person in this world that gives the sole title to Lord Dunmore to disentail that estate; and, without the existence of such a person, there can be no title in him to disentail the estate. It is not merely that a consent is required. Now, the condition of Lord Dunmore at this time was that he had no son and no heir-apparent; and what was the necessary legal consequence of that under this statute? that, until he begot a son, and bred him up to the age of twenty-five years complete, he could not disentail that estate. That was his position in 1864. Therefore, it appears to me that Lord Dunmore had no more title to disentail the trust lands held by these trustees than if he had not been in the position of heir in possession. The one is not a bit more a condition of the right to disentail than the other. It is required that he shall be the heir in possession, but it is also required that he shall have an heir-apparent of the full age of twenty-five. The one is just as essential as the other. It seems to me there is here, not a failure to comply with any of the provisions of the statute, but the simple fact that Lord Dunmore is not within the statute at all. He is not contemplated by the statute, and he has no rights under the statute. And thus the objection to his proceeding in the

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

year 1870 is not that what was done in Court was wrong, but that antecedently, and before he presented his petition at all, he had no title to do it. There is, in short, a radical defect of title. Now, what is done? He presents an application to disentail this estate as if the entail was dated prior to the 1st of August 1848, and gets the consent of the three next heirs, none of them being heir-apparent, and he carries through the proceeding upon that footing, and as if it were a case under the 3d section of the statute; and it is said that that is to be valid and effectual, so far at least as to set up all the bonds that have been granted by Lord Dunmore in the character of fee-simple proprietor acting on the faith of that warrant of disentail. I cannot agree with your Lordships in thinking that this is a case within the 24th section of the statute 16 and 17 Vict., and I think it would be very much to be deplored if that were the meaning of the 24th section of that statute, for I think it would lead to great practical injustice and great practical inconvenience. Just let us consider for a moment, before adverting to the language of that clause, what was the position of the party lending his money here. He lends the money upon an heritable security after employing a conveyancer to examine the titles, and the duty of that conveyancer is to examine the titles for forty years prior to the date at which the loan is proposed to be contracted. Now, what would the conveyancer employed by the borrower here find in that progress of titles? He would find that Lord Dunmore had been an heir of entail under an old entail executed in 1841, and that he had validly and effectually got rid of that entail, and become fee-simple proprietor. He would then find that, in fulfilment of an agreement with the next heirs of entail, he had conveyed the estate in trust to be re-entailed, or rather to be converted into other lands, and these other lands re-entailed on the same series of heirs; and he would see that then, and from that date, Lord Dunmore was no longer an heir of entail in possession under the deed of 1841, but was an heir of entail in possession under a deed with the statutory date of 1864. Having arrived at these facts, which are patent on the face of the title, was it not the duty of the conveyancer next to inquire, could Lord Dunmore get rid of that entail which was to be made by the trustees? And if he had looked at the state of the titles a little further he would have seen, not only that he could not possibly do that under the statute, but that he had attempted to do it in a way that was altogether out of the statute. He must have seen that an heir possessing under a deed dated in 1864 could not disentail under the 3d section of the Entail Amendment Act, but could only disentail under the 1st section of the Entail Amendment Act, because the 1st section of the Entail Amendment Act is the only one that is concerned with entails made after the 1st of August 1848. Now, that seems to me to be a radical defect in the progress of titles which any conveyancer ought to have detected, and which, if he did not detect, he must meet the consequences. But it is said he and his client proceeded in bona fide. I confess I really do not understand what is meant by bona fides in a case of this kind. There must be a failure to look at the progress of titles, or an incapacity to understand them when you do look at them. But it is said he bona fide trusted to the decree of Court, and the decree of Court, it is said, bears such an authority upon the face of it, that everybody is entitled to rely that it is a good decree. But the decree is truly a decree in absence, so far as the interests of heirs nascituri are concerned. At all events, the conveyancer was surely at least bound to examine the decree to see if it was what it professed to be. And what did

No. 60.
Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

the decree bear? Why, the decree of Court,—that is to say, the extract decree which formed one of the steps of the progress of titles,—disclosed upon the very face of it the illegality that had been committed. It shewed that this was an entail dated subsequent to the 1st of August 1848; it shewed that Lord Dunmore had not and could not have the consent of an heir-apparent, and that he was born prior to the date of the entail, and therefore it shewed incontestably that he could not by any means whatever obtain a disentail of this estate. The extract decree, upon the face of it, condemned itself, not for want of consent—it is a mere mistake to talk about it as a case of want of consent—it disclosed upon its face that Lord Dunmore having no son, having no apparent heir of the age of twenty-five, could not by possibility disentail this estate. But let us look at the 24th section of the 16th and 17th Vict., and see if this is really a case within the meaning of that section. "Every judgment and decree pronounced after the time for reduction or appeal has gone by shall, as regards third parties acting bona fide on the faith thereof, be no longer reducible on any ground of irregularity or non-compliance with the provisions of the said recited Act or this Act, but in respect of any such ground of challenge be final and conclusive." Now, pray, observe it is not sufficient to bring the case within the protection of this statute that the party lending his money or buying the estate shall have acted bona fide on the faith of the judgment or decree, because it protects him only against certain grounds of challenge, —not against all grounds of challenge. And, therefore, the inquiry must always be whether the ground of challenge in this case is within the specification of the grounds of challenge in this 24th section. Now, what are the grounds of challenge against which the party is to be protected? "On the ground of irregularity or non-compliance with the provisions of the said recited Act or this Act." I do not think it was contended, and I do not think your Lordships have expressed an opinion that the ground of challenge here is an irregularity. It is certainly something more than that, and therefore unless it can be brought within the category of non-compliance with the provisions of the recited Act or this Act it is not within the clause. Non-compliance with the provisions of an Act of Parliament—what does that mean? It means a failure to comply, but there cannot be a failure to comply when a person cannot by possibility comply. That surely cannot be said; an heir of entail, who is not in possession of the entailed estate, fails to comply with the provisions of this statute in one sense of the word, for he is not the person whom the statute contemplated. But just in like manner, an heir of entail in possession of an estate under an entail dated after the 1st of August 1848, being himself born before that date, fails to comply with the provisions of this statute unless he has an heir-apparent of the full age of twenty-five years. But the one is a non-compliance just in the same sense as the other. It is not that he has omitted to do something which the statute requires. It is that he is not in a position to do it,—that he cannot bring himself within the statute at all by any means. And that is exactly the position of the case here. It is not a non-compliance with the provisions of the statute in carrying through the proceedings of disentail; but it is that he comes into Court without any right whatever to have a disentail. The statute has given him no such right. It has given him no such right upon any conditions that it is possible for him to fulfil. And therefore I say this is not within the category of non-compliance with the provisions of the statute. I think it is not in the least difficult to see what it was that bona fide third parties were to be protected against by means of this 24th section. It was against irregularities in carrying through the proceedings of disentail, and a most proper protection that was, because it must be observed that under the Entail Amendment Act there are a great many very stringent provisions about the way in which the thing is to be done. Under the 33d, 34th, 35th, and 36th sections of the Entail Amendment Act your Lordships will find a great many things that must be done, and to fail to do which would be a most serious non-compliance with the provisions of the statute; and that is the class of objections plainly which is intended to be covered by this 24th section of the more recent statute. I think to extend it any further would be not only against the plain sense and meaning of the words used, but would be inconsistent with the construction of statutes of this kind altogether. I confess I never heard of such words as these, "irregularity or non-compliance with the provisions of the statute," being held to cover a case where a party was not within the statute at all,—had no title or locus standi under the statute; and yet that is the condition of the judgment, in my humble opinion, which your Lordships are now affirming.

No. 60.

Jan. 14, 1876.
Viscount Fincastle v. Earl of Dunmore.

THE COURT adhered.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 61.

Jan. 17, 1876.
Minister of Borthwick v. Dundas.

REV. WALTER WADDELL, Minister of Borthwick, Pursuer.—Asher.
ROBERT DUNDAS AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Lee—Dundas.

Teinds—Augmentation—Decimæ inclusæ.—In an augmentation the minister condescended upon free teind arising from several different parcels of lands. Only one of the heritors objected to the condescendence, and on the ground that he held his lands under a title cum decimis inclusis, and craved that the process should be sisted that the minister might bring a declarator to try the validity of the objector's decimæ inclusæ right. Held that as there was free teind apart from that of the objecting heritor the minister was entitled to an augmentation, and that the objection of the individual heritor would fall to be disposed of in the locality.

TEIND COURT.
Teind Clerk.

THIS was an action of augmentation, modification, and locality at the instance of the Rev. Walter Waddell, minister of the parish of Borthwick, against the heritors.

After hearing counsel, the Court appointed the minister to "condescend upon the free teind which he alleges to exist in the parish."

The minister accordingly put in a condescendence in which he averred that the free teind in the parish was £107, 17s. $8\frac{4}{12}$d., arising from eleven different parcels of lands, and, inter alia, from 81 acres of the lands of Shank belonging to Robert Dundas of Arniston, which, he averred, were unvalued and paid no stipend.

Mr Dundas objected that the lands referred to were really part of the Mains of Arniston, and were held by him under a title cum decimis inclusis et numquam antea separatis, and was consequently not liable to be localled on for teind.

When the augmentation was called for debate, it was contended for Mr Dundas, on the authority of the Minister of Glenluce v. The Earl of Stair,[1] that the process should be sisted in order that the minister might bring a declarator to try the validity of the decimæ inclusæ right founded on.

[1] Nov. 9, 1874, ante, vol. ii., 76.

No. 61.

Jan. 17, 1876. Minister of Borthwick v. Dundas.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case in its circumstances, and not governed by the rule followed in that of the Minister of Glenluce v. Lord Stair, 9th Nov. 1874, ante, ii., 76. In that case the only hope of the minister was to establish that the particular heritor was possessed of free teind which could be localled upon, and was not proprietor under a title cum decimis inclusis. That being a matter of doubt the minister was put to bring a declarator before an augmentation could be granted. But we cannot refuse the minister here an augmentation, because independently of the teinds, about which there is this disputed question, he has shewn that there is free teind to a material extent. In any view of the case therefore we must give an augmentation. If Mr Dundas is found in the locality not to hold these lands cum decimis inclusis, there will be all the more free teind out of which the minister can draw his augmentation. If, on the other hand, Mr Dundas' title to these lands, cum decimis inclusis, is as clear as he asserts, the first step in the locality will be to hold Mr Dundas free from any additional stipend, but that will not free the other heritors from liability to augmentation.

I think, therefore, that we ought to grant an augmentation on the footing of there being the amount of free teind alleged by the minister. If it turns out that there is not, as has been the case in many instances, then he will simply be unable to draw the full amount of augmented stipend.

LORD ORMIDALE, LORD MURE, LORD GIFFORD, and LORD CURRIEHILL concurred.

THE COURT granted an augmentation of six chalders.

ADAMSON & GULLAND, W.S.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 62.

Jan. 18, 1876. Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

MRS BLAIR'S EXECUTORS AND OTHERS, First Parties.—M'Laren. MRS JANET CUNNINGHAM OR TAYLOR AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Horn—Mellis.

Succession—Testament—Conditio si sine liberis decesserit.—A testator bequeathed his whole estate to his father (who predeceased him), whom failing, to the testator's whole brothers and sisters nominatim. Held (1) (diss. Lord Gifford) that the conditio si sine liberis did not apply in favour of the issue of a brother who predeceased the testator; (2) that there was no partial intestacy, and that the surviving brothers and sisters were entitled to the whole fund.

2D DIVISION. R.

THE late Charles Cunningham, sometime merchant in Smyrna, afterwards H. M. Consul at Galatz, and who died at Galatz on 26th November 1860, left a will in the following terms:—"I, Charles Cunningham, son of James Cunningham, of Bonnington Mills, in the county of Edinburgh, in North Britain, now about to settle as a merchant at Smyrna, in the Turkish dominions, do hereby, in the event of my death, give and bequeath all my estate and effects, of every description, and wherever situated, which shall belong to me, or to which I shall be entitled at the time of my death, unto the said James Cunningham, my father, and failing him by death before me, unto Archibald Cunningham, John Cunningham, George Cunningham, Margaret Cunningham, Janet Cunningham, Andrew Cunningham, and Mary Cunningham, my brothers and sisters, equally among them, share and share alike. And I hereby name and appoint the said James Cunningham, whom failing, my said brothers and sisters before named, to be my executors.—In witness whereof I write and sign this, my testament, at Bonnington Mills, the 17th day of January 1825. CHARLES CUNNINGHAM."

No. 62.
Jan. 18, 1876.
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

The parties named as beneficiaries, failing the testator's father, were the whole brothers and sisters of the deceased. The testator's father died in 1833. The testator's brothers, Archibald and John, also predeceased him. John died, leaving issue, in 1838. Archibald died, without issue, in 1853. The other brothers and sisters survived the testator.

This special case was presented by (1) the brothers and sisters of Charles Cunningham, the testator, who were alive at the time of his death, and their representatives; (2) the children of John Cunningham.

The parties of the second part maintained that they were entitled to take their father's share under the conditio si sine liberis, and to share with the parties of the first part the proportion of the estate which would have fallen to Archibald if he had survived the testator.

The parties of the first part maintained the negative on both these points.

The questions of law submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court were:—"1. Whether the shares of the estate of the late Charles Cunningham, provided by him to his brothers, Archibald and John, who predeceased him, or either of these shares, have lapsed into intestacy? 2. Whether the brothers and sisters of Charles Cunningham who survived him have right to these shares to the exclusion of the children of the said deceased John Cunningham? Or, 3. Whether the children of John Cunningham have right to the share of the testator's estate provided to their father? And, 4. Whether they have right to a proportional part of the share provided to their deceased uncle, Archibald Cunningham?"

Argued for the children of John Cunningham;—The conditio si sine liberis decesserit had received a much wider application in the law of Scotland than in the civil law. It had been extended to all cases where, as here, the testator was making a provision for his nearest relatives as a class, whether he stood to them in loco parentis or not. If the element of the pietas paterna was necessary, it was sufficient that the testator assumed the position and duties of a parent. The conditio had been applied in a great variety of cases, not only to bequests to children, but to bequests to nephews and nieces,[1] to a bequest by a person to the children of his brothers uterine,[2] and even to a bequest to cousins.[3] It would be anomalous if it were held not to be applicable to the present case, where the testator stood in a much nearer relationship to the beneficiaries. There was no delectus personæ, the persons named in the will being the testator's whole brothers and sisters, a class of which there could be no more, since their mother was dead at the date of the will.[4] John's children were entitled to a proportional part of the share provided to their deceased uncle Archibald, as well as to the share provided to their father. Their names must in effect be read into the will in place of their father's.[5] Alternatively, if it were held that the beneficiaries were called nominatim, and the conditio si sine liberis to be inapplicable, the shares provided to John and Archibald, who predeceased the testator,

---

[1] Wallace v. Wallace, Jan. 28, 1807, M. "Clause," App. No. 6; Thomson v. Robb, July 10, 1851, 13 D. 1326, 23 Scot. Jur. 619; MacGown's Trustees v. Robertson, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 356, 42 Scot. Jur. 161.

[2] Nicol v. Nicol's Executors, July 13, 1875, reported infra, p. 374.

[3] Christie v. Patersons, July 5, 1822, F. C. and 1 S. (n. ed.) 498.

[4] This was stated at the bar, and assumed to be the fact in the opinions of the Judges.

[5] Rattray v. Blair, Dec. 8, 1790, Hume, 526; Thomson v. Scougalls, H. L., Aug. 31, 1835, 2 S. and M'L., 305.

No. 62.
Jan. 18, 1876.
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

must be held to have fallen into intestacy. The doctrine of accretion did not apply to a bequest in shares.[1]

Argued for the surviving brothers and sisters of the testator;—The application of the conditio si sine liberis to the present case was not warranted by the authorities. It was essential that the testator should be in loco parentis to the institutes.[2] The conditio had never been applied to collaterals except in the case of Christie v. Patersons, which could not be considered an authority.[3] The intention of the testator was that his surviving brothers and sisters should receive the whole fund.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The main question which we have to decide arises out of a settlement executed by Mr Charles Cunningham on 7th January 1825. Mr Cunningham died on 26th November 1860, thirty-five years after the settlement was executed. He appears to have been a young man at that time, about to leave the country and settle as a merchant at Smyrna. Before leaving, he executed the deed before us.

Two of his brothers predeceased Charles Cunningham, one left issue and the other did not. The question before us is whether the issue of the deceased brother are entitled to share in the bequest. We are told that the brothers and sisters named in the will were the whole brothers and sisters of the testator. This raises the question whether the conditio si sine liberis applies when the beneficiary is a collateral relative, neither a descendant in fact nor one to whom the testator stood in loco parentis. The application of the conditio si sine liberis has been made the subject of decision under a great variety of circumstances. The conditio has been held to apply where the settlement is universal, where the beneficiaries are a class, and the provision is of the nature of a family settlement, and where the testator, if not a parent, is at all events in loco parentis to the beneficiaries. Where all these elements concur, the conditio will be applied. The effect given to these elements depends on two principles, first, that the delectus personæ implied in a nominatim bequest is excluded when the provision is to a class; and secondly, that when the provision is of the nature of a family provision, and where the granter is in loco parentis to the beneficiaries, there is a presumption that the granter prefers the issue of a predeceasing beneficiary to any substitute named in the deed.

On the other hand, it has been held that where the subject is a special legacy, where the legatees are called nominatim and not as a class, and where the testator is not in loco parentis, neither a parent literally, nor in the position of a parent, the conditio will not apply, upon this manifest principle, that a bequest to A, whom failing, to B, without mention of A's heirs, is presumed, ex figura verborum, to go to B in the event of A's death before the testator.

In the present case there are three elements unfavourable to the application of the conditio.

1. The brothers and sisters are themselves mentioned as conditional institutes. The testator's father is instituted in the first place, and failing him, the testator's

---

[1] Voet, ad Pand., xxx. 1, 59; Stair, iii. 8, 27; Bell's Prin. sec. 1882; and cases cited in M'Laren on Wills and Succession, vol. i. p. 678 (sec. 1303).

[2] Dig. xxxv. 1, 102; Fleming v. Martin, June 6, 1798, M. 8,111; Hamilton v. Hamilton, Feb. 8, 1838, 16 S. 478, 10 Scot. Jur. 263; Rhind's Trustees v. Leith, Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 104, 39 Scot. Jur. 120.

[3] Rhind's Trustees v. Leith, supra.

No. 62.

Jan. 18, 1876.

Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

brothers and sisters. It is not likely that when one conditional institution is expressed, another should be implied.

2. The legatees are called nominatim. In one sense they may be said to constitute a class, for they were the whole brothers and sisters of the testator, and the mother being dead, there could be no more of the class. Still the form of the bequest is to the beneficiaries nominatim, an element which, in the case of Hamilton v. Hamilton,[1] the Court considered sufficient to render the conditio inapplicable. Lord Glenlee has some important observations in that case.

3. This is not a provision to children in any sense. It is a will made by a young man, going out to seek his fortune, and leaving this deed as a testimony of his good will to those he left behind. It is a will made by a man who had probably at the time nothing to leave, and made the will to affect any property which he might afterwards acquire. This is a less favourable case for the application of the presumption even than a provision to a family of strangers.

The question, then, is, whether the testator could be said to stand in loco parentis to the beneficiaries, and if not, whether the conditio applies to collateral relatives, and if so, whether it is of universal application. That last is a proposition which I cannot sustain. It may be that we do not strictly follow the civil law upon this point. If we did, the question is clearly resolved by the civil law and the commentators upon it. I may refer to Voet, book 36, tit. 1, secs. 15-19, where all the learning that is to be had on this branch of the law will be found. In the 19th section he states the very proposition with which we are now dealing, viz., that the conditio is not applicable to a bequest by a brother to a brother, and he refers to an opinion of Scævola upon a case where a man left a bequest to his brother, and, if the brother should have no issue, to a stranger, in which case he praises the testator's foresight for having expressed what the law would not have implied. I am not aware of any system of law in which the conditio would be held applicable to a bequest by a brother to a brother.

There could not be a stronger illustration than the present of how remote the case of a brother is from that conjectura pietatis, on which the conditio is based. It is plain that the testator had a great affection for his brothers and sisters. Is it to be assumed that his affection for them was less than his affection for their possible issue, whom he might never see? The probable inference is, that he intended his surviving brothers and sisters to take the bequest.

There is one case so near the present as to be almost decisive of it—Fleming v. Martin[2]—in which a bequest was left by a person to her sister, who was a widow with a large family, and who predeceased the testatrix. The Court refused to give effect to the conditio in favour of the children of the predeceasing sister. It is true that it would appear from the note on Lord President Campbell's session papers that the Court dealt with the case as one of a special legacy; but it was not a special legacy, and I take the note to mean that the Court applied the ordinary rule.

It has been held, however, that a bequest to a nephew will imply a bequest to his children, provided the other elements favourable to the application of the conditio si sine liberis concur. This was first laid down in the case of Wallace

---

[1] Hamilton v. Hamilton, Feb. 8, 1838, 16 S. 478, 10 Scot. Jur. 263.

[2] Fleming v. Martin, June 6, 1798, F. C., and M. 8,111.

No. 62.
Jan. 18, 1876.
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

v. Wallace,[1] and we gave effect to it in the recent case of MacGown's Trustees v. Robertson.[2] It must now be held as settled, therefore, that in the case of uncle and nephew the conditio will apply where the other elements which I have mentioned are present. Lord Benholme made some observations in the case of MacGown's Trustees in which I concur:—"The inclination of our law is to extend the maxim si sine liberis, but the limits within which it is applicable are not very distinctly fixed. In the case of nephews and nieces called collectively it has been held to apply, but it is not so clearly applicable to the case of individuals of a class called nominatim. A distinction has been taken between persons chosen out of a class and a whole class called collectively."

On the other hand, there are several cases in which the Court refused to apply the conditio. There is the case of Wishart v. Grant,[3] which related to a residuary bequest in favour of the children of the testator's sisters. Then there is the case of Sturrock v. Binny,[4] which really turned on the fact that the mother of the children, who claimed in virtue of the conditio, was not alive at the date of the execution of the settlement. The Court held, although Lord Moncreiff differed, that, as it was impossible to hold that the mother, who had predeceased the execution of the settlement, had been instituted, there was no room for conditional institution. Then came the case of Rhind's Trustees v. Leith and Others,[5] which also turned upon the fact that the mother of those who claimed under the conditio had never been instituted, she having been dead at the date of the settlement, but in which the present Lord President expressed a doubt whether the conditio could be applied to cousins of the testator under any circumstances.

This brings me to the only case which appears to stand in the way of the result I have indicated, viz., that of Christie v. Patersons, July 5, 1822.[6] The decision in that case is the only instance of which I am aware of the conditio si sine liberis being implied in a case in which the beneficiary was more remote than a nephew. In that case the bequest was a direction to divide the property among the children of the testator's maternal aunt who should be alive at the time of his death. The beneficiaries were thus the testator's first cousins. The grounds of judgment, as appearing from the report in Shaw's Cases (2d ed.), are very difficult to follow, especially when compared with those in the previous case of Neilson v. Baillie. But if the report in Christie v. Patersons, and that in the case of Neilson v. Baillie (4th June 1822, F. C. 617), as given in the Faculty Collection, be studied, the difficulty of reconciling these authorities in part disappears. In the case of Neilson v. Baillie, which was a case of grandchildren, the Lord President took occasion to say that, although if he had been in Papinian's chair he would have been of a different opinion, he held the point settled. He adds,—"In Cuthbertson v. Thomson, March 1, 1781, the Court considered the application of the maxim to be universal, unless taken off by express words or particular circumstances, and that substitution necessarily implies si sine liberis, &c." It thus appears that the Lord President's view was that a substitution, in [1] Wallace v. Wallace, Jan 28, 1807, M. "Clause," App. No. 6.

[2] MacGown's Trustees v. Robertson, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 356, 42 Scot. Jur. 161.
[3] Wishart v. Grant, June 16, 1763, M. 2,310.
[4] Sturrock v. Binny, Nov. 29, 1843, 6 D. 117, 16 Scot. Jur. 100.
[5] Rhind's Trustees v. Leith and Others, Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 104, 39 Scot. Jur. 120.
[6] F. C. and 1 S. (new ed.) 498.

No. 62.
Jan. 18, 1876.
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

the case of a provision to a class, universally implied the conditio, &c.; and accordingly that was the principle upon which he and Lord Gillies went in deciding the case of Christie v. Patersons. The case was one of a proper legacy to a class, but the beneficiaries of that class were first cousins of the testator. But it is impossible to sustain that doctrine now, and it has been repeatedly repudiated. It was distinctly negatived in the case of Hamilton, to which I have already referred,[1] where the fact that the beneficiary was called nominatim was thought sufficient of itself to exclude the authority of Christie v. Patersons; but Lord Glenlee's opinion, as well as that of Lord Medwyn, goes much farther, and substantially replaces the doctrine generally within the old analogy of the civil law, disclaiming altogether the idea that the conditio si sine liberis was universally implied in provisions to a class. That an uncle may be held to be in loco parentis to his nephew is fixed; but I consider it essential that the testator shall be in loco parentis. After the judgment in the case of Hamilton, and the clear indication of opinion by the Lord President in the case of Rhind's Trustees, the doctrine on which alone the decision in Christie could be supported must be now held not to be law. Lord Balgray and Lord Succoth dissented from the judgment in Christie's case on weighty grounds; and Lord Hermand, although he concurred in it, had expressed an opinion in Neilson v. Baillie, about a month before, that cases relating to collaterals did not apply.

On the whole, then, I conclude that the preponderance of authority is largely in favour of the view that the conjectura pietatis on which the civil law doctrine rested still applies, and that the condition will not be inferred merely from the fact that the provision is to a class to which the testator is not in loco parentis.

LORD NEAVES.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The doctrine of the conditio si sine liberis is derived from the Roman law, but, at the same time, it is founded on strong equity and natural presumptions. The conditio seems to have been first introduced in the case of a settlement upon a son, in which it was declared that the right should cease in the event of the son not attaining a certain age. Papinian laid it down that he would imply from the relationship of the parties that the testator did not mean to carry out the express terms of his testament if the party favoured should leave children. That was founded on the pietas paterna, the presumption that he who favoured his son was also inclined to favour his grandson. This result of the pietas paterna was necessarily limited to the existence of the relationship of parent and child. The same principle has been recognised in this country and on the Continent. Sande, in his book of Frisian Decisions, after explaining the conditio si sine liberis, says,—"Hæc pietatis conjectura, cum cesset in aliis, qui non sunt parentes, idcirco in fidei commisso ab his relicto non subintelligitur hæc conditio, si sine liberis." He goes on to say,—"Licet non desint, qui nihil interesse putant, testator ex ascendentibus sit, an extraneus" (being substantially the opinion which Lord Gillies seems to indicate in Christie v. Patersons); "ac ita aliquando sensit Antonius Faber, quam sententiam retractavit."[2] So that the only jurist whom Sande mentions as of the opposing opinion came round to the orthodox school.

No doubt the conditio has been applied in our law to the case of uncle and nephew, but the relation of uncle and nephew is in many cases almost as close

[1] Supra, p. 365.
[2] Sande, Decisiones Frisicæ, lib. iv. tit. vi. def. 6.

No. 62.
Jan. 18, 1876.
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

and cogent as that of parent and child. An uncle may often be in loco parentis to a nephew or niece. I am of opinion that its operations should not be further extended.

The specialties of this case, if it were necessary to look at them, are adverse to the application of the conditio. A man who is going off to Smyrna cannot be said to be in loco parentis to his brothers or sisters. Again, the beneficiaries here are enumerated individually, and described nominatim and not as a class, which shews that the testator's mind and eye were fixed on these particular persons.

I agree with your Lordship that the decision in Christie v. Patersons cannot be treated as an authority, at least not as an authority in the present case. Neither do I think the case of Wallace applicable. The framework and terms of the settlement there were materially different from what we here find.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The question to be determined in this case arises in peculiar circumstances, and has reference to the construction and effect of the testamentary settlement, not of a father in favour of his children, but of a son in favour of his father, whom failing by death before the testator, in favour of his brothers and sisters, whom he individually calls and names, equally among them, share and share alike.

The father, the institute in this settlement, and also two of the brothers, John and Archibald,—the former leaving issue,—having predeceased the testator, the question which has been submitted to the Court, and very fully and ably debated by the parties, is, whether the share of the testator's estate which would have gone to his brother John, had he survived him, now belongs to the issue of John, in virtue of the implied condition, si institutus sine liberis decesserit, or to the surviving brothers and sisters.

In dealing with this question it is necessary to keep in view that the principle which underlies the Roman law maxim referred to, and which has been recognised as of force in our own law, is the implied or presumed will of the testator. But, for obvious reasons, the implied will of a testator ought not to be superinduced upon what he has expressed, except in circumstances making it clear that his true intention is not thereby violated, and a settlement made for him which he would not have made for himself. Accordingly the authorities,—the institutional writers as well as the decisions of the Court,—shew that it is only within certain limits, and subject to certain qualifications, that the will or settlement of a party can be dealt with, except in accordance with its express terms, in order that other terms, not expressed, should be held as implied and given effect to. It must be conceded, however, that it is difficult to say on the authorities what are the limits or qualifications appertaining to this matter, or whether they can with certainty and precision be defined.

It has been stated that the implied condition can only be given effect to in circumstances which denote the pietas paterna, as in destinations by a parent to children or descendants in the direct line. But the cases shew that the implied condition has been applied to questions arising between parties standing in other relations, for example, in the collateral degree of relationship of uncles and nephews, where the granter of the deed has been held to stand in loco parentis to the beneficiaries; and also in some cases where conjectura pietatis has been held to operate, as when the destination is expressly to children as a class, although the granter of the deed is not their father, and cannot

No. 62.

Jan. 18, 1876.
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

properly be said to stand to them in loco parentis. But, in the present case, it is obvious that pietas paterna does not apply, and also that the granter of the deed does not stand in loco parentis to the beneficiaries whom he has named and called. And as to the principle of conjectura pietatis, I have not been able to discover any instance where it has been held to apply in circumstances similar to those which occur in the present case, where the difficulty arises from the circumstance of the will or testament being not by a father but by a brother, and not in favour of children or descendants, but an ascendant, the testator's father, whom failing by his predeceasing the testator, to his brothers and sisters, who are individually called and named. None of the precedents—and they were very numerous—cited at the debate, were, I think, precisely of this nature. Some of them, however, shew that the principle of implied condition has been given effect to in favour of nephews and nieces of the testator, and that is the position of the claimants in the present case, arising in consequence of their father, as well as the father of the testator, having predeceased him. That the circumstance that the second parties claiming stand in this position, and are not direct descendants of the testator, would not of itself be sufficient to exclude their right in virtue of the implied condition si sine liberis decesserit, I consider to be now clear on the authorities, whatever doubt may have been entertained at one time on the subject, even although it may have been, as I think it was, an extension of the doctrine as it was at first understood. But I am not aware, and am unable to hold, that this extension of the doctrine to collaterals is applicable, or can on authority or principle be sustained, under such a destination as that in question,—a destination not to children as a class, or to children at all, or even to nephews or nieces, but to brothers and sisters individually named and called. It was, indeed, conceded in argument that there was no decided case exactly in point, unless it be that of Christie and Others v. Patersons.[1] The circumstances, however, of that case were materially different from those of the present. There the institutes called were the children generally as a class of the brothers and sisters of the testator's mother, there being no delectus personarum indicated. And that children may in such and similar destinations be held, according to circumstances, to include grandchildren, is shewn in the cases of Ranken and Others, June 17, 1870 (8 Macph. 878), and of Houston, noticed in footnote to Wemyss v. Gray and Others, Nov. 23, 1810, F. C. But in the present case the delectus of the testator is indicated by his having left his estate, not generally to his brothers and sisters as a class, or to the children of his father generally and as a class, but to five brothers and sisters individually called and named by him. It may be true, as was stated in the course of the debate, that the individuals so called and named were all the brothers and sisters of the testator, but the father might, although he had not, have again married and had other children subsequent to the date of the testator's will. I think, therefore, for these reasons, that the case of Christie v. Patersons is distinguishable from the present, and cannot be appealed to as a precedent in point. Besides, even if it had been more directly in point than it is, I doubt whether it is an authority to be safely relied on, for (1) the decision was carried by the narrowest majority, that of one out of the five Judges present; (2) all the majority seemed to think the question fell to be governed by the two previous cases of Mackenzie v. The Legatees of Holt, Feb.

[1] 5th July 1822, 1 Shaw, 543 (n. ed. p. 498), and F. C.

No. 62.
Jan. 18, 1876.
Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

2, 1781 (Mor. 6602), and Wallace v. Wallace, Jan. 28, 1807, Mor. Appx. voce Clause, No. 6, although these cases ought not, I think, to have affected the decision, in respect that in both the testator not only stood, as it were, in loco parentis to the beneficiaries, but in both the institutes survived the testator, which was not the case in Christie v. Patersons. Besides, in all these cases, including that of Christie v. Patersons, the destination was in favour of children generally as a class, and not, as in the present case, in favour of particular persons specially called and named. Independently of these considerations, the decision in the case of Christie v. Patersons has been seriously questioned as an authority in any view that can be taken of it. It was so questioned by the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) in Rhind's Trustees v. Leith and Others, Dec. 5, 1866 (5 Macph. 104), who expressly said that he disregarded it as an authority.

For all these reasons, and chiefly for the reason that it makes no mention at all of children, but is simply a destination to the testator's father, whom failing, to his brothers and sisters specially called and named, I am unable to find that the children of the testator's brother John, who predeceased him, are to take the place of their father in the succession which has opened. On the contrary, in my opinion, the share intended for John, had he survived the testator, must, in consequence of his predecease, be held to have lapsed into the general estate, and as such falls to be divided amongst the testator's brothers and sisters who survived him.

There is another ground upon which, in the special circumstances of the present case, I should be disposed to hold that the issue of John Cunningham, who predeceased his brother, the testator, is excluded from the succession. The presumption upon which the implied condition involved in the maxim si sine liberis decesserit is raised is not absolute, but may be rebutted by and must yield to other and stronger presumptions. That such is the law is stated by Mr Erskine in his Institutes, book iii. tit. 8, sec. 46, and by Mr Bell in his Principles (sec. 1782), and is illustrated by decided cases. Thus, in Yule v. Yule, Dec. 20, 1758 (Mor. 6400), it was ruled that the condition si sine liberis did not take effect where a father, who, while unmarried, and after he had taken certain bonds payable to himself, whom failing, in favour of his brother, married and had children, and yet did not alter the bonds, although he survived their date three years, and the birth of his eldest child two years. It is true that there the bequest was of a special legacy, and not of the universitas of the testator's estate, and it is not to be disputed on the authorities that this is an important element militating against the admission of the implied condition. But in the case of Watt v. Jervie, July 30, 1760 (Mor. 6401), which occurred soon after that of Yule, it was held that a settlement by a man of his whole effects on his wife was not voided by the birth of a child five weeks after his death, although the father had disposed of the universitas of his estate to the prejudice of his child, for the reason, so far as can be collected from the report, that he must have known of the pregnancy of his wife, and had an opportunity of altering his settlement, but did not do so. Now, the circumstances of the present case are still more favourable for the operation of the same principle of decision. Here the testator's settlement was executed in 1825, and he lived thereafter till November 1860, a period of thirty-five years. John, the testator's brother, died in September 1838, about twenty-two years prior to the death of the testator. But the testator made no alteration on his settlement. In this state of matters the presumption is much stronger than in the cases referred to,

that the testator did not intend that the issue of his brother John should take the place of their father. Indeed, it is more probable that he should prefer the surviving brothers of John, whom he personally knew, and in family with whom he must for some time have lived, to the children of John, to whom he was under no obligation, and, for anything that appears, for whom he could have had no particular regard. I am disposed to hold, therefore, that the presumption involved in the maxim si sine liberis decesserit must, even if it had otherwise applied, be held to be overcome and excluded by what I think the stronger presumption afforded by the special circumstances of the case; and I do not see how any other conclusion could be come to consistently with the decisions in the cases of Yule v. Yule and Watt v. Jervie, to which I have referred.

The result is that, in my opinion, the second question in the special case ought to be answered in the affirmative, and this, I think, renders any answer to the other questions unnecessary.

